THE DEBATES

OF THE

SENATE OF CANADA

IN THE

THIRD SESSION OF THE TENTH PARLIAMENT OF CANADA, APPOINTED TO MEET FOR THE DESPATCH OF BUSINESS ON THURSDAY, THE TWENTY-SECOND DAY OF NOVEMBER, IN THE SIXTH YEAR OF THE REIGN OF

HIS MAJESTY KING EDWARD VII.

THE SENATE.

OTTAWA, Thursday, November 22nd, 1906.

The Senate met at 2.30 p.m., and adjourned during pleasure.

THE SPEECH FROM THE THRONE.

At Three o'clock p.m., His Excellency the Governor General proceeded in state to the Senate Chamber and took his seat upon the Throne. The Senators being assembled, His Excellency was pleased to command the attendance of the House of Commons, and that House being present, His Excellency was pleased to open the Third Session of the Tenth Parliament of the Dominion of Canada, with the following speech :

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate :

Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

In opening the third session of the Tenth Parliament of Canada, I avail myself of the opportunity to offer you my congratulations on the unparalleled prosperity prevailing in all parts of the Dominion. The harvest has been abundant, and the trade with both British and foreign nations continues to expand in annually increasing volume, with every prospect of continued growth for many years to come.

The number of immigrants seeking homes in Canada continues yearly to increase, and it is very satisfactory to observe that a larger proportion than in any former year has in the past season come from the British Isles.

During the recess following the last session, I visited the four western provinces, and was much gratified to note the great advance that is being made in the development of the vast resources of those highly favoured sections of the Dominion. I found the people of the west rejoicing in their prosperity, and full of hope and confidence in the future growth of its agricultural and industrial wealth.

The quinquennial census recently taken in the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan shows that those provinces are now entitled to an increase in their representation in the House of Commons. A Bill giving effect to that provision will be submitted for your approval.

In accordance with the announcement made in a previous session, you will be asked to consider a Bill for the revision of the Customs tariff.

The sanction of parliament will be required to give legal effect to the treaty made with the Empire of Japan. A Bill for that purpose will be submitted for your approval.

The products and manufactures of Canada shown at the recent International Exhibition held in the city of Milan proved a great attraction, and as a result it is confidently believed our trade with central and southern Europe can be materially increased.

The Naval authorities having relinquished the use of the dockyard at Halifax, a proposal was made to transfer it to the government of Canada. The offer has been accepted and the dockyard will now be used by the Department of Marine and Fisheries as a base for its operations in connection with aids to navigation.

Many immigrants having in recent years been induced to come to Canada by false representations made in the United Kingdom, at the request of the Minister of Labour a clause has been added to the Merchants Shipping Bill, now before the Imperial parliament, for the punishment of any person who may be found guilty of that offence.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

The accounts of the past year will be laid before you. I am glad to say that the revenue has shown a large expansion, and has not only provided for ordinary expenditure, but has also, to a great extent, provided for the outlay on capital account.

The estimates for the coming year will be laid before you at an early date.

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate :

Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

A united application having been received by my ministers from the governments of the several provinces asking for an increase in the provincial subsidies, a conference was recently held when the reasons for granting additional aid were fully set forth and discussed. Resolutions, based on the conclusions reached by my government, will be submitted for your consideration.

Bills will be laid before you amending the Election Acts, the Post Office Act, the Dominion Lands Act, a Bill for the more effective supervision and inspection of Canadian canned food products, meats and fish, a Bill relating to the sale and manufacture of patent medicines ; and also a Bill to make better provision for dealing with juvenile delinquents.

It is hoped that the report of the Commission appointed to inquire into the working of insurance companies will shortly be completed, when it will be laid on the table.

The subjects I have mentioned will, I hope, receive your best consideration, and the measures to be submitted for your approval will, I trust, tend to the well-being and good government of our fair Dominion.

His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire, and the House of Commons withdrew.

After some time the Senate was resumed.

Prayers.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT (Secretary of State) presented to the Senate a Bill intitled : 'An Act relating to Railways.'

The said Bill was read a first time.

The Senate adjourned until Monday next, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE.

OTTAWA, Monday, November 26, 1906.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Eight o'clock p.m.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

ERRORS IN MINUTES.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to draw the attention of the proper officials to an irregularity which occurred at the close of last session. The Journals of the House do not mention a motion that I made on the 10th of July asking that a humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General praying that His Excellency would be pleased to cause to be laid before this House a copy of the complaint made against Lt.-Col. Belanger, &c. The motion was carried, as we observe by the report in the Debates, but in the Journals of the Senate I fail to find any report of that motion being carried. I would ask the hon. Secretary of State to be kind enough to consider it as carried, as it was in effect, and to have the report brought down this session. I would also call attention of the hon. Secretary of State to a motion that I made on the 19th July, 1906, asking that an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General in relation to the correspondence between the imperial authorities and the government of Canada relating to the uniform to be worn upon state occasions by privy councillors. I undestand that an order in council has been passed with reference to that subject, and I would ask the hon. Secretary of State if he would kindly give us a copy of that order. We will consider the motion made in that sense. I should like to have the motion cover any order in council that has been passed on the subject without compelling an amendment to the motion this year; to simply consider it as carried.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am not aware that there is any order in council. The subject of the uniforms is not one in which I have taken a very deep interest, and, therefore, I have not kept up with the changes made from time to time. I am quite aware that the imperial authorities have advised the government of Canada that privy councillors were entitled to more gold on their coats than they had been in the habit of using, but I do not know that it is compulsory. I have not used it myself, and I have not been reprimanded for having failed to to do so. I do not know of any order in council; if there is I shall bring it down.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If the hon. gentleman will make inquiry he will find that an order in council was passed dealing with this subject. In fact, I was told by a gentleman that he had seen it—had been furnished with a copy of it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Then I stand corrected.

THE LATE SENATORS VIDAL AND KERR.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Before the order of the day is called it has been suggested that this would be an opportune time to make the usual reference to the death of two senators who had been with us last session and who are here no longer. The late Senator Vidal occupied a very important position in the Dominion of Canada. He had been elected for the St. Clair division at a time when the members for the Upper Chamber were elected and not nominated —I think in the year 1863. He continued to sit in the legislative council until confederation. He was not one of those who were named in the royal proclamation. I presume there were more than there were vacancies for. However, shortly after, within five years, he was summoned to this Chamber, and during the thirty-three years he sat with this body I think we can all bear testimony to the uniform courtesy that he exhibited at all times, to his remarkable equanimity of temper, of bringing calm judgment to the deliberations on every subject on which he passed an opinion. In the sessions of 1875, 1876, 1877 and 1878 there was a wide-spread agitation over this country in which he took a prominent part, to secure prohibitive legislation over large areas. I took up the question in 1878 and received material assistance from Senator Vidal in carrying that measure through this Chamber. By his advice and excellent example I have no doubt there are many men to-day who feel grateful for having adopted the good opinions he gave them in reference to this subject of total abstinence. He was at all times a very zealous advocate of teetotalism. I do not know that there is any more I can say with reference to the late senator. He left us in the fullness of years. He had been born back as far as 1819, the same year that Queen Victoria was born, and, largely due to his careful habits I think, he had kept his mind clear and ready at all times up to the very last to give sound judgment on any question that came before this Chamber. Those of us who were pained at seeing the feeble way in which he walked in and out of this Chamber so late as July last recognized that the time was coming when he would be called away, and, therefore, it was no great shock to us when we were informed of his death. The change must have been to him a happy one. I am quite sure that parting from this world involved no struggle in his case. He was quite prepared at all times to go, and he left in the fulness of time, having attained, I think, the age of 87 years.

The other death to which I desire now to allude is one that came unexpectedly and created a shock. The Hon. Senator Kerr, who sat at the end of this room, when he left us in the month of July last gave no indication that he would not be here in his usual health when the House met again. Providence, however, has willed it otherwise. He had lived the full term of the psalmist; still it did not appear from his mein and the way he carried himself. He was cheerful, bright and active and gave no indication what ever that his constitution was breaking up. The late Senator Kerr was a prominent man in the counties of Northumberland and Durham. He had been honoured by those who knew him in his own locality on very many occasions, having been elected mayor of Cobourg for a long series of years. He was highly esteemed by every one in that locality. He was chiefly connected during his life and recognized as taking a prominent part in the growth and influence of Victoria University, and he was on the board of that body and occupied also the position of vice-chancellor. His death, I know, will be deeply regretted by the Methodist body of which he was a very prominent member. In 1874, when Mr. Mackenzie was premier, being a strong Liberal, Mr. Kerr was elected for the county and sat during that parliament in the House of Commons. He was called to the Senate Chamber in 1899. I think all of us will bear witness to the kind and gentle way in which he demeaned himself while here. He took a prominent part in all the important debates, but no one will remember a single harsh word that he said on any occasion. Warmly devoted to the political party with which he had been all his life associated, he nevertheless had warm friendship for those who differed from him politically. His political feelings never interfered with his private friendship. Hon. gentlemen will be reminded that often in his speeches he indulged in a vein of humour, which added to the interest of the observations he was making. We all will express our sense of regret at his having been called away prematurely.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I quite concur in the sentiments which have been so very properly expressed by my hon. friend the Secretary of State as to the death of our two late colleagues. With reference to that of the late Senator Vidal, I might say that few men in Canada have seen the measure of public life which it was his privilege to possess. I think only two members of this Senate are alive to-day who were here at the time of his entry into this Chamber. I refer to my hon. friend the Secretary of State and the hon. senator from Richmond. He exceeded by almost a score of years the allotted span of life—three score and ten. During that time I think it might be said that he had the melancholy pleasure of seeing most of his contemporaries pass away. He entered public life early in the sixties. From the time of his entering into public life he may be said to have seen the few scattered provinces of Canada emmerge into the greatest self-governing possession of the British empire. Senator Vidal was always one of the active members of this Senate. Almost up to the time of his death he took an active and intelligent interest in everything which transpired. Few members of the Senate during the time he was amongst us took a more active interest in the work of the committees than our late and lamented colleague, and upon the floor of the House there was scarcely any measure of importance which did not receive the very best attention and consideration at his hands. Very fortunately for the late senator his disposition and his temperament were of that character which appealed to gentlemen on both sides of this House, and it was observable, I think, by every hon. member in this Chamber that both sides vied from time to time to pay their tribute of respect and esteem to the very gentlemanly way in which he transacted the public business with which he was concerned.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The ripe experience and the mature judgment and the disinterestedness which always characterized his discussions on public questions will be missed in this Chamber. Those characteristics always appealed to his fellow-colleagues, and will be missed in the transaction of our business. Not only was the late Senator Vidal a distinct acquisition to the public men of Canada, but few during his time engaged so actively in the work of social and moral reform. His connection with the temperance cause in Canada was well known from the Atlantic to the Pacific and the efforts which he from time to time put forward, to which the hon. Secretary of State referred, for the amelioration of the conditions of intemperance which have cursed so many of our fellowmen, will be long remembered by those who were associated with him in the work of moral reform. His loss will be distinctly felt in the public life of the country and in the different movements for social reform. As a public man, a good citizen and a friend I am satisfied this Chamber will, with his family, mourn his loss.

The remarks which I have made with reference to Senator Vidal might apply with equal force to the late Senator Kerr, who had long been identified with public life in Canada. He commenced his political career early in the seventies. Having entered into the arena of the other branch of parliament, the House of Commons, he was actively engaged for many years in the public business of the country and established for himself a reputation for honour and integrity which, so far as I am aware, was never impeached. Afterwards coming to this Chamber the late Senator Kerr identified himself very closely with the general business of and with the committee work of the Senate to such an extent that he certainly was a very great acquisition to the intelligence and to the ability of this body. Those who had the good fortune to come closely in contact with the late Senator Kerr will certainly mourn the loss of one who was possessed of every gentlemanly instinct. Senator Kerr was a good citizen. It fell to the fortune of few men to be more closely identified with public movements than the late senator. He was actively engaged for, I might say, a couple of generations in building up one of the great educational institutions of the country, and for many years was vice-chancellor of Victoria University. I doubt if any of the students, or those who have been associated with that university for the last half century have been able to give the continuous and active service to the building up of that institution that it was the good fortune of that university to secure in the service rendered by the late senator. He also occupied a very high position in the profession in which he was engaged. For many years, and at the time of his death, he was a bencher of the Law Society of Upper Canada, thus indicating very clearly the very high esteem in which he was held by his professional brethern. He was a prominent lawyer and belonged to a local bar to which the judiciary of his province owes very many bright and intelligent minds. I might say, therefore, that I with other members of this Chamber at this time would lay my humble tribute of respect, esteem and sorrow on the bier of our late lamented colleagues.

THE ADDRESS.

The Order of the Day being called,

Consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech on the opening of the Third Session of the Tenth Parliament.

Hon. Mr. JAFFRAY—I intended to say something with regard to the death of the late senators who have passed from us, but as that has been so efficiently and ably referred to by the hon. Secretary of State and the hon. leader of the opposition that it is unnecessary for me to say anything further on the question. I am sure that we all extremely regret that these hon. gentlemen have passed away. Hon. gentlemen, I regret that this important duty is not to be discharged by some one more competent to do it justice. Although I cannot plead youth nor that I have not had long experience and some activity in politics, it has not been on the platform, and certainly never before such an august body as I have now the honour of addressing.

Before proceeding further, may I express what I am sure is the feeling of sorrow of every senator and their deep sympathy for those who have suffered bereavement in the death of two of our members since we last met. They were deservedly highly esteemed and will be much missed from their places with us.

It is appropriate that His Excellency should open his speech with congratulations on the prosperity of the country, for never in its history did Canada enjoy such prosperity, whether it be agriculture, manufacture or merchantile business, and certainly the prospect for the future was never so bright notwithstanding the evils that are predicted to befall us according to some of our political opponents. The consolation is that the facts are all against them and the country is not prepared to believe in their sincerity or that they believe themselves what they say.

The country, and specially our great west, is deeply indebted to the present government for its admirable, efficient and highly successful immigration policy. During many years previous to 1896, instead of adding to our population to any extent we were contributing of our brightest youths to the upbuilding of our neighbour to the south. Now the tide is turned; many are returning and with them many of their best from the United States are pouring in to help to fill up the broad plains of our great Dominion.

It is gratifying to have the personal testimony of our very able and observant Governor General to the rapid development of the vast resources of our great Northwest and of the hope and confidence of the vigorous race who are peopling that great country. Let me take the liberty of saying that promising as that country is, it is not the only direction in which Canada has room to expand. The saying 'Go west, young man' must now alternate with the advice 'Go north, young man.' We are just awakening up to the fact that we have a country within easy reach to the north of us here teeming with mineral wealth and millions of acres of virgin soil equal to the best in Ontario, or even the Northwest. There is timber, silver in great quantities, nickel, iron and gold and this fertile land lies in a latitude more than a hundred miles south of Edmonton and a hundred miles south of Winnipeg and Peace River countries. This fertile belt stretches across a great part of Ontario and, I believe, some part of Quebec. There is enough already known in these two provinces to support in plenty double the population they now possess without crowding. I might speak of the magnificent water-powers in this district and its great possibilities when our railways shall have tapped Hudson Bay.

We will welcome with pleasure the additional representation from our new provinces. The men they will send from those vigorous young provinces will be, I am sure, an acquisition to parliament.

Whatever difference of opinion we may have on the question of customs tariff I think we are all agreed that a steady tariff has been of great advantage, and that this government has done the country great service in having made so little change in it since they revised it. Let us hope that when we have the promised revision it will be so efficiently done that further changes may not be necessary for many years to come.

We have confidence in our Finance Minister and his able colleagues who have been engaged with him in the preparation of this tariff, and who with him have so industriously gathered information throughout the length and breadth of the land. Let not the old adage be forgotten, 'Let well enough alone.' We never were doing so well; let us be slow to change.

It is important that we should have treaty relations with Japan, a country that has so suddenly sprang into prominence among the nations of the earth and with whom we must have extensive business relations, not only from our ports on the Pacific, but we should be able to have their highway from east to west across our country.

Taking over the dockyards of Halifax is adding another to our responsibilities, and I am sure the obligation will be discharged with benefit to the empire and credit to Canada.

The rapid and extraordinary increase in the revenue is a sure indication of the healthful expansion of the business of the country which necessarily brings with it increased expenditure, and while care must be taken that expenditure is wisely and economically made, the government must have the courage to meet the demands arising from the great and rapid growth of the country. I believe that this has been well and wisely done in the past and will be in the future.

There are many important Bills to come before us; none more important than the amendment to the Election Act, and it is to be hoped that all parties will approach it with a view to make it as perfect as legislation can be made. Corrupt practices cannot be stamped out by legislation alone; it can be done only by all parties resolving that it shall no longer disgrace our country.

The Insurance Commissioners report will be looked for with much expectation and confidence that men of their ability and experience, after so thorough an investigation, will make recommendations that will promote such legislation as will effectually put an end to the gross irregularities in dealing with trust funds that have been disclosed.

We have a great country with a great future before it. It calls for broad-minded able statesmen. Let us welcome and encourage them whether they be of our party or not. Let them be sincere and patriotic, striving for their country's good, and let our people have high ideals worthy of their great heritage.

We have to heartily congratulate Sir Wilfrid Laurier on having attained his sixty-fifth birthday and join cordially in endorsing the sentiments so happily expressed by the mover of the reply to the speech from the throne in the Commons: 'Long may he be spared in health and strength to serve his country in the future as he has so ably and well done in the past.

Hon. Mr. ROY—Following the time honoured custom of this honourable House, it will be my pleasure and privilege to second the address to the speech from the Throne in the French language. Previous to speaking in French I wish, however, to say a few words in English.

Coming as I do from the great west of Canada it was gratifying to me to hear His Excellency, in one of the first paragraphs of the speech from the Throne, refer to the great satisfaction he had experienced during his last visit to the western provinces. Let me assure you, hon. gentlemen that no representative of the Crown has ever left a better impression amongst the western population than His Excellency Earl Grey. The interest he has shown in the welfare of our part of the country has developed a strong feeling of admiration and of gratitude amongst our people towards the representative of His Majesty the King in our Dominion.

Before closing my remarks in English, I wish, hon. gentlemen, to express to you how deeply grieved I feel at the loss of two of the most respected members of this honourable House, Hon. Senator Vidal and Hon. Senator Kerr, of Cobourg, have passed away after giving the benefit of their experience and the best of their lives to the service of their country. And those who have entered later upon the same labours, who have benefited by their experience and appreciated their kindness, will feel impelled to uphold, as they have done, the best traditions of parliamentary life in Canada.

Hon. Mr. ROY (in French)—I appreciate personally, and I appreciate for my province, the honour which the government has done me, in requesting me to second the motion for the adoption of the address in reply to the speech from the Throne. I know that my short parliamentary experience will not permit me do justice to the task which I undertake to fulfil, but I count upon your indulgence for a political debutante.

Coming from one of the western provinces, I experienced a sense of pride and gratitude in hearing His Excellency, in one of the first paragrahps in the speech from the Throne, declaring to the people of Canada the great satisfaction which he had experienced in visiting our beautiful provinces in the west. In our part of the country we have a lively satisfaction every time we learn that a senator or a member of the House of Commons from the old provinces wishes to visit the west; for, to properly realize and properly explain the marvellous prosperity which Canada enjoys throughout, it is necessary to cross the fertile prairies of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. Not one of our legislators has returned from these new provinces without having learned how just and wise the government have been during the ten last years of their administration in inaugurating an aggressive policy of immigration, in giving generously to those provinces the best means of transportation and in putting an end to a disastrous monopoly, which up to that time had weighed upon the west. Hon. gentlemen, every dollar that you spend in the west will be returned a hundred fold to the Canadian revenue. To those who consider that the policy of the government is too large, I oppose this maxim of a great French writer. Littré said: 'It is necessary to undertake as if we were disposing for eternity. It is necessary to work each day as if we would die before to-morrow, and we dreaded leaving our work incomplete.'

Hon. gentlemen, we have yet millions of acres of land to cultivate. British Columbia and Alberta will, one of these days, be found to possess the greatest coal mines in the world. We will before long cover the United States market with the products of our lakes and rivers. The deposits of minerals and of petroleum only await development to give wealth to our country. I repeat, hon. gentlemen of the older provinces, that any sacrifices you wish to make in aiding the development of the west will be really favours done for yourselves. I am happy to state that the government thoroughly understands the truth of that principle. The speech from the Throne which we have before us, furnishes proof of that fact. Every one of its paragraphs deals with questions which tend, more or less, to continue the development of the west. The government, with the concurrence of the Minister of the Interior, one of the best qualified men for directing the affairs of the west, is prepared to increase and improve our immigration service.

The quinquennial census authorized by the Autonomy Acts, of the provinces, is nearly completed. That census proves that they are entitled to increased representation in the House of Commons.

I now come to deal with one of the most important questions which we will have to consider during the present session. The speech from the Throne refers to a Bill having for its object the revision of the customs tariff. The people of the west are confident that the government will not make any radical change in the customs tariff which would be prejudicial to the greatest industry in Canada, agriculture. The manufacturing class of the country at this moment are making representations to the government to obtain a larger measure of protection for their industries. It is the duty of the government to protect our Canadian industries to a reasonable extent. On the other hand, let us hope that the Canadian government will never commit the error, having due regard to natural economic principles, of establishing in this country a tariff of the Dingley character, which would create in Canada those monstrosities which we call trusts, which are becoming such a burden to the people of the United States, and are calculated to destroy the individuality of a great number of the citizens of that country. The industry which it will be most profitable to protect in Canada for many years to come is agriculture. When we shall have developed from the Canadian soil all the wealth which it contains, our national industries will have developed in the same proportions. For that matter, hon. gentlemen, I do not know that Canada has suffered much from the Fielding tariff. If we may judge from the results already obtained, this tariff appears to serve the great interests of our people. To prove what I have said I shall, with your permission, quote a statement which I have found in one of the great journals. In speaking of the Fielding tariff the newspaper says :—

'The Fielding tariff has stimulated and produced in our political life marvellous results, as shown by the following increases :

| | Per cent. |
|---|---|
| Foreign trade .. .. .. .. .. | 109½ |
| Accounts in the banks .. .. | 114 |
| Traffic on railways.. .. .. .. | 136 |
| Deposits in the banks.. .. .. | 156 |

And it continues—'Is it really contrary to the public good, this Fielding tariff, which has increased the volume of our commerce by $311,000,000 in ten years? Is it really so bad a tariff which has increased the exports of our manufactured products from $9,365,384 to $14,561,112? Is it really so disastrous, this Fielding tariff, which has permitted the popular savings to grow in bank deposits in ten years by $219,927,955? No, the Canadian people, marvelling at the results obtained, have confidence that the proposed revision of the customs tariff will not prejudice in the slightest degree the general interests of the country, while at the same time it will improve the special interests of different classes of our population.'

Hon. gentlemen, I am led to deal with a paragraph in the speech from the Throne which interests in the highest degree all Canada, but probably more especially the population of the west. The Canadian parliament will be called upon during the present session to ratify a treaty with the empire of Japan. This news will fill with hope all the settlers of the western provinces. I am one of those who believe that the countries of the Orient are the natural market for the products of British Columbia, Saskatchewan and Alberta. In the absence of near markets, and because of excessive cost of transportation, our farmers in Alberta and Saskatchewan often accumulate the products of their farms from year to year only to dispose of them finally at a sacrifice. Hon. gentlemen, five years hence the wheat of Saskatchewan and Alberta will be manufactured at Vancouver and Prince Rupert, and exported to the east for consumption. When that day comes the farmers of the west will be less cautious; they will sow twice or three times as much land, and receive for their products more remunerative prices. To my mind, it will be little short of a crime if we fail to give our approval to the government to permit them to bring to a successful end this truly national policy.

Another paragraph in the speech from the Throne announces that the Minister of Commerce is engaged in furnishing protection to a class of immigrants who, it appears, have been coming to Canada drawn here by false representations made to them by unscrupulous people. This wise measure is certainly worthy of the highest praise. We have no need in this most prosperous country of a disappointed and complaining population.

We shall also have to consider the resolutions adopted at the conference of the premiers of the provinces, and I doubt not that their claims will be heard. I am pleased to state that the happy dreams of our friend from Mille Isles (David) will soon be realized. I may be permitted to congratulate him upon it, for it seems to me that the patriotic words which he uttered in 1905 made a favourable impression on the government.

We shall also have to take into consideration an amendment to the electoral law. As has been so well said by others, it is not the law itself that is so bad, but those who violate it, deserve to be severely punished. I am one of those who believe that compulsory voting would be an effective remedy to the evils from which we suffer at this time, and I shall be happy to hear that question discussed in parliament with a view to deciding whether or not it is practicable.

Hon. gentlemen, I do not wish to close without assuring you of the great satisfaction which I have experienced in learning that we shall be asked to discuss and sanction a Bill concerning the sale and production of patent medicines. That law demands our most serious consideration. If it is important to legislate to secure the happiness and prosperity of the Canadian people, it is a hundred times more patriotic to legislate for the protection of the lives of our children. I speak with some knowledge of the subject, having studied the question of infant mortality, and it is necessary that we should be guided by the evidence. Patent medicines have been too often the cause of terrible disasters. That is why, hon. gentlemen, I believe that it is our duty, above all it is the duty of those amongst us who belong to the medical profession, to be prepared to adopt a law, I do not say a prohibitive law, but one which will give complete protection at least to those who are not able to defend themselves, our little children.

It is to be hoped that the report of the commission appointed to inquire into the methods employed in the administration of insurance companies will come before us during the present session. The Canadian people should be grateful to the government for the expeditious, impartial and firm manner in which that inquiry has been conducted. If there is any form of protection which the people has a right to expect from the government of the country it is surely protection of its savings. And this is all the more true when they deal with the savings left to widows and orphans. I may say that the insurance commission discovered nothing sufficiently serious to give any cause for alarm to our people. No doubt we will have to consider some abuses, and to amend the law in such a manner as to prevent such abuses occurring in the future.

Hon. gentlemen, the Canadian people rejoice in the abundant prosperity with which the country is blessed. To whom are we indebted for that prosperity? To Providence, no doubt, but in material things as in the domain of morals, Providence employs agents to attain its ends. The wise policy and foresight of the government have been the means by which Providence has loaded Canada with gifts which render our people so happy. There is also another reason, hon. gentlemen, to explain the prosperity and happiness of the Canadian people. They are due to the peace and harmony and the good will which reign among the different races that form the Canadian nation. The senseless prejudices which have existed in one place or another for the past ten years, have almost disappeared. To whom are we indebted for his beneficient improvement? We are indebted, hon. gentlemen, for the policy of conciliation and truly national and liberal Canadian ideas, to our statesmen, among whom the chief and most deserving of credit is the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier. For my part, I have a dream : it is to see in the province of Alberta, on the fertile banks of the Saskatchewan, where that policy of conciliation has above all borne fruit, a monument representing Sir Wilfrid Laurier carrying to the new provinces words of peace and conciliation.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I have very great pleasure in observing the precedent which has been so well established of congratulating the mover and seconder of the address upon the manner in which they have discharged the duties devolving upon them. It invariably falls to the lot of new members to make their maiden speech under the same auspicious circumstances that my hon. friends from Toronto and Edmonton have spoken to-night. In fact it has fallen to the lot of most of us at one time or another to discharge this duty, and in doing so we have a distinct recollection that the occasion was not prolific of suggestiveness, nor was the atmosphere of this chamber inspiring to oratorical efforts. We can all remember, however, that the duty did devolve upon us of offering up a certain measure of sweet incense to the governments for the achievements which they had foreshadowed in the speech from the Throne, the adoption of which they have been called upon to move and second. I am very pleased to say that the hon. senator from Toronto and the hon. senator from Edmonton have been very felicitous in the expression of these same terms. They have not overlooked attributing all the blessings which we enjoy, both temporal and spiritual to the present government. They have not been slow in superceding Providence by that providential and paternal government which at the present time administers the affairs of this country, and likewise in attributing to the government instead of to Providence every good and perfect gift of which we have been the recipients. However, as I have said, they have been following precedent, and I am not going to quarrel with them for having done so. I therefore take the opportunity of congratulating these hon. gentlemen on their accession to this body and expressing the hope that they may be long spared to be active and useful members of this Senate.

It has been said on many occasions, and I therefore hesitate to repeat it, that the speech from the Throne is not usually characterized by what it contains so much as by what is omitted; but it may be said on this occasion there has been a departure from that state of affairs and we have presented to us a bill of fare which is certainly elaborate in the many subjects embodied in the address and which I have no doubt will be presented to us from time to time during the present session. It may be said that this will be peculiarly a tariff session, although the reference to the tariff in the address appears in a very modest and unostentatious way. The mere mention of it does not throw very much light upon what the measure will contain. The public have a great deal of curiosity as to what the tariff will be, and to what extent the government will go in revising the existing tariff; but I doubt if the curiosity of the public—if we exclude the Liberal party—is so great as the curiosity of the Liberal party itself. That party is on the tip-toe of expectation as to what the tariff will contain. That, however, is still in the mysterious breast of the government. I have no doubt in the course of a few days our curiosity will be relieved by discovering that those gentlemen have been true to their record, of preaching free trade and practising protection. It seldom falls to the lot of a party to preach free trade and practise protection, yet that has been the attitude of the present government since 1896. One's prophetic instinct would not be far astray in predicting that notwithstanding the many protestations of the Liberal party against responsibility for maintaining a protective tariff, when the Finance Minister brings down his Bill, it will be found to embody practically all the measures of protection that have been in force since the party of the National policy introduced the tariff Bill of 1879. The Liberal party has been strangely inconsistent, and has shown little candour or honesty in thus masquerading as free traders for the last ten years, The government knows, the manufacturer knows, every intelligent member of the Liberal party knows that the tariff which will be brought down to parliament in the course of the next few days will be as highly protective as any tariff that has ever been in force in Canada, yet, notwithstanding this fact, the Liberal organs, with that strange inconsistency and insincerity which characterize them, are to-day preaching a crusade of free trade amongst the agriculturists of Canada, and expressing strongly the hope that the tariff to be introduced during the present session will be a free trade measure, though they know to the point of certainty that it will embody every principle of protection that has ever been in force in Canada. I therefore venture to say that the present session will afford to our Liberal friends probably a better opportunity than has occurred at any previous time though they have been many —to abjure the fiscal heresies into which they have fallen in the past, and to make frank avowal that the clap-trap which has been talked of from time to time was with the hope of deluding and securing the sympathy of the free trade party in the Dominion. I presume there is no law which will compel the Liberal party to observe the virtue of consistency between profession and practice, yet I would venture to say that public ethics should require such consistency on the part of any great political party. I venture to express the hope that the tariff measure will contain provisions which will enable the government to prevent the formation of trusts and combinations which so often grow out of undue and unhealthy protection. I also venture to hope that owing to the development of the western provinces, the government will adjust the tariff in such a way as to favour the agricultural industry in the west, and the many industries incidental to the settlement of that great country. There cannot be a properly revised tariff that does not take into consideration the dominant requirements of the country generally.

The legislation upon this subject must be for the benefit of the many rather than for the advantages of the few. However, all those expressions perhaps represent so much speculation in the absence of our having particulars of the tariff before us. The tariff will be laid upon the table of parliament in a few days, and the members of this House will then have an opportunity to discuss the details of it upon its merits.

There is another subject with which the address has dealt—and I might say has dealt with as modestly and as unostentatiously as the tariff—and that is the revision of our election laws. Owing to the unusual prominence which, during the recess, was given to many of the electoral acts of the Liberal party during the last few years, public opinion has reached, I may say, that stage when it demands from the government legislation upon this important subject. I venture to say, hon. gentlemen, that not in the history of representative institutions has there been such a humiliating and debasing spectacle with reference to the violation of the electoral laws as we have found during the last six months before several of our judicial tribunals. In fact to such an extent has electoral corruption been carried on, that it may be said the wholesale violation of election laws has reduced the shock to a greater extent than if it had occurred in isolated cases. We boast of our free institutions, of the sacredness of the ballot, of our franchise, of universal suffrage, and of the voice of the people being the paramount force in government, but I venture to say that we are greatly mistaken, that this conception of the franchise is all a myth, a wild fantasy of the imagination, a mistake that the representatives of the people are elected by the votes of the people. The disclosures which have been made in the various courts of the Dominion have demonstrated that many representatives of the people are not elected, but declared elected by machinery. The machine has been set in motion, and with the result that the representatives who have been selected by the machine have by these instruments been declared to be the representatives of the people. Every conceivable villany has been resorted to in order to debauch the electorate and to rob the elector of the vote which he has honestly cast. It is hard to conceive of any human ingenuity which has been overlooked to rob the public of the franchise properly exercised. In fact I would be ashamed of my country if I thought the rank and file of the Liberal party had been parties to the electoral corruption which has been exposed during the last six months. I do not charge for a moment—

Hon. Mr. POWER—Would my hon. friend excuse me? He is indulging in specific charges. Would he be good enough to specify some cases in which these things have taken place.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED. I might say to my hon. friend that it would take me a week or more to enumerate the various charges which have not only been brought to light, but established in courts throughout this Dominion in the last three months. I should be very sorry to say that the rank and file of the Liberal party have been responsible for the charges which have thus been established, but I do say without any hesitation that the Liberal party throughout the Dominion have profited by those violations of the electoral laws, not only the federal party in the Dominion, but the various local provincial governments, those that have gone down to defeat as well as those that are administering the affairs of their respective provinces to-day, notwithstanding their repudiation of responsibility of these charges. Under these circumstances, it is recognized that the duty has been cast upon the Liberal party of purging the public life of Canada to-day of the blot which has been left upon it, and which has besmirched the honesty not only of public but of private life in Canada by reason of the commission of these crimes. It therefore has fallen to the duty of the Liberal party, to legislate, to guarantee electoral honesty in the future, and I am satisfied that both parties will join hand in hand in making that legislation as restrictive and as perfect as it can possibly be placed upon the statute-book. It is idle for the government to deny responsibility, as my hon. friend has just inferentially indicated by the question which he has asked me. Can we for one moment conceive that the gangs of political pluggers, switchers and bribers that have passed up and down this Dominion for some years, have been set in motion of their own volition? It must appeal to the intelligence of every public man that this machine, made up of those law-breakers would not have been set in motion by themselves. They work according to certain plans, according to certain schemes. They carried on certain campaigns. They have expended not only small amounts, but very large amounts of money. By whom were those moneys furnished ? By whom were those plans conceived ? By whom were those campaigns devised ? It certainly was not by the instruments who have been violating the law in a way never before equalled. It must have been at the instance of some of the leaders of the party to which they belonged. If my hon. friend from Halifax has been following the Toronto papers of late he would have read of the Liberal procession before the Toronto police court, which has been appearing there week after week during the investigation. He would have read of the pluggers who told of opening and plugging ballot boxes, of the switchers who held classes and educated deputy returning officers to switch ballots. He would have read of the contractors of the government who contributed funds from time to time to the bribers that the electors of the country might be debauched. He would have read of the briber who boasted of buying his votes by the dozen. He would have read of the robber who plainly admitted of his stealing whole constituencies. I say that this was part of one great scheme, and it has been spreading throughout the whole Dominion, and we as a people who boast of honour, of honesty, of conscience, who observe religion and the laws of morality, I say it falls not only upon us but particularly upon these two branches of parliament to see that there is placed upon the statute-book of this session a law which will guarantee to the people of this Dominion electoral honesty. I might say hon. gentlemen that this machine has not been confined to Ontario. It has been operating in all the other provinces of the Dominion. It has been operating in New Brunswick, in Nova Scotia, in Quebec, in Ontario, in Manitoba, in the latter it has worked the thin red line device, and by the thin red line has struck out the names of hundreds of electors, and has thus defrauded the electorate of the franchise to which they were entitled. My hon. friend from Marshfield has properly said thousands of electors have thus been defrauded of their right of exercising the franchise. It is the same machine that was operating during the last local election in the province of Saskatchewan, when the pluggers, entirely regardless of the penalties of the law, filled the ballot boxes with ballots of their own manufacture and declared members elected entirely irrespective of all the electoral machinery on the statute-book. It was the same machine that operated in the province of Alberta, that absolutely ignored the day of election, that absolutely ignored the machinery of the statute for the holding of elections. It is the same machine that manufactured ballots, placed those ballots in the boxes, and declared the representative elected by reason of the ballots marked by the deputy returning officer himself.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—When the hon. gentleman refers to Nova Scotia is he referring to the election in Queen's county in 1891?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I am not referring to that. I am referring to the operations of the machine generally. I have no doubt it was in operation at the time and in the place mentioned by my hon. friend and he would doubtless be well aware of the fact. It must be a matter of satisfaction to both Conservatives and Liberals that at last this crisis has been reached, and that public opinion has been so outraged that at last there is a probability of there being placed upon the statute-book laws which will guarantee some honesty in elections hereafter. It has been said that one party is as bad as the other, and I was rather astonished to find that no less an authority than the Prime Minister of this Dominion ventured to express paliation for the wrongs and crimes that had been committed on the ground that both parties were equally to blame. This I deny. Upon this I take issue. I say without fear of contradiction—and I think I can establish to the satisfaction of even hon. gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber that my statement is correct—that the Conservative party has never preached impeccability, though they have never claimed to be Puritans of the cherubic type, yet they have played the game fairly and honestly in comparison with the Liberal party and have not been guilty of one-hundredth part of the violations of the election laws that from time to time have characterized the elections of the Liberal party throughout the Dominion. I will prove it in this way. By whom are those election scandals being exposed to-day? It has been said that the exposures which have taken place in the province of Ontario would not have taken place had not a Conservative administration been administering the affairs of this province, and the Liberal party have pointed out from time to time since the beginning of these scandals that it was due to the local provincial government having put in operation the criminal machinery of the Dominion that those exposures were being made. Let me say to hon. gentleman that that truly is the case. I contend that if a Conservative local administration were not administering the criminal law of Ontario to-day, these scandals would not have been exposed. They would have been hidden. They would have been concealed in the recesses of the mysteries of the Liberal party, as have been the scandals of many years gone by; but very fortunately for the morals of this Dominion very fortunately for the public life of the Dominion the criminal law of Ontario has been set in motion by a government that feels that the responsibility rests upon it to vindicate the laws of this Dominion. Who was it exposed the scandals in Manitoba, by which, as my hon. friend to my right has said, thousands of electors have been defrauded of their franchise? A Conservative government. They have exposed the scandals which have seen the light of day in the province of Manitoba. Let me say to hon. gentlemen that throughout the various provinces of the Dominion, beginning in New Brunswick and extending through to British Columbia, the Liberal party in local affairs since confederation has administered the affairs of those provinces for a longer period than the Conservative party. The criminal machinery of the Dominion of Canada has been in the hands of the local Liberal administrations of those provinces, I venture to say for 75 per cent of the time since confederation, and notwithstanding the fact that though that machinery could have been set in motion by the Liberal party from the Atlantic to the Pacific, can hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House point out to me wherein, notwithstanding the fact that the machinery was in the hands of the Liberal party, they have succeeded in exposing any parallel electoral scandals for which the Conservative party was guilty since confederation down to the present? I venture to say that no hon. gentleman on the opposite side of the House or on this side will point out a solitary instance in which there has been any scandal exposed comparable to the scandal which is now exposed in the city of Toronto and that which has recently been exposed in the province of Manitoba. Does this not establish the fact that the Liberal party has been guilty to a much greater extent than the Conservative party? The Liberal party would not exercise its generosity and magnanimity to the Conservative party in thus concealing scandals for which they were responsible, if they, while administering the criminal machinery of this Dominion could thus have exposed the acts of their opponents. If anything proves beyond all question that the Conservative party have been fairly exempt from guiltiness for electoral rottenness, it is the fact that you cannot point out in any of the provinces of Canada, under a local Liberal administration administering the criminal laws of the province, an exposure worth speaking of. I thus say without fear of contradiction that this very fact establishes that the Conservative party is not one tittle as guilty of electoral corruption as the corruption of which the Liberal party has been guilty. However, hon. gentlemen, recriminations will not assist in purifying the political atmosphere. I simply make reference to the fact I have now mentioned to establish, as far as I possibly can, the comparative freedom of the Conservative party from the guilt that I have pointed out which has marked the administration of Liberal affairs. As I said before, both political parties should join hands in the endeavour to place upon the statute-book one of the most effective Acts which it has ever been the opportunity of parliament to pass. I am sure there is enough patriotism and honesty and enough sense of decency in both parties to join in the effort to wipe out this corruption. I might say that there are other considerations in connection with this subject than the success or failure of either political party. There are the ethical considerations which grow out of a deliberate violation of election laws. It is idle for the public to build churches, to build schools, to attempt to inculcate the principles of religion and morals into the minds of the youth of the country, if the foundations of our political life be submerged in the corruption and rottenness which mark so largely the disclosures which have lately taken place. The morals of the country are the reflex of its rulers and government, as the stream will rise no higher than its source: so it may be said with a great deal of force that the morals and religion of the people will not rise any higher than the moral principles of its rulers or government. I therefore venture to hope, hon. gentlemen, that the ventilation of these scandals will clear the atmosphere and result in a higher standard of public life being observed and adopted throughout our Dominion. There is another subject which I should like to make a few observations upon, but which subject has not been alluded to in the address. I refer to the dispute which has arisen between the colony of Newfoundland and the imperial government. It is a matter of considerable public importance that the protest which has been made by Newfoundland to the imperial authorities against the renewal of the modus vivendi should receive some attention at the hands of this parliament.

The question resolves itself into this proposition, whether without the concurrence and consent of the colony interested, the imperial authorities will assume to deal with matters relating to the rights and the dominions of the colony in question. The statute law of the colony of Newfoundland has been deliberately ignored by the imperial government and the colony has been humiliated in having to yield obedience to a 'modus vivendi' which has been passed between the two governments, but against the protest of Newfoundland. Thus a self-governing colony is driven to submit to an agreement entered into by the colonial minister in London without in any sense being responsible to the colony whose rights or dominions he assumes to barter away. It seems to me this should not involve any detailed consideration of the Bait Act. The legislation in question was certainly within the rights of the colony, and whether that Bait Act is possessed of merit or not will not affect the principle involved in the dispute which has taken place between the two governments. I venture to say that the action of the imperial government is so far reaching in practically handing over the territorial rights of Newfoundland to the United States government, that if the same question should arise in Canada and the imperial authorities should adopt the same policy with reference to this country, Canada, to maintain its own self respect, would have to resist any such interference. If the self-governing colonies are to remain integral parts of the empire, there must be a recognition of their autonomy in the fullest sense, and an absence of interference. The colonial empire can only be kept together by the fullest recognition of all the rights of autonomy granted by the Crown and immediately the Imperial authorities, represented by the Colonial Office, undertake, irrespective of the wishes of the colony, to barter away those territorial rights or to in any way interfere with the freedom of government which pertains to that colony, then the integrity of the empire is jeopardized. In this particular case there is a law on the statute-books of Newfoundland. There was also the protest of the Newfoundland government against the action of the imperial government, and yet that government, without exhausting all the means of diplomacy, in the face of that protest, entered into a 'modus vivendi' with a foreign state, granting to that foreign state privileges within the territorial domain of Newfoundland not exercised by the people of that colony themselves. I am not contending that the Bond government acted wisely or diplomatically in the course they pursued. In fact, I doubt very much if they have done so, but that is not involved in the larger question we have to consider, namely, the interference of the imperial authorities through the Colonial Office, with the free exercise of the rights of autonomy pertaining to Newfoundland.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—Is not the Imperial government acting, holding or believing that it acts in regard to the interpretation of a treaty between the foreign power and itself? The hon. gentleman seems to be begging the main question. One feels that in standing up for the rights of a colony he is making a sweeping attack on the mother country in which he is not wholly justified by the facts of the case.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I understand that the imperial authorities have renewed the modus vivendi from time to time since 1888.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—Then the modus vivendi is the mode with regard to a treaty already existing—the interpretation of a treaty.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—In 1888, as I understand, a treaty was entered into between the imperial authorities representing the colony of Newfoundland and the United States government. Awaiting ratification of that treaty by the United States Senate, a modus vivendi was passed to permit of that ratification taking place. The United States Senate refused to ratify that treaty. The United States government has asked from year to year for a renewal of the modus vivendi. The colony of Newfoundland has said : We are opposed to a renewal, and has legislated to prevent its further renewal and protested accordingly to the imperial government. Let me say in this connection that it is one of the favoured methods of the United States government to enjoy treaty rights by means of a modus vivendi. The whole treaty history of British North America, and particularly the history of Atlantic fisheries, has been one long story of evasion and bad faith on the part of the United States government. They have entered into treaties from time to time stipulating that there should be reciprocal rights on the part of both countries. Those treaties have been repudiated by the United States Senate, the government of that country knowing well that they would be repudiated, and at the same time they have asked for a modus vivendi to enable them to enjoy the privileges being extended to them without extending to Canada or to Newfoundland the privileges those treaties provided for. As I understand this treaty which was not ratified, but was rather repudiated by the United States Senate, provided that the United States government should have certain rights in Newfoundland ports——

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The treaty to which my hon. friend refers is not the true one The whole controversy rests on the interpretation of the treaty of 1818 and the peculiar feature of it is that under that treaty on certain parts of the coast of Newfoundland and Labrador, United States fishermen were to enjoy the same privileges as Newfoundland fishermen. It is on the treaty of 1818 that the British government have come to the conclusion that Newfoundland ought to yield, and not on any treaty made by Mr. Bond.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—I understand the hon. gentleman was speaking of the treaty of 1818.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—There was the treaty of 1818 and there have been treaties since then—the Reciprocity Treaty of 1854. the Washington Treaty of 1871, and the treaty of 1888.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Those have been only temporary treaties.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—As I said before, I am in sympathy with the desire to preserve colonial rights, but the mother country has rights also, and, failing other treaties, every thing goes back to the treaty of 1818.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—As I have said to my hon. friend, they are thrown back on the treaty of 1818. The Newfoundland government has very properly said if the treaty of 1888, which embodies the agreement then entered into between the two governments, has not been ratified by the United States Senate, they are then thrown back on the treaty of 1818 and they have so legislated that the terms of the treaty of 1818 may come into force. True the imperial government has not viewed that favourably, but the question arises as to whether the United States government shall be entitled under a modus vivendi to enjoy all the rights which they were to enjoy under the 1888 treaty without extending reciprocal rights from that government. We know this modus vivendi gives to the United States right which the Newfoundlanders themselves cannot enjoy. However, that is not the question. The question is, whether the colonial office in London, manned as it may be by those not in sympathy with colonial rights, will undertake to barter away the territorial rights of a colony without exhausting all the means of diplomacy to avoid such a result. I quite conceive there are exceptions when there should be intervention by the imperial government, namely at a time when the exigency of war may possibly arise in a dispute between the colony and the foreign state. I must freely admit the right of intervention at such a time upon the part of the imperial authorities, but not when there is a probability that by the adoption of proper diplomatic measures the dispute between that foreign state and the colony may be satisfactorily arranged. I think it not undesirable that there should be an expression of the Canadian parliament upon a subject so germane to our relations with the imperial authorities before the colonial conference. I notice that very much the same dispute has arisen between the colonial office and Australia and New Zealand, and it is only a short time ago since a joint protest was sent by the premiers of New Zealand and the Commonwealth to the imperial government as to the Anglo-Saxon convention with regard to the New Hebrides and entered into against the protests of the governments of the Commonwealth and New Zealand. I might refer to a similar dispute between the colonial office and Natal, in which the colonial office had to recede from the position it took with reference to the Natal question, so one may readily appreciate if the colonial office is to adopt the high-handed policy it has been following of late as against the wishes of the colonies, it certainly will jeopardize the integrity of the empire. It is therefore a wise precaution to now raise a protest against any such interference on the part of the colonial office.

I notice there are two or three other subjects mentioned in the address to which I will not allude this evening owing to the lateness of the hour, excepting to say that the mention of those Bills suggests that it would be a very proper thing for the government to introduce them in the Senate. We know at the opening of this Chamber in the beginning of the session, there is very little work to do, and when it is apparent that the government has many measures to introduce such as are mentioned in the address, the Senate is entitled to consideration at the hands of the government which will warrant them introducing those Bills in this Chamber.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Owing to the lateness of the hour I move the adjournment of the debate. With reference to the remarks of the hon. gentleman just before he sat down I may say there will be some Bills introduced in this Chamber. The Revised Statutes are presumed to come into operation on the first of January next, and it is important that it should be passed before the end of the year, and assented to before the 31st of December, so hon. gentlemen will recognize that the Senate will have at all events to sit for some little time, even into the next month, which I hope will be rapidly acquiesced in by hon. members. I am aware that a number of gentlemen have expressed their desire that we should adjourn at an early day. Of course any such adjournment will be over the Christmas holidays, and that will be an adjournment for five or six weeks. It would be rather unseemly to adjourn for so long a period, and I hope hon. gentlemen will recognize the propriety of remaining here while there is any work to be done. There will be in addition to the Revised Statutes two other Bills that I shall have the pleasure of submitting for the consideration of this body, so we shall have something to do. I hope some private Bills will be introduced also to give us occupation.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is there any probability of the Revised Statutes being laid on the table before we are asked to ratify them, or are we expected to ratify them without knowing what they are?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The indexes are not yet completed. What I proposed to do was to lay on the table probably two or three parts of the Revised Statutes in their present condition contemporaneously with the introduction of the Bill to which I allude.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned untill three p.m. to-morow.

THE SENATE.

OTTAWA, Tuesday, November 27, 1906.

Mr. BAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

CORRESPONDENCE RE ROSS RIFLE COMPANY.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY moved:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will be pleased to cause to be laid before this House a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the government and the Ross Rifle Company or any other association or military body or any person whomsoever, or between the various departments of the government on the subject of the Ross rifle, of the inspections which it has undergone, of the improvements which have been suggested, of the complaints which have been made, or of the reports which have been made.

The motion was agreed to.

ROSS RIFLE COMPANY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired of the government:

1. On the 1st November of the present year how many rifles had the government accepted from the Ross Rifle Company (a) of Mark No. I. (b) of Mark No. II. ?

2 Out of that number how many of each pattern were accepted since the 1st May last ?

3. How much has the government paid up to the 1st November instant for all the rifles which it has accepted from the Ross Rifle Company, distinguishing the payments made for Mark No. I. and the payments made for Mark No. II. ?

4. Of these payments what amount must be deducted for the sums paid between the 1st May and the 1st November of the current year ?

5. On the 1st November instant what was the amount advanced by the government to the company as payment in advance for rifles in course of manufacture but not yet accepted by the government ?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—In reply to the hon. gentleman I may say as regards question No. 1, the answer is 10,500 rifles of mark I have been accepted and 9,000 of mark II. In reply to the second question, 3,000 of mark I and 6,000 of mark II. In reply to the third question, $262,500 have been paid on account of mark I and $225,000 on account of mark II. As regards the fourth question, $75,000 on account of mark I and $150,000 on account of mark II. As respects the fifth question $412,322.51, on the certificates of the inspector and chartered accountant respectively, paid on account of the 32,500 ordered and in process of manufacture.

THE ADDRESS.

DEBATE RESUMED.

The Order of the Day being called,

Resuming the adjourned Debate on the consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech on the opening of the Third Session of the Tenth Parliament.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I desire heartily to concur in the observations with which the hon. leader of the opposition prefaced his address last evening, in which he complimented the mover and seconder for the manner in which they had discharged the duties that had been assigned to them. The hon. gentleman who moved the address is one who has for a long time occupied a position in the financial and industrial world and may be regarded as a very great acquisition to this Chamber, a gentleman who is familiar with the business of Canada to probably as great a degree as most of those who are in the Senate to-day. My hon. friend, the youngest senator in this Chamber, as he styles himself, perhaps also the youngest gentleman in the House, certainly acquitted himself in a most creditable manner. He gave promise that in the future he will prove a very valuable member. He comes from an aspiring city, Edmonton, which is growing at a very rapid pace, and promises to be a large centre of trade in the Northwest.

I am sorry that I cannot concur in any of the observations which were made by the other hon. gentlemen. I do not think that they did him credit, nor were they worthy of the address to the body in whose presence he spoke. He passed over the first paragraph or two of the address in which reference is made to the prosperity prevailing, in a very flippant manner, saying that Providence had to do with that and no credit could be attached to the government of the day for it. Well, it is a very trite remark that Providence helps those who help themselves. It does not appear that Providence helped my hon. friends very much from 1878 to 1896. During those years trade stagnated, notwithstanding the efforts made under the National Policy to galvanize it into life. In that whole period of time the aggregate trade of Canada advanced only $67,000,000. The theory established by the National Policy was that the farmers were to sell to those employed by the manufacturers and the manufacturers were to grow rich by selling to the farmers. It was the old story of exchanging jackknives. Foreign trade was not cultivated; no effort was made to establish it, and in consequence there was no progress made. Instead of population increasing, as hon. gentlemen know, year after year it rather diminished in many of the provinces. The exodus was a familiar topic of discussion every time parliament met during those eighteen years. I will give just a few figures in illustration of what I am saying. I do not propose going into the subject at any length; it has been explained on many occasions before. The average annual increase in bank deposits between 1878 and 1896 was $6,000,000. The average increase between 1896 and 1906 was $34,000,000, nearly six times as large as when the National Policy prevailed. The aggregate trade increased annually only $4,000,000 in the period when the hon. gentlemen were in power; the annual increase in the nine years up to the last returns we have officially was $23,000,000. So that practically as far as bank deposits and the aggregate trade are concerned the difference is as six to one. Now, that is a marked difference. That did not come by accident or chance. It must have been the result of some strenuous effort on the part of the government. The sun shone as brightly during the years my hon. friend sat on this side of the House; the opportunities for the growth of the products of Canada were equally great, but they did not avail themselves of those opportunities. I could produce any amount of figures to sustain my statement, but I do not feel that it would be dealing fairly with the House to occupy its time with an off-told tale. It has been often given to this House before, and I think everybody is satisfied that it is to something more than the cause ascribed by the hon. gentleman who leads the opposition the extraordinary advance and development of the country during the relative periods to which I have adverted is due. The government spent money largely in their efforts to develop trade; they spent money lavishly to increase the growth of population. They had agents in the United States bringing before the people of that country the advantages that Canada offered, particularly to the farming element, and the investment met with a fair reward. In the same way all over Europe large amounts of money were spent by immigration agents to show the advantages of taking up land in Canada. I come now to the statement my hon. friend made in which he said: 'The Liberal party has been strangely inconsistent, and has shown little candour or honesty in masquerading as free traders for the last ten years. The government knows, the manufacturers know, every intelligent member of the Liberal party knows that the tariff which will be brought down to parliament in the course of the next few days will be as highly protected as any tariff that has been submitted to a Canadian parliament.'

I scarcely think that my hon. friend will prove to be a true prophet in the statement he has made. This government never posed as a free-trade government.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The government of Canada, antecedent to 1874, had maintained a revenue tariff. When the government of 1874, with my hon. friend on my right (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright), as Finance Minister were in power, there was a revenue tariff, the average rate being 17½ per cent. In theory they favoured free trade, but it was impracticable under the circumstances then existing. You cannot violently change the tariff of the country. That was done in England when the change was made from a moderate tariff to free trade, but it was done in the face of starving millions who, unless that policy had been adopted, would have been unable to live absolutely.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Why was it promised?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Who promised? Promised what?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Your platform.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It was never promised.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Free trade was the ideal aimed at, but the hon. gentlemen in their last term of eighteen years made it impossible for any government to adopt free trade. What did we find when we came into office? A vast number of industries not naturally to be supported in Canada had been artifically constructed, hundreds of millions of money had been invested, and was this government when it came into power to sweep all that away and confiscate that property? No, they were not so unpatriotic as to do anything of the kind. Whatever their views were on the subject of free trade they felt it was simply impossible. Their task was to moderate, to modify, to soften, and that is what they did in the tariff of 1897, and to that tariff is largely due the increased prosperity of which I have given a few illustrations. More particularly the British preference which brought down even that tariff to one-third eventually of its ordinary basis. So that the tariff was brought, by that action, as low as it was reasonably possible to bring it. And what was the effect? Our trade with the British islands which had been steadily falling, which had in 1896 fallen to somewhere about twenty-five millions, and gradually got down to twenty millions, is now going up by leaps and bounds. It has now reached, if I am correctly advised, in the neighbourhood of $60,000,000. The hon. gentleman's criticisms were not well placed, and I think he will find he has not been altogether a true prophet when the budget speech has been delivered. I make no observations as to what is likely to be done, but certainly it will not be the high protective tariff which the hon. gentleman has foreshadowed.

The hon. gentleman maintained that our tariff of 1897 was no change from the protective policy. I maintain that it was. It went as far as we were justified in going. That was the opinion of those who criticised it at the time. I have under my hand here a speech of Sir Charles Tupper when that tariff was going through the House. What did he say about it? He foreshadowed destruction to the industries of Canada. He believed that it was going to destroy the enterprises that were built up by the government of which he had been a member. He stated that the industries of the country would be paralyzed and asked if hon. gentlemen were prepared to vote for the destruction of Canadian industries. He declared that a deeper wrong could not be inflicted upon Canada than would be inflicted by the adoption of the proposed tariff.

That was the opinion of a gentleman who was prominent in the councils of the Conservative party when our tariff of 1897 was introduced. Was his prophecy correct? What has been the prosperity of the factories of Canada, with the single exception of the woollen factory? They have been expanding year by year, and millions of additional capital has been invested. They would have been larger to-day if they could have obtained the labour to meet the demand. No such prosperity at any time during what was called the National Policy stimulated the industries as they have been stimulated in the last nine years. It requires no evidence of that. There is no manufacturer in Canada who will deny it. It is not pretended at all. So that the policy adopted, even a modified policy as far as tariff was concerned, has not only benefited the whole country, but has actually benefited the manufacturing industries. The people were able to buy more from them; had more money to spare, and so the manufacturers received the benefit of it.

Now, I come to a branch of the subject in which my hon. friend was even more bitter and more severe in condemning and in holding this government responsible, and that is the frauds practised at elections. Let me quote his language. He said:

'Can we for one moment conceive that the gangs of political pluggers, switchers and bribers that have passed up and down this Dominion for some years as has been established in the tribunals to which I am referring, have been set in motion of their own volition? It must appeal to the intelligence of every public man that this machine, made up of these law-breakers, would not have been set in motion by themselves.'

Then he goes on to say: 'It is idle for the government to deny the responsibility.' These are his very words. I say there is no justification for that statement. Both parties have from time to time in the last 50 or 60 years, to my knowledge, contributed to secure greater purity in election. If the record is examined carefully, it will be found that the Liberals have suffered more from the fact that the Conservatives were in office for a longer period. A larger number of amendments made to the election law in the direction of securing greater and freer exercise of the franchise were made by the Liberal party. I have under my hand here a law, the larger portion of which is in force to-day, that the Conservative party in their eighteen years did not improve or modify. It was passed in the year 1874, during the administration of which my hon. friend and myself were members. It was improved somewhat in this Chamber when it came up here. It provided the most stringent clauses against bribery, against switching ballots, against every possible device that could be conceived of, that had been practised either before or since. I may say also that it is due to that same government that the system of voting by ballot was introduced. That was thought to be an advance, and to-day is regarded by the majority of people as a material benefit to the exercise of the franchise, enabling every man to give his vote privately and secretly, without compulsion or intimidation, and if he does take a bribe the man who bribes him is not sure how he votes after all, unless the switching is adopted. I will just refer to to the Act of 1874. I have looked casually over the election law, and I do not find that it has been materially altered. Section 68 provides for the cases of forging or counterfeiting or fradulently altering or defacing ballot papers, or supplying ballot papers to any person other than the legitimate voter, putting into any ballot box a ballot not authorized by law, and a variety of cases of the same character. The fine to be imposed was not to exceed $1,000. The imprisonment was to be for any term less than two years. That is as far as ballots were concerned. There were provisions made in regard to the custody of the ballot boxes; provisions for the maintaining of secrecy, severe punishments being provided in case of personation, which was to be punished by a fine not exceeding $200 and a term of imprisonment not exceeding six months. If a candidate was convicted of having taken part in the crime of personation, he shall be disqualified from being a candidate at that election. Then strangers were not allowed to enter the polling district armed. Entertainments were forbidden, ribbons and flags were not allowed, taverns were to be closed, and so on. Now, the definitions of bribery, I believe, are much the same. I need not read them all, but they are under section 92. I compared some of them, and I find that they are word for word with this. Some changes have taken place no doubt in other clauses, but the majority of the clauses—and they are very full, extending over a number of pages —provide the most ample remedies and punishments for parties who are in any way guilty of bribery or impersonation or interfering with a pure election. I think, therefore, the hon. gentleman, was not justified in ascribing the frauds which have been practised, and of which he gave only one illustration, that of London—I say that he was not justified in the criticism that he made after the course pursued by the government. I am quite as free to condemn what occurred in London as any one. No one could defend it, but you must remember the environments. With reference to all this bribery, it is strange to say that in the statements made by the parties, four-fifths of them declaed that they were going to vote for Hyman anyway, so that it did not materially affect the result. Mr. Hyman was elected by a majority of over 400, or in the neighbourhood of 400. No such number as that, nor one-half, nor one-fourth of that number have been shown to be bribed. It was not shown by the evidence that Hyman was cognizant of it. It must have been known to the London people, and why did they not file a protest and contest the election and then the whole matter would have been brought out squarely and the trial judges could have disfranchised those voters who were found guilty of accepting a bribe? There was the opportunity. The Conservatives did not do it. Why did they not do it? The only conclusion one reaches is that they were just as bad themselves if not worse. By common consent nothing was said about it. The environment of London had not a very good record in the past. I do not propose to go into it. I do not propose to refer to it at all. It is not a matter for this Chamber, but no one will deny the statement I make that it was not the first time that charges of corruption had been made with reference to London elections. The hon. gentleman spoke about ballot switching and talked about it existing everywhere. He did not define where everywhere was. It is very well known where it began. It was when Mr. Birmingham sent Freeborn up to Manitoba in 1896. The evidence all came out in the courts. It was well known there that he went around and instructed parties at the different polls how they were to switch the ballots. That was the first time we ever heard of ballot switching.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—He was a good man in North Bruce.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not know about that. My hon. friend can tell us about it. But there is the fact that it was practised on a large scale and that it came before the court. At least one member was unseated on the evidence disclosed in Manitoba. So that I think that the hon. gentleman was not justified in the extreme language in which he indulged and in which I would be sorry to follow him, giving us no positive evidence, simply generalities, expecting everybody to believe the statements he made. According to his view the majority of the Liberal party were elected just the same way. I think the hon. gentleman could not be sustained even by his own friends in the extreme statement that he made on that point to the House last night. The hon. gentleman said that he did not believe it himself. I do not think it is dignified to make a statement of that kind in this Chamber unless they have a fair and honest basis. There are many gentlemen who have vivid recollections of fraud having been practised on them by the Conservative party. I think there are many sitting in this Chamber to-day in that position. I have heard reference to it in the past. Perhaps if these hon. gentlemen are invited to speak they will be able to throw some light upon what frauds have been perpetrated in the past. If I choose to go into that sort of work I could give the House a great many instances that would rather startle hon. members. My recollection goes back a very long time. My first remembrance of elections is when an election occupied a week. Then there was but one polling place, and the stronger side carried the day; when each side had a house open, and when men hung around and drank for three days in the week at the expense of one candidate and for the other three days at the expense of the other candidate. Nothing but debauchery during the whole period. Then the next change was the creating of a number of polling divisions. Then came the law reducing the time to two days. In my recollection the voting extended for two days—open voting. I will not say what occurred upon such occasions; I could throw some considerable light upon the subject if I wished to go into it, but I do not choose to do so. At that time the contested elections were decided by a committee of the House and not by the courts. There were pannels formed, and when a committee was chosen it was two and two, two from the Liberals and two from the Conservatives. The chairman was selected by ballot, and a number of the leading lawyers in the House were put on this pannel, perhaps four or five or six, and the name of the chairman was drawn. When his name was drawn it went around the House at once that so-and-so would be unseated, or so-and-so would be confirmed in his seat, depending entirely on the choice of the chairman. That was the condition of things at that time. I was on the chairman's pannel and know something about it. I say for myself that I did not follow the rule in vogue at that time. As to the conditions of the trials in those days, it was a perfect farce. I will just mention one case There was an election of three members in the city of Quebec in 1857. They were elected illegally by names being added on the voters' list. It was notorious and it was not denied. The committee was chosen and it so happened that a friend of the member was chosen as chairman. The inquiry went on year after year, session after session, until the very last session of that parliament, and when the guns were being fired for prorogation the committee brought in a report unseating the member. That was an illustration of the methods that were pursued in those days. That is an absolute fact—just as true as I stand here. I know all about it. That was a condition of things which the Liberals at all events endeavoured to mend. They did their part, not but what the Conservatives did the same. I am willing to give tribute to both sides for the various changes that I could enumerate from the earliest period to the present time, but I do say that a large part of the credit in reference to the ballot system is due to the Bill drawn up in 1874 by the government of which I was a member. Any hon. gentleman who will take the trouble to look at chapter 9 of the Dominion Elections Act of 1874 will find confirmation of the statement that I have made that the first substantial attempt that was made to secure pure elections, and to exclude bribery, was made by the Mackenzie administration in 1874. I do not know that I will pursue that subject any further than to say I shall always be glad, and I am quite sure the members of this government will always be glad to receive any suggestion that will tend in any way to improve the election law. This House will have an opportunity of passing on it, and a Bill will come before the House and will be submitted, no doubt, to a committee on both sides, and if the law can be improved in any way, I have no doubt the leading members on both sides will cordially support each other in bringing about that result. I have, perhaps, somewhat advanced views on that subject. I believe in compulsory voting. I believe that would have a good effect. There are a large number of men who on occasions of elections hold back and wont vote, hoping to be bribed by one side or the other. I would make it compulsory that every man should go to the poll and drop in a ballot. It may be a blank ballot. He need not sign for Smith or Brown unless he wishes to, but it is due to the community that he as a citizen should take his part in the administration of the laws of the country, and I supported that proposition thirty odd years ago. It was first brought up by the late Mr. Bethune in the Ontario Legislature in 1873 or 1874. I think it would be a move in the right direction.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Might I ask the hon. gentlemen if that is to be one of the provisions of the new law ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, I do not know that it is. I do not think the government have considered it. I have perhaps myself sometimes mentioned it as my own view, but it has not been adopted. I shall be glad if it is adopted, and if it is not adopted in the other House I shall be glad to see this House adopt it, because I am convinced it will be a move in the right direction. Then I should not allow any man to be a deputy returning officer or clerk at an election unless he is a resident in the locality. If he be a freeholder or householder so much the better. He should not be an outsider but should be a man known to the people who come up to vote, a man occupying some responsible position, in order that there might be some security that he would discharge the duty imposed upon him. There are several other suggestions I may make at the right time, but I throw these out in order that hon. gentlemen may have an opportunity of thinking it over, and I shall be glad of any advice or assistance that can be given in the way of perfecting and improving our system of securing pure elections. From the review I have given, we must all admit that a very great improvement has been made, in the election law—that the method of securing fair and pure elections has been enormously advanced. Unfortunately bribery is a most difficult element to combat. The tendency of the age is for the acquisition of money. Wealth seems to be an ideal point that all are seeking to attain. Naturally those who have not it seek to obtain it in ways that oftentimes are not justifiable. Possibly influences across the line have something to do with it. I notice that Mr. Hearst admits having spent over $260,000—over a quarter of a million, in the contest for Governor of the State of New York. So that it is an extremely difficult poblem to check bribery. I think it is manifestly unfair for the hon. gentleman to hold the government in any way responsible. They have not the execution of those laws. If any of the cases to which the hon. gentleman adverted had come under the purview of the courts, something would have been accomplished, because the briber would have been disfranchised, and the court could report anybody found guilty of crime to the House and due punishment would have been awarded, but it was allowed to go. An inquiry was made for political purposes. The man who started it was a Liberal. He professed to have expended seven or eight hundred dollars of his own money, and demanded from Mr. Hyman's committee payment of this amount and something more. The committee declined to be blackmailed, and he warned them what the consequence would be. They never dreamed that he could make such a disclosure, or that there was such a disclosure to be made. I am told—I do not make the statement on my own authority—that the Conservative party paid this man a considerable sum, a good deal more than he could get from the other side, for the information which he subsequently gave as to the men who had been bribed.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If the hon. gentleman had read the evidence carefully, he would have found that that was positively denied.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is a gentleman present who can substantiate it. I do not know that I have any observations to make on the controversy existing between Newfoundland and the United States. I think it was rather unfortunate to drag it into this Chamber, because the Chamber was not in possession of all the facts. The hon. gentleman assumed that the British government were not warranted in giving permission for the present season only to the United States fishermen to fish in the waters that were referred to in the controversy. Now I have looked very carefully over the points in issue and I think the British government made only one mistake, and that was in allowing one of the terms, namely that the United States fishermen were to be permitted the use of purse seines, because that was against the law of Newfoundland and of Canada. Canada was in a measure a party to the arrangement, because it refers to those portions of Newfoundland that were mentioned in the treaty of 1818, in which United States fishermen were given the same rights as Newfoundland fishermen possessed. There was no qualification to that. In reference to the points that were named, whatever rights the Newfoundland fishermen had, the United States fishermen had under the treaty of 1818. That also covers parts of Canada—the Magdalen Islands and the Labrador coast. We made no protest, but it became evident before anything had been done that the United States discovered a mistake had been made, because the fishermen agreed at once of their own motion apparently, but no doubt under the influence of the United States government, not to avail themselves of the permission to use purse seines because the use of purse seines is contrary to the laws both of Canada and of Newfoundland. But, outside of that, I do not think that the observations made by my hon. friend were quite justified without a fuller knowledge of the facts. The treaty of 1818 has been a good deal commented upon. The United States is endeavouring to get away from it. It has never been repealed, although they maintain that tacitly it has been revoked. The facts will not bear out that contention. It was a pretty hard treaty no doubt. It was made at the cannon's mouth. The United States took advantage of the condition of Great Britain in the war with Napoleon, and made war on Canada from 1812 to 1815. This treaty came after Great Britain was free from the complications which had existed in Europe—free to impose terms on the United States which she did. As hon. gentlemen know, the United States fishermen are allowed to enter Canadian ports only for four purposes, for shelter, for wood, for water, and for repairs. Modifications have been made of our own motion by license from time to time, and of course that treaty has not always been enforced because it was held in abeyance during the years from 1856 to 1866. Also for a time while the fisheries clauses of the Washington treaty were in force, but at other times it has been enforced by Canada, not perhaps to the hilt, not to the full extent, because there has been a tendency rather to modify than to avail ourselves of the extreme rights conferred upon this country under that treaty.

Perhaps I have spoken longer than I intended. There is very much more that might be said in answer to my hon. friend, I have no doubt that some of those gentlemen who listened to him will remind him of incidents in the history of the Conservative party which perhaps were not any more creditable than those which occurred in London.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I fully expected that some hon. gentleman on the other side of the House would have thought it worth while to at least make some reply to the speech that has been delivered by the leader of the Senate. He has fairly well answered a number of the points that were presented by the leader of the opposition, and certainly we should give some extended consideration to the contents of the speech from the Throne. We are here for that purpose, and it is our duty to criticise as well as to command. I shall endeavour to give some little attention to the address that was delivered by the leader of the opposition. In the first place we can all agree upon one point—that is we rejoice unitedly upon the prosperity of the country. As true-hearted Canadians, whether we are Grits or Tories, we must certainly rejoice at the prosperous condition of things generally throughout this country. I am quite prepared to admit that Canada is not exceptional in this, because we know that prosperity prevails in other countries as well as in our own. We are glad to know that, but we are glad also to know that when prosperity does prevail we reap a fair share of it and that our country is progressing rapidly. Years ago if any person had spoken of a city such as Rossland or Cobalt in any of those places that are rapidly growing to be populous centres, he would virtually have been laughed at. Nobody every thought that in those rocky romantic districts, removed such a distance from civilization, we would have within a few years the very desirable development that has taken place. We rejoice to see it and hope earnestly that it will continue. We rejoice to know that an increased amount of valuable minerals is taken out of our mines every year, and by and by we hope to be able in that industry to compete with our neighbours to the south. We know how they have enriched their country by the development of their mining industry. In connection with this matter I regret to think that almost the entire output of our mines is exported to the United Sates. I should like to see smelters established in Canada and a large refinery for the development of our mineral wealth. I hope the day is not far distant when we will possess something of that kind. Last year we exported to the United States over $28,000,000 worth of minerals in their raw state. Labour is expended upon those minerals in refining them, and in that way our neighbours make the product of our mines of greater value than the price paid for them. No doubt they yield a very large increase in value by the amount expended upon them for labour. I should like to see refineries established here in order that our ores may be smelted and our metals coined in Canada.

A good deal was said by the leader of the opposition on the subject of the tariff. I am glad to know that there is not such a vast difference between us all on that question. Years ago, when the Mackenzie government were in power, we had a tariff for revenue which was prudently and carefully administered. After the change of government, we had an excessive dose of protection. I do not say that protection, if properly applied, is bad under certain conditions. The fact is that in the present state of affairs we cannot possibly carry on the administration of this country without a certain measure of protection to our manufacturing institutions. If we are to grow to be a country at all we must certainly grow along four or five lines. Agriculture is the leading industry. Next to that comes mining which has been largely developed. Then comes lumbering, then manufacturing, and our fishing industries. All these different industries must be encouraged in their development if we are to grow and prosper as a country, and in order to do that we must see that they get a fair opportunity to make headway against the competition to which they would otherwise be subjected by the country to the south of us. The United States have intentionally struck at Canada in every move they have made with their tariff. They commenced years ago by passing the McKinley Bill. After it had been in force for some time it was modified after Cleveland came into power, and for a number of years Canadian commodities entering the United States were not subjected to the extreme restrictions that had been placed upon them before. The tariff was modified a little, not very much, but after all it was a move in the direction of giving us some access at least to their market. Afterwards, when the Cleveland administration was turned out of power and the Republicans succeeded to office, they not only re-enacted the McKinley Bill but made its provisions even more stringent under the Dingley Bill. The result was to shut everything out of their country that they could possibly keep out, down to an egg or a load of straw. They would not allow anything to enter their markets from Canada that they could produce themselves. I have no doubt the intention was in taking a course of that kind to eventually force Canada to whine for annexation—they expected that the people of this country would proceed to Washington and go down on their knees and beg for some concession whereby we might have an interchange of trade with them. Instead of doing that, the Canadian government took another course. They perfected and adopted a system of cold storage whereby the perishable products of this country could be taken across the Atlantic in as perfect a condition as when they were shipped. They arranged for refrigerator cars which received the cheese and butter and other perishable commodities at the doors of the different factories, and conveyed them to the sea-board where they were transferred to the Atlantic steamers, and taken across the Atlantic and laid before the English consumer in as perfect a condition as when they left the place of production. By sending home commercial agents and endeavouring to create a demand on the part of the English consumer of the Canadian commodities, we have become independent altogether of the United States. We have now established a condition of things that is completely satisfactory to the producers of this country and we can afford to live independent of Uncle Sam. He can pass his Dingley Bills and his McKinley Bills, but we Canadians will forge ahead on our own course, and if our affairs are carefully and economically handled develop this Dominion into an important industrial country and eventually become very formidable competitors in many lines with our neighbours in the markets on the other side of the Atlantic. We do not find fault with the United States for having pursued the course which they thought best in their own interest. They had a perfect right to do so, but they are beginning now to talk of better trade relations with Canada. Some of the cities and towns and districts in the United States have commenced to move in that direction. They are becoming very large manufacturers and exporters of manufactured products and they want more extended markets. They want to reach desirable places of consumption, and no doubt Canada being one of their largest customers—and I am sorry to say it—they want to make better arrangements with us to extend their trade here. Well, if they want to do more trade with Canada they have the means in their own hands. Let them take down their tariff barrier and show a willingness to meet Canada on fair ground, but they must take that step before any improvement can be effected. Their tariff against us is something like 48⅔ while our tariff against them is only about 24.83. If they are disposed to reduce their tariff and meet us on a fair footing we might be disposed to consider the matter, but it would be folly for us to interfere in any way with the advantageous conditions we have in the British market at the present time. We cannot forget the events of the past. We had a reciprocity treaty with the United States from 1854 to 1856. Our neighbours abrogated that treaty. We do not know, if we should abandon our desirable position in the British market in order to increase our trade with our neighbour across the border, how soon they might come to the same conclusion they reached in 1866 and give notice to abrogate any treaty we might enter into, and we would be back again to where we were 40 years ago. We would have to do all the work again that the present government has done in perfecting our arrangements in the English market and in getting us the desirable conditions that now exist. I think we had better keep on the even tenor of our way, and we cannot do that unless we meet our neighbours along the same lines as they meet us. I do not want the high protective tariff they have in the United States. They have injured their own people by that tariff, but I do want to see a tariff in Canada so adjusted that it will encourage every industry the raw material of which is found here and the conditions for prosecuting it are favourable. I want to see every such industry get a fair opportunity of succeeding. It should be protected against competition that would ruin it. We will never grow to be a country unless we do that. The difference between the tariff in force to-day and the tariff in force in 1896 is simply this : the latter was a tariff that aimed first at protecting every manufacturing institution; the question of revenue was a secondary consideration. The tariff that is in force to-day, and under which we have made such admirable progress, is aimed at raising a revenue sufficient to meet the demands upon the Dominion treasury, and so adjust it as to give incidental advantage to industries that we believe should exist and prosper in Canada. We do not want to go back to the condition of things we had under the old tariff. To illustrate how it was framed, protection was given to the manufacture of stoneware and crockery of all kinds in this country. We had an establishment down on the banks of the Richelieu where they undertook to manufacture ordinary stoneware. Where did they get the sand? They had to bring it from the United States. Where did they get the clay ? They had to bring it from the United States. We had nothing in Canada but the water and a heavy duty was imposed on the people of this country in order to establish an industry of that kind. That is carrying protection to an excess altogether. We do not want that kind of protection, but we do want a protection that will enable us to promote industries which will develop and use the raw material in the country, where we have reason to believe that the attempt will be successful. We can come together Grits or Tories as loyal Canadians and support a tariff that will bring about such a result, and I believe it will bring it. We are driven by necessity to do it. We cannot afford to allow our neighbours to slaughter their products in our market and ruin our whole industrial development. No matter how desirable it might be to cheapen the ordinary articles of every-day life for our consumers in Canada, it would not be wise to make Canada a slaughter market. I know our friends in the west are anxious to get their supplies at the lowest possible prices, but while that is desirable, we must look after those institutions that we would like to see prosperous. I am glad to say most of our institutions are prospering at the present time, though the woollen factories complain of being injured under the British preference. I hope some change will be made to give these people an opportunity of improving their condition.

A good deal has been said about our election law. We had quite a tirade or criticism last night from the leader of the opposition, regarding the wickedness of the Reform party, and the switching of ballots and all that kind of thing. I frankly admit that such evils should be abolished. I deplore the fact that switching ballots and corrupt practices at elections were ever introduced in Canada, but in looking over the field we have crossed—and a good many of us had extended political experience—we cannot help remembering what has taken place in the past. The Reform party was subjected to ballot switching, and ballot stuffing for years and years before we knew that such an abominable, wicked system was in practice at all. We could not understand why in many cases, constituencies which were looked upon as safe to the Reform party returned Conservative candidates. I am satisfied that corrupt practices prevailed in the constituency I had the honour of representing for nineteen years—that ballot switching in some cases was resorted to for the purpose of defeating me, but notwithstanding that I fortunately was successful in five successive elections. Reference has been made to Macdonald, Manitoba. The Conservative party overdid the work there. In 1896 they returned their candidate by a majority of over 350. The Reform party could not understand how that happened. They were amazed at such a result, but Dr. Rutherford, the defeated candidate, was rather inclined to accept the verdict. He could not understand how polling subdivisions which had been counted on to give large majorities for him gave majorities the other way. I do not know that the truth would have ever been found out had not Mr. Freeborn, before he left Manitoba, when in Winnipeg, let the cat out of the bag. He got a little more in him than he could carry with prudence, and while in that state said that the Reformers in the constituency of Macdonald had got it in the neck ; they would never find out how or in what way, but they got it all the same. After that Dr. Rutherford made up his mind that he would test the whole thing. He sent out an invitation to every elector in a polling subdivision who had promised to cast his ballot for him to meet him at a central place in that polling subdivision. They came in forty-five or forty-seven men, and all swore that they had marked their ballot for Dr. Rutherford, and when the ballots were counted, only 17 were found in the box marked for Rutherford. There was a case of ballot switching. For whom was that done ? For the Conservative candidate in Macdonald. There was a case where ballots were switched and the mischievous work done. Nobody was suspicious. How did it come that Mr. Freeborn went there to do that work ? It appears that Nat Boyd was under the impression that he could not be elected unless there was some such move, and he telegraphed down to Birmingham, the chief organizer of the Conservative party, that he wanted some man, wanted an assistant, wanted to know if they could not send him a man there who would devise some method by which he could be elected.

He telegraphed back that he would send Freeborn, and he said he was a good man in North Bruce; he had accomplished a lot of work there. Well, we never found out about North Bruce. We did not know anything about it. He went to Winnipeg, but he overdid it—at least he was found out. Notwithstanding this fact the hon. leader of the opposition holds up his hands in holy horror at what has happened in London, as if the practice was new and the Reform party alone responsible; that they were the guilty party and that they should take the blame for the whole thing. I regret very much that the Reform party ever stole the patent of our hon. friends in the matter which he speaks about. They controlled that business for years and years, and we knew nothing about it, and I am ashamed to think that the Reform party ever did use the same weapons as were used against us, although when two men get into a quarrel, and after the quarrel starts, if one finds that the other has a pair of steel knuckles on his hand, if he has a pair in his pocket he will very likely put them on, or when a fight starts one draws a club from behind and begins pelting his opponent, the probabilities are that if the other fellow can get a club he will use it too. That is natural in a fight. Both parties have adopted ballot switching, unfortunately. In the case of London I do not believe from all the evidence I have seen, that Hyman was a party to the wrong doing that was practised there. I have not the slightest doubt that perhaps his friends, in a feeling of enthusiasm and a desire to see him elected, resorted to the means that were adopted, and they borrowed the weapons of their opponents and used them. It is a pity they ever did it. I have no doubt whatever that Hyman would have been elected in any event, but after all they did it. Now let us pass a law which will strike at the root of all these things. Let us put a stop to this ballot switching and ballot stuffing. Surely the legal ability of this country, the men who have for years and years been investigationg these cases, inquiring into the evil and ascertaining how it was done, can get to work and pass a law that will completely stop this abominable business and permit the electors of this country to record their votes without ballot switching or ballot box stuffing. I condemn any man who has been guilty of it. I care not what his political creed or affiliations may be. We want no more of it, and I hope this session the Bill that will be presented to us will be so framed that it will put an absolute stop to this kind of thing. I entirely agree with the hon. Secretary of State when he said that he was in favour of compulsory voting. I am also in favour of it. I think a law should be enacted that every man who chooses to be an elector must go to the poll and record his vote. I would give him the choice, because we have some men that have conscientious scruples about voting at all. I would give those men an opportunity when the assessor goes around to their houses of deciding. The assessor would say to the man: 'Mr. Brown, I want to know if you wish to be a voter at the Dominion election? If he desires to be entered on the roll as an elector for the Dominion election, I would make it imperative that he must record his vote. I would also give him an opportunity of saying whether he would be an elector at the local election or not. If he said yes, I would then make him understand that he has to record his vote, and if he refuses to go and record his vote, of his own free will, I would disfranchise him for seven years, so that he could not have a vote. I would give him an opportunity, however, if the condition of his health was such that he could not attend, to file a certificate from a properly licensed physician, setting forth the fact that he was in a condition of health that it was impossible, or that it would be dangerous for him to go to the poll. I would further provide that for such a certificate the doctor would be entitled to a respectable fee, so that the elector would go to the poll and record his vote. I think it would be a good thing if we passed a law of that kind, because a great many of the evils that we have are due to the fact that men hang behind. They wont go to the polls. You have to drive them, you have to carry them, and when you get them there they have to be coaxed in order to get them to record their vote. Now, if it were compulsory, so that they would have to record their vote or lose their franchise, I think it would be a step in the right direction. I do not know that it is necessary that I should refer to any more cases of wrong doing, of which our hon. friends opposite were guilty during the 18 years during which they were occupying the Treasury benches, but if it were necessary I could refer you to many. In the case of the Haldimand election, a gentleman was clearly cheated out of his seat. Mr. Coulter, who is now a judge, ran against Dr. Montague. We know perfectly well that in the investigation that took place it was clearly shown that the grossest rascality that could be practised was practised in that election. In one place it was proven that the deputy returning officer had opened the poll at half past 8 in the morning, and when the scrutineer on behalf of Mr. Coulter arrived at the place a few minutes before 9, expecting to be sworn in as scrutineer, the poll had been open half an hour and there were thirteen ballots in the box and no scrutineer for Mr. Coulter. We know that because it was proved in the investigation that that man, when his watch showed 5 o'clock in the afternoon closed the polling subdivision and drove 5 miles himself into another constituency to record his own vote, and he was there before the poll was closed. When the investigation took place, the judges pronounced him and others guilty of the grossest corruption, and one man was deprived of his franchise for some seven years. What was done with him? He could not go into Haldimand again when another election was held, because if he had done so he would have unseated Dr. Montague if he took part in the election. But the government of the day actually appointed that man to go down to Haldimand and arrange terms with the Indians upon which they could become the owners of the properties on which they lived. They gave him $10 a day and expenses, mind you, a man that had been disqualified by the courts, a man that had been pronounced as guilty of the most abominable political wickedness that any man could be charged with, and the courts deprived him of his franchise for seven years, yet the government sent him down there to do that work when that election was going on. If you will show me a single case in which the present government has been guilty of a practice of that kind, of taking an abominably corrupt character and putting him into an important official position and paying him $10 a day and expenses, I will admit it, but I do not believe there is one single instance where it has been done. I said something with regard to our relation with the United States. A short time ago I was looking over the figures of the business that we had done in the last year with England and the business that we have done with our neighbours to the south. I find that last year we imported of dutiable goods from Great Britain $45,099,527. and I find that we imported of free goods $15,-243,177, or a little over $60,000,000 all together. Now, from the United States we imported dutiable goods, $78,797,440; of free goods we imported $73,634,186. The larger portion of the free goods is, no doubt, corn and coal. We of course under present conditions have to take a large percentage of our coal from the United States, and I presume that will continue for many years, and perhaps it is hard to tell how long. We have magnificent coal fields in Canada of which we are very proud, but unfortunately they are largely in the east or largely in the west, and in the central portion of this Dominion we are nearer to the coal fields of the United States than we are to our own, and over there they are blessed with a profuse supply of coal. They have coal mines in no less than 22 states all together. We have to take our supply of coal from there, and we cannot very well avoid it; therefore they need not thank us for it, because it is something that we have to get from them for our own convenience. Of course we cannot reduce that item, but there are many things that we can reduce. There are a great many manufactured goods which we are taking from the United States which we hope in the course of a few years we will produce ourselves, and we hope to protect those industries perhaps to a better extent than we have yet done in the articles they are now producing. I was coming from Chicago not very long ago, and in the Canadian Pacific Railway sleeping car I met a gentleman who was also travelling east from Chicago. I got into conversation with him with regard to business. He said that he was in the boot and shoe business away down east some place near Boston. He said that their annual output of boots and shoes was about a million a year. During the last year they had manufactured their ordinary output, a million; that owing to the competition they were now meeting with in Chicago and in St. Louis, which were becoming very large centres for the manufacture of boots and shoes, his own firm had been left at the end of the season with about $200,000 worth of boots and shoes on hand. They made up their minds that they must get rid of them in some way. He said that they had sent about $50,000 worth to South America. They sent $75,000 worth to Canada, and they sent an equal amount to England. They auctioned these consignments off in these different markets and thereby suffered a net loss of over 10 per cent upon the entire shipment, or a net loss of about $20,000 on the $200,000 worth of stock. But they sold over $800,000 worth at home, and on them they had a clean profit of 10 per cent, which gave them $80,-000, and after deducting the $20,000 loss they had $60,000 of a net profit on a plant and means invested of $500,000, or 12 per cent upon their capital. There was a good profit after all. I said to him, 'would it not be better for you to cut down your output to what you could sell at home rather than run the risk of having to sacrifice.' He said they were hoping for a larger maket; they had to keep their factory running; and if the men were not employed all the time, if they were turned off for a month or two, they could not be picked up again; they would stray away to other institutions, and when they were wanted they could not be got, and in order to keep the factories running they had to manufacture this large quantity and do the best they could with the output. Would it be a wise thing for us to tolerate the principal boot and shoe manufacturers of the United States sending the fag end of their output into Canada, and slaughtering it on our market, desirable as it may be to give people cheap boots and shoes? Is it desirable that we should facilitate that kind of things? I do not think it is. I think it is better that we should endeavour to have those things manufactured among ourselves, and not permit our neighbours to send their goods here and ruin our institutions.

I was also looking over our mineral output, which we were speaking of a short time ago, and I am very glad to think it has grown to the proportions it has, and it is increasing every year; but I was sorry, as I said, to notice that of all the output of our mines only $991,874 worth went to Great Britain, and $28,704,461 went to the United States. The United States takes from us altogether about $70,426,765 worth of produce. We take from them $152,000,000 or something over that, so that out of that $70,000,000 you have to deduct $28,000,000 of minerals that are sent over there. That reduces our shipments to them in other lines to about $42,000,000, while we get from them altogether about $152,000,000. I should like to see a change. A great many people do not take much stock in the balance of trade. Well, hon. gentlemen, in my silliness perhaps, because I cannot see things as more intelligent men see them, or claim to see them, I take considerable stock in the balance of trade. I prefer to see the balance of trade in Canada's favour rather than in favour of the United States. I am prepared to copy to some extent the experience of the United States. There are some things I wish we could copy. With all their high tariff there is no country on the face of the earth that has made the enormous developments that have been made in the United States in the last fifteen or twenty years. Fifteen years ago the money in circulation in the United States was $1,554,000,000. On the first of this present month, the money in circulation in the United States was $2,886,000,000, or very nearly double the circulation of money in the United States within the last fifteen years. Within the last eight years the increased circulation of money in the United States has been over one thousand million, and inside of the last year, from November 1st, 1905 to November 1st, 1906 the increased circulation of money in the United States, was $213,000,000. Now there must be great progress in a country where the circulation of money has increased as rapidly as that. With all their protection they are progressing and prospering at a marvellous rate, and they believe in the balance of trade. They want to have the balance of trade in their own favour no matter which country they do business with, and they maintained that policy for many years. They have the balance of trade so far as Canada is concerned and so far as England is concerned. A few days ago, not two months ago, there were two steamers entered New York harbour, and those two steamers carried back to the United States $25,000,000 of United States securities that were on the English market. They are buying up all their securities that are in the foreign markets as rapidly as they can, and they are bringing them home to the United States. This shows where the wealth is. I say under that condition I I should like to have a little of the balance of trade in our favour, and I should like to see our tariff so adjusted, with the hope that we may after some time attain that condition. I know we are a young country, there is no doubt of that, and a largely increased expenditure from year to year may be looked for. If the government are true to the best interests of this country they must provide for these expansions. They would not be true as a government to the best interests of this country if they did not do so. It is right that they should provide it, and as long as the money is prudently and well spent—spent in a way that will tend to encourage the development of our industries, the better for the country and the more credit to them. We are undoubtedly on a rapid stride upward and onward. We hope it may continue. At the same time I would strongly urge that when we have such an enormous wave of prosperity as we are now enjoying, we should hold the reins tight. We should be careful, and look forward. We should keep a balance and a good sound substantial balance to the right side of the ledger. We should aim at reducing our expenses when reduction can be conveniently made. We should economise where economies can be effected. I am quite willing to accept that doctrine, and I am very anxious to impress upon the government that they should adopt that policy. On the other hand where the country's necessities have to be provided for, I must say that I commend the government for what they have expended in many lines. I think it is necessary. We must have railways. The country must be opened up. We must encourage the construction of those lines which are necessary to develop the country. All these things have to be carried on, and it is well that the government should encourage them, and I am glad to know that they are doing so. I simply rose to make a few remarks in reply to the hon. leader of the opposition. I thought he trampled a little roughly on the toes of the Reformers in his criticism of what he was disposed to call the wickedness of London. We join in regretting that anything of the kind ever took place, and we earnestly hope now, from the feeling exhibited on that side of the House, from the admissions made by the minister, the frank statement made by the hon. Secretary of State, that we have reached a condition when the heads of the wisest of our politicians in this country will be put together, and that they will pass a law that will prevent the repetition of such things, that they will not tolerate the existence of doings, which have been a disgrace to this country, which would ruin the liberties of a righteous people and bring us down to a position which would be discreditable to ourselves and unworthy of true Canadians and men that claim to inherit the best traditions of the British nation.

Hon. Mr. COFFEY—At the risk of undue reiteration, I too wish to say that it is pleasant to note that Canada's onward march on the road of prosperity still continues. We may divide on many lines. We may belong to different races and creeds and colours, but the whole people of this favoured country wear the sunny smile which betokens happiness and prosperity and a trusting faith in a future fraught with promise the like of which has seldom been the portion of any other section of the world.

The people of Canada have an abiding faith in their rich inheritance. To the world it has been proclaimed, and the echo comes in the shape of brain and brawn which will help materially to lay the foundations of this magnificent temple of freedom and happiness broad and deep and strong.

We may rejoice in the newer Canada. We may feel proud on beholding now the splendid proportions of the Canada which was in its cradle ten years ago. Rapid indeed has been its growth and strength and power and promise are its attributes. It has been the custom of some to attribute this most gratifying condition to Providence, to chance, or to conditions beyond the ken of the far-seeing and beyond the control of man.

While we may very properly have an abiding faith in Providence, and it is meet we should be so disposed, the fact still remains that a country whose affairs are wisely administered will surely forge ahead of that which is handicapped because of a disposition to let the cobwebs remain and allow the spiders to pursue their avocation undisturbed.

The newer Canada—the Canada whose course has been steered surely in the channel of prosperity by the great mind of Quebec's favoured son—Sir Wilfrid Laurier—has become to us and to the universe a revelation to be admired.

The fame of Canada should be a sacred trust in the breast of every Canadian, and it is to be deplored that at times—few, but still too many—the party pen is dipped in gall, the party tongue is bitter, and statements are made which have little or no foundation in fact, but which, spread broadcast, sully the good repute of our country.

Far be from me to condone or extenuate wrong-doing, but let there be legitimate ground for complaint and action before complaint is made and action sought to be taken.

I have in mind now the many charges hurled at the leader and some of the members who sit at the right of the Speaker in the other House.

Attempts have been made to unearth that which does not exist and to magnify matters which are but mere trifles. This strenuous straining to make political points at the sacrifice of fair play is very much to be deplored. It is a waste of valuable time, and, what is worse, tends to cast odium upon honourable men who come to Ottawa standing high in the confidence of their constituents.

Last session became a fishing season. Some good men and true—and others—spent much of their time with rod and line and tempting bait, but when the close season came they found they had caught nothing. Is fault to be found with the fishers? Certainly not. They are engaged in a praiseworthy work, and the Liberal party wish them well in their enterprise. If there is wrong-doing—if men of the scheming mould, whose acquaintance with honesty is but casual, have designs on the strong-box in which is kept the money of the people—if men of the speculating pattern who by 'ways that are dark and tricks that are mean' feign would blossom out as millionaires by gambling with the inheritance of every Canadian, and become as bats in our legislative halls, let them be exposed to the bright glare of that Canadian patriotism which has the golden ring, and none will with greater alacrity proceed with the work of purifying our body politic than the members of the Liberal party, from its chief to the most humble in the rank and file.

Complaint is sometimes heard that our expenditures are too great and professions made many years ago in this connection are quoted against the government, but the fact is ignored that expenditure and expansion must necessarily march hand in hand.

Public buildings must be erected and those in existence must be enlarged to accommodate the greatly increased business of the country.

On every hand the action of the government is guided solely by those business principles which would be called into action by any enterprising manufacturer in the Dominion.

It will be remembered that some years ago it was the proud boast of the party now in opposition that many tall chimneys studded the land, and, for this evidence of prosperity, they justly claimed a meed of commendation and gratitude from the people of the country. But why deny the Liberal party the credit of quadrupling the number of chimneys great and small, from which arise that volume of smoke betokening a manufacturing life and activity of the booming, bustling variety. But it were next to impossible to hear words of praise from our political foemen. Some of them—those of the carping sort—will look at the work of the tall chimneys, and will tell you that the smoke is a nuisance. That is all.

One of the most momentous problems of the day is the settlement of differences between capital and labour; and it must be said for the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier that it has used its best energies to the purpose of bringing about better conditions between the workers and the employers. The disturbing elements are not now as numerous as they were some years ago, and let us hope that in the near future some system will be devised to settle at once and for ever all differences which may arise. Capital and labour are found to be not so far apart when the best minds on both sides approach one another with a sincere desire to make a treaty of peace.

Most praiseworthy action of the government is to be found in the earnest effort to protect our people from com[illegible] are oftentimes unreliable and frequently controlled by masters of finance who worship only at the shrine of the bag of gold. The sooner we rid the country of these men the better. Perhaps the most pitiable sight imaginable is to see the humble wage-earner swindled by these well groomed criminals, who, when want pinches the wi[illegible] and the orphan because of the remova[illegible] the husband and father by the hand of death, tells them that he will not carry out his obligations.

I feel hon. gentlemen, that I should make some references to a matter which has been very much discussed the past month—the election trial in Toronto. I think my honourable and honoured colleague from London—that venerable statesman who has given half a century to the service of his country and who wears unsullied the badge of honour bestowed upon him by his sovereign—will agree with me that London's fair fame has suffered in too great a degree because of a lack of intimate knowledge of all the facts connected with recent elections therein.

Let the constituency which is without election sins cast the first stone at London. It is patent to all that unlawful methods have for long, in a greater or less degree, been the rule, in too many sections of the country, when the tocsin of political warfare has been sounded.

It is to be regretted that the speech of the honourable the leader of the opposition was tinged with a party colour. His charges, however, against the Liberal party were of such a general character that it were difficult to know where to strike back. It would be unfortunate as well as unseemly were any considerable number of the honourable members of this House to resurrect and expose to view the work of over-zealous political workers in each constituency during the years that have gone by, but in justice to the Liberal party in London I feel bound to declare that he who holds that party responsible for the wrong doing so much ventilated and discussed in press and on platform during the past few months is one who is not cognizant of all the facts, and whose decision has been arrived at by examination only of the surface of the subject. In the province of Ontario, from 1867 to 1896 the active managers of the party now in opposition brought into requisition methods of political warfare which have to this day left a stain on public life. The hon. gentleman from Calgary saw fit to hold up for admiration and adulation the present government of Ontario. On this point I desire to meet him fairly and squarely. If I mistake not he wished to convey the impression that the machinery of justice up to a few years ago—during the long period of Liberal administration in that province—was tainted with partyism. The hon. gentleman has forgotten that during all those years the judges were men appointed from the ranks of the Conservative party—as a body most honourable men, but a few never shed their political mantle. Surely this fact was a powerful lever to safeguard the right of the Conservatives in the event of their being placed in jeopardy The party in power in Toronto at this day would not, I am sure, draw such high eulogium from the hon. member from Calgary had he had an opportunity of following the proceedings in the election trials recently held in Toronto's police court.

The police magistrate professed a desire to open the whole case as affecting both political parties. The counsel for the defence also wished to have this done, and requested that witnesses for the defence as well as those for the prosecution should have their expenses paid from London to Toronto. He challenged the Crown attorney to have this done in order that the wrong doing on both sides should be exposed to view. The Crown attorney would not consent without consulting the attorney general, but up to the present moment no decision in this point has been announced. Perhaps it is a fortunate circumstance that the glare of public opinion has been turned upon the city which I have the honour to represent in this House. The crime laid at its doors belongs to a small percentage of its electors—men whose political action enters the mart of trade or barter—men devoid of the nobility of citizenship—men who postpone thought of the execrable course they have mapped out for themselves—men whose greed for gain has obliterated those finer instincts which make for the glory and the honour and the welfare of the commonwealth. Am I too severe. I wish it could so be claimed. He who casts to the winds his electoral franchise—that badge of Canadian manhood which is our pride and our glory—deserves to be branded with the contempt of his fellow countrymen who value rectitude and whose words of patriotism come not from the teeth outwards.

I have faith in the people of London. Half a century of my life has been spent amongst them, and I hesitate not to declare that the vast majority of them are men sensitive of their reputations, whose love of country cannot be measured as a marketable commodity. The disgrace belongs but to a few, and to the few only let the stigma of electoral gambling be attached.

It may come to pass—and I sincerely trust it will—that London in the limelight will serve to impress upon our law makers the importance—nay, even the pressing necessity—of guarding with increased vigilance that receptacle in which has been registered the convictions of Canadian freemen as to how their country shall be governed.

The punishment for offenses in this regard should be swift and sure, and in accordance with the enormity of the offence, and enormous the offence truly is, for tampering with the ballot box will sooner or later lead to political chaos, which will have a most deleterious influence on almost every feature of our social, political and commercial life.

In this connection, honourable gentlemen, I desire to register my conviction, that the hon. the Minister of Public Works was in no way—even the most remote—a party to the scandalous irregularities of the last London election. In all that has transpired at the Toronto trial his name suffered not a blemish—and it has not been proved and cannot be proved—at least such is my belief—that the Hon. Charles S. Hyman represents but a minority of the voters of London. Even if the purchased votes were taken away from both candidates a considerable majority would still be registered for the sitting minister.

He has deemed it proper, however, to signify his determination to resign the seat; but those who know him well are not surprised thereat, for Mr. Hyman is not the man to retain a place at the Council Board of his country when there is even the faintest suspicion that he is not the choice of the majority of the unpurchasable voters of his native city. I trust he will again be the candidate, and that by a triumphant majority he will be sent back to Ottawa to continue his services as Minister of Public works, for it is of importance that we should retain in such a place a man of such splendid business capacity and one who has given us an administration, the honesty of which has never been called in question.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until 3 p.m. tomorrow.

THE COMMITTEE ON SELECTION.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved :

That pursuant to rule 77, the following senators : the Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell, K.C.M.G., the Hon. Messrs. Gibson, Lougheed, Béique, Miller, Power, Watson, Casgrain (de Lanaudière) and Ferguson, be appointed a committee of selection to nominate senators to serve on the several standing committees during the present session, and to report with all convenient speed the names of the senators so nominated.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Before this motion is carried, I should like for my own information to ask the mover of the resolution a few questions. The appointment of the Striking Committee of this House is a very important one, because they practically have the power of appointing all the committees of the Senate, and as those committees are very important to all parts of the country, we should see that the Striking Committee at least represents the whole of the people of this Dominion. To my mind a very important part of the business of this House is transacted by them. I should like to see that portion of the country from which I come properly represented on this Striking Committee. I have no objection at all to any of the names which appear in this motion, but it is a mistake to make the committee so small. I understand by the rules that the committee is restricted to nine members. Of course the larger provinces, Ontario and Quebec claim to be entitled to more representation on the committees than the other provinces, so I suppose it would be very difficult to apportion them to all the different provinces. But I find there are three representatives from Nova Scotia, two from Quebec, two from Ontario, one from Manitoba, none from Saskatchewan and none from British Columbia. If there are three representatives from the maritime provinces, I think we in the west should be entitled to three, inasmuch as we have four provinces against their three provinces. I contend that we are entitled to consideration in this matter. There are some committees which we in the west consider important, particularly the Railway Committee. We have new members lately come from the west, and I understand from the procedure which will no doubt be adopted by this Striking Committee, that a lot of those gentlemen will not be placed on the Railway Committee. I want to say for the benefit of the Striking Committee that I think these hon. members from the west should be placed on the Railway Committee for the reason that two-thirds of the present railway construction of the Dominion is being carried on in the western part of Canada. It is the greater Canada. I think our representatives should be on that committee, notwithstanding any old regulation or antiquated ideas hon. gentlemen may have to the contrary. The west is the greater Canada, and things are developing there all the time, and we are getting new ideas, and I hope we will be represented on the Railway Committee. As far as the Divorce Committee is concerned, nobody bothers his head very much about it.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—We will give that committee to Ontario.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—If my hon. friend will take the trouble to look at the proportion in the House of Commons, with nearly three times the membership of this House, he will find that the Striking Committee consists of five members in that chamber, as against nine members in this Chamber.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I do not think the reason given by my hon. friend is a very good one. This committee must consist of nine members because the principle is determined by our rules, and we are only complying with our rules when we appoint that number. If the rules of the House of Commons fix the number at five they cannot have more than five, and we cannot have more than nine. I think my hon. friend has made a point in saying that all the provinces which have become part of this Dominion should have one representative on that committee. I do not see why we should refuse that. They are all interested in the formation of the different committees, and I thnk it would be a good idea if we should adopt that principle and have one for each province. There are nine provinces, and that would give us a representative for each province.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There has never been heretofore a rule of that kind. The committee we are now appointing is a matter for the House to decide. It strikes me as a reasonably fair committee. The invariable practice in the past has been to put those who have had seats in this Chamber for the longest period on the Striking Committee. They are supposed to have a better knowledge of how the members should be distributed on the different committees than senators more recently apppointed.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I suppose that is the reason the hon. member is not on the committee himself.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There were too many who were anxious to get on the committee. I endeavoured to make a fair distribution and I think I have succeeded. It can hardly be contended that the smaller provinces are entitled to the same representation on the committee as the larger provinces. For instance, Prince Edward Island, with four senators, could hardly expect the same representation as Ontario or Quebec, each of which has twenty-four senators. I have conformed to the practice that has been followed in this Chamber, and I think the selection on the present occasion is based upon past usage. Of course it is for the House to change it if the majority see fit to do so.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—I notice there are no members of the government on the committee. It has been found a source of inconvenience often when no members of the government have been put on some of the committees. There should be a member of the government on this committee, at all events.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—On behalf of a certain element in this House I wish to say I cannot concur altogether in the remarks of the hon. Secretary of State that this course should be pursued because it is in accordance with past usage. If I understand the policy of the Liberal party, the aim is to have the usages of this Senate changed, if not physically, at least politically and legislatively. There are many younger members of this Senate who are not known to the older members, and whose usefulness has not yet been tested. The older members have never known us. They simply tell us, when we rise to speak in this House that we have no right to do so, that we are only in leading strings here. The situation has changed completely. We are the younger element, the advancing, progressive element, and I quite concur with the hon. senator from Prince Albert (Hon. Mr. Davis) that it is time to change the usages of the past if they can be improved. I quite agree with him that a change should be made in this instance. The vast interests of this country have been displaced. There was a time when the hon. leader of the government and the hon. ex-leader of the opposition had all their ambition and all their hearts centred in Quebec and Ontario; but of late years that situation has changed. The heart and sympathy of Canada to-day are in the west and when the hon. senator from Prince Albert appeals for representation on the committee, I agree with him, though I come from the east, because I am with the younger and more progressive element. I ask that fair-play be accorded to the younger members here. We have, for instance, a young member in the person of Senator McKay, from Montreal. He should be on the committee. The province of Quebec, owing to its large English population, should be represented on that committee. I have not asked the hon. gentleman if he would like to be appointed, but I think he is a fit and proper person to be on the committee. Even if the committee has been named in conformity with usage there is no reason why it should not be changed to-day. Canada has progressed and we must advance with it.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—I should like very much if the leaders on both sides would move their desks a little further towards the middle of the chamber, so that those of us who are seated some distance from them, may have an opportunity to hear what is going on.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Do I understand that the hon. Speaker has declared the motion agreed to ?

The SPEAKER—Yes.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Then the remarks of the hon. senator from Prince Edward Island are quite appropriate. I did not hear the announcement made.

Hon. GENTLEMEN—Order, order.

THE CANADA-MEXICO STEAMSHIP LINE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL rose to:

Call attention to the provisions of the articles of agreements entered into between the Minister of Trade and Commerce of the Dominion on behalf of His Majesty, and the Messrs. Elder-Dempsey & Company, of Liverpool, England, for the establishment of a line of steamers between Canada, Cuba and Mexico, and will inquire of the government why in the third clause of said articles of agreement provision is made prohibiting the Canadian subsidized steamers from taking cargo at Cuban ports for Canada?

He said : In calling the attention of the Senate to the contract entered into between the government and the Elder-Dempster Company, I wish to assure the Senate that it is not done from any spirit of opposition or fault-finding on account of the policy which the government has adopted in establishing a line between Canada, Cuba and Mexico. On the contrary, I am fully in accord with that policy, it being a continuation of the policy of the late government, but there is a provision in the contract which I should like to have explained. It will be found at the end of the third clause of the contract. The contract provides for the establishment of a line of steamers between Canada, Cuba and Mexico, starting during the season of open navigation from Montreal and calling at Charlottetown and Halifax and other intermediate ports until it reaches some Cuban port. Then it provides in addition to that that the government and department shall have power to extend the provisions of their contract so as to have the steamers, after leaving Cuba, proceed to Mexico. In case the contract is confined to the first portion to which I alluded, they are to pay a certain sum, I think $50,000 a year. Should the extension be agreed to, then it is to be $100,000. I will read the third clause and ask the government why vessels are prevented from taking on cargo at a Cuban port on the trip from Mexico to Canada. The third clause is as follows:

3. It is understood and agreed that at the option of the minister, the service, herein contracted for may be extended to the republic of Mexico, calling on all south bound voyages at the ports of Progresso, Coatzacoalcas, Vera Cruz and Tampico, with the option on the part of the contractors of calling at any of the said Mexican ports on the north bound voyages; and in case the service is so extended to Mexico the steamers may carry and land in Cuba on south bound voyages, cargo and passengers, and may take on board at Cuban ports both cargo and passengers for Mexico, and on all north bound voyages from Mexico may take on board cargo and passengers for any Cuban port, but shall not take cargo at Cuban ports for Canada.

The last part of the clause is what I desire to have explained by the government. I can understand very well a provision of that kind being insisted upon by Mexico, provided there was any space reserved for a cargo at a Cuban port which could be filled in Mexico. The object of the contract is to cultivate trade between Canada and Mexico and West Indian ports, but why a vessel which has the right to take passengers and cargo to a Cuban port should be prevented from taking on the products of Cuba for Canada I am unable to understand, and should like to have explained.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—This is a contract in which the Mexican government are interested jointly with ourselves. The Mexican government are to supply half of the subsidy and we are to supply the other half. So far as the government of Canada is concerned my hon. friend is perfectly right in supposing that we would have preferred to allow cargo to be taken both ways—to and from Cuba. But the Mexican government insisted, for reasons of their own, dreading competition, I suppose, from Cuba, that on the northward trip no cargo should be taken from Cuba as a condition on which their granting a subsidy of equal amount to our own would depend. The hon. gentleman will understand that we ourselves would be loath—and I presume he would be loath as well as myself—to susidize a line of steamers from Canada to Mexico which would have freedom to call at United States ports en route. That would be practically, to a considerable extent, subsidizing United States trade at our own expense, and the United States government, for similar considerations, although they yielded the point that we might call at Cuba on going to Mexico, declined to be a party to any contract unless we agreed that on the northward trip they should go from Mexico to some English or Canadian port, as the case might be. That is the reason why this clause was inserted.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—As I understand the contract, it does not make that provision. It permits the taking of a cargo and passengers at a Mexican port to Cuba, but it prevents the taking of a cargo at Cuba for Canada on its northern trip.

Hon. SIR RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Well, that was a provision insisted upon by the Mexican government. They declined to allow us to take up cargo at Cuba on the ground, I think, that they considered that Cuba was a competitor with them for the same class of trade that they designed to send to us. I think myself that they might as well have conceded the point, but as they were joint subsidizers with ourselves—they pay $50,000 and we pay $50,000—I was not in a position to contest that point too far.

EXPORT OF ALUMINUM.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE moved:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause a return to be laid before the Senate of aluminum exported for the years 1903, 1904, 1905 and to date, 1906, with values.

The motion was agreed to.

IMPORTS OF OXIDE OF ALUMINUM.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE moved:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause a return to be laid before the Senate of imports of oxide of aluminum for the years 1903, 1904, 1905, and to date, 1906, with values.

The motion was agreed to.

NATURALIZATION ACT, AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST READING.

Bill (A) An Act to amend the Naturalization Act was introduced and read the first time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It has been found desirable to pass an amendment to the law relating to naturalization. There are persons coming to the Northwest who have already been naturalized in other parts of the empire. It becomes necessary under the law that they shall be naturalized in Canada and the object of this amendment is to dispense with the three years residence, provided they have already had a residence of that number of years in other parts of the empire.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Is my hon. friend at liberty to say what parts of the empire the parties referred to come from?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, I am not. The only thing I say about it is that in other parts of the empire they have passed a similar law, and it has been found desirable that we should also make such a provision. They have a similar law in New Zealand where the parties had been part of the time I presume in Australia and part of the time in Canada and desired to be naturalized in New Zealand.

The Bill was read the first time.

REVISED STATUTES OF 1906 BILL.

FIRST READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT introduced Bill (B) An Act respecting the Revised Statutes of 1906 and to provide for the French version thereof. He said: When the Act of 1903, under which the commission for revising the statutes was organized was passed, there were one or two defects, one particularly, that no provision was made for the French version, and it was provided that the Act should come into operation on a proclamation. Now it is desired to amend it in the direction at all events of the French version, and the Act of 1903 is repealed in all important particulars with some slight changes, which can be shown when the Bill goes into committee. It is proposed to bring the law into operation on the 1st January, and therefore the Royal Assent will have to be given to any Bill passed by the two Houses before that date.

The Bill was read the first time.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT introduced Bill (C) An Act to amend the Criminal Code, 1892. He said: The society of which hon. gentlemen have probably heard, and of which some of you may know, the Children's Aid Society, the object of which is to preserve children who are growing up and likely to become criminals, to take such care of them, by surrounding them with certain environments and conditions, as will lead to better results, desire one or two changes in the law relating to the society, and also in that direction they desire to make corresponding changes in the Criminal Code. It is rather widening the powers, unless a judge or court may otherwise order, of giving control of delinquent boys, up to the age of sixteen, and girls up to the age of seventeen, to this society.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I am very glad indeed to see the government moving in this matter. I do not think there is a subject in this country upon which the people are more interested than this very question. The whole subject of dealing with criminals and crime is a very large one, and of late years there has been so much progress made in other parts of the world in the way of improving those who might drift into the criminal classes on account of not being taken care of, by a policy of prevention rather than one of cure, by a policy of education rather than by leaving to chance children who are exposed to risk from environment and are apt to fall, that the greatest good can be done to the community by providing for their care. In some countries a great deal has been done in the way of dealing with convicted criminals of the younger class by providing industrial and various homes of one kind and another to which children who have been convicted of crime may be sent. But this project which has been outlined by the hon. Secretary of State is a larger one than that, and seems to me to be calculated to do a great deal more good than can be done even by the industrial school or reformatory or institutions of that kind. It is not a new subject. It has already been adopted in many countries and in some of the states of the union with very great advantage. In other words it is giving an opportunity to the child whose surroundings are not good, whose environments will probably tend to a life of evil, by improving the environment and training up the child for a useful life instead of exposing it to the risk of becoming a criminal.

The Bill was read the first time.

CANADIAN COMMERCIAL TREATIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT introduced Bill (D) An Act to amend the Act respecting the commerical treaties affecting Canada. He said: After the Act was passed confirming the treaty with France, the same year, 1893, an Act was passed giving authority for commerical treaties. The idea was that foreign countries that had treaties with the mother country in which Canada was included, giving what is called the favoured nations power, should be entitled to the privileges set forth in the French treaty.

The words used were limited to that time. It read 'is' instead of 'hereafter,' and the object of this Bill is simply to add after the word 'is' the words 'or may hereafter be.' Attention was called to it first by the Customs Department and then by the Justice Department, that in the case of Japan we were not able to give them the advantages that we proposed under that treaty because it had reference to the existing treaty which was not included, of course, and this amendment to that Act simply adds the words 'may thereafter be agreed upon,' &c.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Has this reference to the French treaty or the Japan treaty?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There are treaties with countries in which what are called favoured nation clauses are introduced. These nations become entitled—should become entitled—to the advantages secured to France or any other country, since the time that they originally became entitled to it. Any country which has a treaty with Great Britain in which Canada is included, which makes provision for giving this country the favoured nation treatment should be entitled to the advantages which we gave to France, whereas under the existing commercial treaty it referred to that year only, and did not refer to the future at all. It is just amending it in that direction.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Has the language which this is designed to correct precluded the favoured nation treatment from being accorded to these countries since the passing of the treaty?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, strictly speaking.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What has been the custom of the government in that regard?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Take Japan; the rights which Japan would be supposed to enjoy if the commercial treaty drawn in 1893 had been specific as was intended, were not intended to apply to countries that had come in in the past, but it was intended to apply to countries that might come in in the future, and the Customs Department have been giving the advantages under that treaty to Japan without really the authority of law.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then the object of the change is to extend the provisions of the French treaty of Canada to Japan?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, that would be one thing. It makes no reference to Japan, but that is the object of it. Any country coming in afterwards would be entitled to the advantages of the French treaty if the treaty with England contained what is called the favoured nations clause.

The Bill was read the first time.

CANADIAN AND JAPANESE TREATY BILL.

FIRST READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT introduced Bill (E) An Act respecting a certain treaty between Canada and Japan. He said: On an opinion from the Department of Justice it was thought that the treaty with Japan deals with a number of articles that are set forth in our tariff, and therefore it was thought proper that the treaty made with Japan should be confirmed by parliament. In the treaty made with France, provision was made that it should be confirmed by parliament and the Bill was introduced in 1893 for that purpose. The object of the Bill, as I am now presenting it to the House, is to confirm the treaty with France by Act of parliament. It would have the advantage that it would be published in our statute-book. At present it is simply in booklet form, and not in convenient shape, and it is desirable that information should go broadcast, and the best possible way to secure that is by incorporating it in the volumes of our law. This Bill makes provision for confirming the treaty, and inserting the treaty word for word in schedule A.

The Bill was read the first time.

The Senate adjourned until 3 p.m., tomorrow.

The Joint Committee on the Printing of Parliament:—

The Honourable Messieurs: Bernier, Carling, Sir John, K.C.M.G., Choquette, Cloran, Coffey, DeVeber, Dobson, Domville, Ellis, Fiset, Frost, Legris, Macdonald (P.E.I.) Mackay (Alma), MacKeen, Merner, Riley, Ross (Halifax), Roy, Shehyn, Talbot.—21.

The Committee on Standing Orders:—

The Honourable Messieurs: Carling, Sir John, K.C.M.G., Choquette, Macdonald (P.E.I.), Macdonald (Victoria), McGregor, McKay (Truro), Tessier, Yeo, Young.—9.

The Committee on Banking and Commerce:—

The Honourable Messieurs: Bowell, Sir Mackenzie, K.C.M.G., Cartwright, Sir Richard, G. C.M.G., Casgrain (Windsor), Cox, Drummond, Sir George, K.C.M.G., Edwards, Ferguson, Forget, Gibson, Hingston, Sir William, Kt., Jaffray, Jones, Kerr, Lougheed, Macdonald (P. E.I.), Mackay (Alma), MacKeen, McDonald (Cape Breton), McGregor, McMillan, McMullen, McSweeney, Mitchell, Perley, Ross (Moosejaw), Scott, Sullivan, Thibaudeau (Rigaud), Thibaudeau (de la Vallière), Thompson, Wood, Yeo.—32.

The Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours:—

The Honourable Messieurs: Baird, Baker, Béique, Bolduc, Bostock, Bowell, Sir Mackenzie, K.C.M.G., Carling, Sir John, K.C.M.G., Casgrain (de Lanaudière), Choquette, Cox, David, Davis, DeVeber, Domville, Drummond, Sir George, K.C.M.G., Edwards, Ellis, Ferguson, Fiset, Forget, Frost, Gibson, Godbout, Jones, Kerr, King, Kirchhoffer, Landry, Lougheed, Lovitt, Macdonald (Victoria), Mackay (Alma), McDonald (Cape Breton), McHugh, McLay (Truro), McLaren, McMillan, McMullen, Mitchell, Ownes, Poirier, Power, Ross, (Moosejaw), Scott, Shehyn, Sullivan, Tessier, Thompson, Watson, Young.—50.

The Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills:—

The Honourable Messieurs: Baird, Béique, Bostock, Boucherville, de, C.M.G., Casgrain (Windsor), Cloran, David, Domville, Douglas, Edwards, Godbout, Hingston, Sir William, Kt., Kerr, Landry, Legris, McGregor, McHugh, McSweeney, Merner, Montplaisir, Ross (Halifax), Shehyn, Talbot, Thibaudeau (Rigaud), Thibaudeau (de la Vallière).—25.

The Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts:—

The Honourable Messieurs: Bernier, Bolduc, Casgrain (de Lanaudière), Fiset, Frost, Gibson, Jones, King, Landry, Lovitt, McDonald (Cape Breton), McLaren, Miller, Montplaisir, Ownes, Perley, Power, Riley, Robertson, Ross (Moosejaw), Thompson, Watson, Wilson, Wood, Yeo.—25.

The Committee on Debates and Reporting:—

The Honourable Messieurs: Béique, Coffey, Ellis, Ferguson, Mitchell, Poirier, Robertson, Roy, Talbot.—9.

The Committee on Divorce:—

The Honourable Messieurs: Baker, Bostock, Cox Kirchhoffer, Lougheed, McMullen, Wilson, Wood, Young—9.

The Committee on the Restaurant:—

The Honourable the Speaker, and the Honourable Messieurs: Bolduc, McKay (Truro), McMillan, McSweeney, Robertson, Tessier.—7.

All which is respectfully submitted.

WM. GIBSON,
Chairman.

He said: If there is no objection, I will move that the report be read and adopted.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I do not see why it should be adopted to-day.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Rule 24 must be suspended.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—There is no notice of motion to suspend the rule. I think that that report should be printed in the journals so that we can take cognizance of it. I have no objection to the report at all, but I think that the names should be made public so that we shall know what we are doing. If there were any reason for adopting the report immediately I would not object. The statement has been made that they wanted to organize the Divorce Committee at once in order to take the evidence of some persons who are leaving for England. If that be the case, I should not object at all.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I move the suspension of rule 24.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I object to it.

The SPEAKER—Is there any objection to the suspension of the rule?

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—Then I move that the report be taken into consideration to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

THE RULES OF THE SENATE.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I should like to know when we will be put in possession of the French edition of the rules of the Senate. That edition was prepared before we left Ottawa last summer and was accepted by this House.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Does the hon. gentleman refer to the report of the special committee appointed to revise the translation?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Yes. They reported and their report was accepted on the last day of the session. I take this opportunity to ask if we could not also have a copy of the rules of the House of Commons for each member of the Senate. Their rules have been changed and the old rules with which we are now supplied are no longer of any use.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The request is a reasonable one, and attention having been called to it I will see that it is complied with. I am advised that the rules are not ready for distribution, but I will see that they are. The Senate rules, I understand, have been in print for some time; I do not know why they have not been bound and distributed. Very often at the Printing Bureau they wait until some one gives a direct order, what they call 'approving of the translation.' I shall make inquiry about it and see that it is done.

Hon. Mr. De BOUCHERVILLE—I would suggest that copies of the rules of the Senate be distributed to members of the House of Commons.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at 3 p.m.

HARBOUR COMMISSION OF MONTREAL.

INQUIRY.

The Order of the Day being called :

By the Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE :

That he will inquire of the government—

1. Has the government taken cognizance of the following article published in 'La Patrie,' of Montreal, the date of 6th October last :—

Montreal Harbour Commission.

The 'Herald' yesterday published the following despatch :—

Ottawa, 5.—Honourable J. I. Tarte has been mentioned as the probable chairman of the new commission for the administration of Montreal harbour. It is understood on the best of authority that Mr. Tarte will not be named for this position. The man who is to fill the place has not been chosen, but it is not to be Mr. Tarte.

Mr. Tarte has already, some days ago, informed the members of the cabinet with whom he was in communication, that he could not accept the chairmanship of the new Harbour Commission that had been offered to him.

2. Is it true that the government or any minister thereof offered the Honourable J. I. Tarte the chairmanship of the new Harbour Commission of Montreal ?

3. Is it true that Mr. Tarte informed the government or the member of the cabinet with whom he was in communication that he could not accept that position ?

4. Who are the members of the cabinet with whom the said Mr. Tarte was thus in communication regarding the chairmanship of the new Harbour Commission of Montreal ?

Hon. Mr. LEGRIS—In the absence of the hon. gentleman who has placed this notice on the order paper, I beg to make the inquiry.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Minister of Marine and Fisheries before submitting names for consideration in the appointment of a board of harbour commissioners of Montreal, naturally consulted leading citizens of Montreal, Mr. Tarte among the number. In the conversation Mr. Tarte intimated that he did not propose to accept the position. That is the only answer I can give to the hon. gentleman's question. When spoken to on the subject, Mr. Tarte said he was not a candidate and would not accept the position.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Would my hon. friend be kind enough to repeat the answer he has just given? Do I understand the declination of Mr. Tarte was made to the the government?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No. I stated that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries naturally consulted a number of leading gentlemen in Montreal as to the most judicious selection for the Board of Harbour Commissioners. Mr. Tarte was among the number consulted, and in the course of the conversation Mr. Tarte intimated to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries that as far as he was concerned he would not accept the position.

NATURALIZATION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being called:

Second reading (Bill A) An Act to amend the Naturalization Act.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—As this Bill has not been printed and distributed among the members, I move that the Order of the Day be discharged and that it be placed on the Orders of the Day for Tuesday next.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Before this matter comes up for second reading, would my hon. friend be good enough to say what are the conditions which have given rise to this proposed legislation, so as to permit members to inform themselves in the matter? Those conditions are not apparent on the face of the Bill and it is very desirable that we should know what they are.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The suggestion comes from local men in Saskatchewan and Alberta, and I shall endeavour to get any information I can. I have none at present other than the intimation that it was felt that this was rather important inasmuch as there were persons there who were willing to become British subjects, but who could not do so until they had remained three years in the Northwest. A similar law has been passed in New Zealand, allowing parties to avail themselves of their residence in another British colony when applying for naturalization. The Bill is to permit the time spent in one British colony to be counted when applying for naturalization in another British colony.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I should like to know at the second reading whether there has been any judicial authority upon the present Act being insufficient to meet the conditions provided; also whether the matter has been submitted to the Department of Justice. It seems to me a very great deal of legislation is being passed by the government with reference to the naturalization of aliens which is extremely undesirable, in my judgment at any rate.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This was sent to me by the Department of Justice. I think I have the report here.

The motion was agred to.

REVISED STATUTES OF 1906 BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (B) An Act rspecting the Revised Statutes 1906 and to provide for the French version thereof. He said: This Act has been distributed. I think hon. gentlemen have it on their desks. As I explained on the introduction of the Bill a large part of it is a reprint of the Act passed in 1903. There was a clause omitted, and that was in reference to the French version. The Department of Justice thought the French version must be referred to, and that the laws as printed in French by the King's Printer and translated by the proper authority should be confirmed. I presume one of the reasons for calling attention to that was the fact that discrepancies had been discovered between the French and English versions of the statutes of 1886. A case was brought to the notice of the Department of Justice recently in which the penalty for the commission of a certain offence was not the same in the two versions. It so happened that in the province of Quebec the French judge, being more familiar with French than English, preferred to take the French edition, and the result was that the man got off with considerable less penalty than would have been inflicted if the English version had been used. For that reason it is desirable that there should be a careful translation by the proper authority.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I should like to ask the hon. Secretary of State why he passed over the first Bill on the order paper, An Act to amend the Naturalization Act, on the ground that it was not circulated and then proceeded with the second Order of the Day with reference to the revised statutes, which stands in precisely the same position?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I stated that the first Bill on the order paper was not circulated, but the second was.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—But they are both on our files. I was in error when I stated that they had not been laid before the House. I find when looking at my file, that I had them, but the objection that I took in the first place is equally strong. Surely the hon. gentleman must know that no member of this Senate can by any possibility pick up a Bill with thirteen or fourteen clauses, and master it in a few minutes after he comes into the Chamber. The object of placing it on the notice paper is that every senator may have an opportunity of securing a copy of the Bill on which he is expected to express an opinion but in this case these three Bills are laid upon the desk at the opening of a sitting of the Senate when there is no possibility of knowing what the contents of them are, except as you go through each clause. I find, after my attention has been called to the fact, that the whole three Bills on my file were under my desk. I did not know they were there. I do not object to proceeding with these Bills; they are of a character that I do not suppose is open to particular objection. We have been tinkering with the Naturalization Act almost every session, wherever an individual case arises, particularly in the new Territories. In reference to the Bill the second reading of which the hon. gentleman has moved, the explanation is not satisfactory as to why an Act should be passed giving special authority for the translation of the statutes into French. I can understand that a blunder may have occurred such as he has indicated, but that I take it has nothing to do with the right of parliament to have translation made of all documents which become records of parliament. The 133 clause of the British North America Act provides:

> Either the English or French language may be used by any person in the debate of the Houses of parliament of Canada, and of the House of the legislature of Quebec; and both those languages shall be used in the respective records and journals of those Houses; and either of those languages may be used by any person or in any pleading or process in or issuing from any court of Canada established under this Act, and in or from all or any of the courts of Quebec.

Now, certainly, the consolidated statutes become a record of parliament the moment the consolidation has been ratified by parliament. Hence the power vested in parliament to have them translated and printed to my mind is amply clear. I call attention to it because I really cannot see the necessity of a clause of that kind. Perhaps it is because I did not hear distinctly the explanation the hon. gentleman made. I should like to call his attention also to this fact; we are asked to pass an Act ratifying a consolidation of the statutes which we have never seen. If the hon. gentleman will refer to the journals of the House for 1885, he will find that Sir Alexander Campbell, before asking the Senate to legislate upon this question, laid the consolidated statutes on the table in order that they might be examined by any member of the Senate who desired to look at them. In this case we have not even the report laid upon the table. A Bill is introduced to confirm that of which we have not the slightest knowledge.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The explanation I gave was this: the Revised Statutes of 1886, before the appointment of a commission of parliament, did not authorize the Governor in Council to proclaim the statutes when they left the hands of the commission. I read from the Act of 1903 when I was on my feet before, which declares specifically that the Governor in Council may issue a proclamation whenever the roll is signed, bringing the revised statutes into effect. Now the difference between the French edition of the revised statues and the ordinary laws is this: there is no authority of parliament whatever for the French version, and the Department of Justice considered, after looking into the subject, that it was only right and proper in bringing them into force that it should declare that a similar roll in the French language should be deposited with the clerk of parliament, which is to be the official basis from which the copies will be printed, and it is for that reason it was deemed advisable. Nine-tenths of this Bill are in the words of the Act of 1903, but it was thought better to revise them as one or two new clauses were being introduced.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman repeals that Act by this Bill.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—But this does not come into force until the revised statutes come into force in January, 1907.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Will the report from that commission be laid on the table?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is here now. There are two copies in the House now for any hon. gentleman to examine. They are on the table and will be left on the table from day to day.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved that the Bill be referred to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday next.

Hon. Mr. KERR—There is no reason why we should not have the third reading now.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I could understand if the House was to take a long adjournment that the suggestion would be a good one, but inasmuch as we have been informed that we are likely to sit here until the 12th December, and as we shall have nothing to do for a portion of that time, and these revised statutes are not to come into operation until the 1st January next, I do not see any reason why we should omit the usual committee stage of the measure; and it is only right that when we do go into committee we should have the roll of the revised statutes before us, so that we may form some idea of what we are asked to ratify.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They are on the table.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes, but they have been just placed on the table, and I for one have had no opportunity of seeing them. I should like to see them before finally voting on the Bill.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I would suggest that as the hon. Secretary of State will probably submit the report some time during this sitting of the House, our Journals should show that the submission of the report precedes the second reading of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The report is in the statutes itself.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My suggestion is that it should take priority on our minutes of proceedings to the motion for the second reading of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The volumes themselves constitute the report.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—When Sir Alexander Campbell laid similar documents on the table, they had been first signed by the Governor General and by the Clerk of the Senate, and, if I remember correctly, looking over the law which is now being repealed, that same provision exists. Is that practice revived in this statute, or is that formality done away with? This report before being laid on the table should be certified to by the Governor General and the Clerk of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They are incomplete. The index is not in, but it is being prepared. Otherwise they have been carefully gone over by the commission and certified. In the case of 1886 there was no parliamentary legislation authorizing the Governor in Council to bring them into operation. The House itself considered the revised statutes after the commission had left them, and a committee sat for weeks and weeks in this chamber going over every chapter of them. That was not intended in this case. A different mode of operation was adopted.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I understand now that the matter is not in such a state that my hon. friend can present the revised statutes to the House at this day. That being so, as the hon. senator from Halifax has said, there is no reason why we should proceed with the second reading to-day. It will go on record that we have given this Bill a second reading before we had received the statutes, and it would be a pity that such a thing should be on record.

Hon. Mr. KERR—We have already given it the second reading, the question now is whether the third reading should be to-day or next Tuesday.

The SPEAKER—The motion before the House is that the Bill be referred to a committee of the whole House on Tuesday next.

Hon. Mr. POWER—As I understand it, the hon. Secretary of State laid these volumes on the table yesterday. I agree with the hon. senator from Marshfield in thinking that that fact should have been set out on our minutes.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The package was not opened.

Hon. Mr. POWER—As a matter of fact these volumes, which constitue the report of the commission that has been at work for several years, were laid on the table yesterday and our minutes should contain some mention of that very important fact. As the hon. senator from Marshfield says, it does not seem to be just the correct thing that we should proceed to deal with a matter which, so far as our journals show, is not before us.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It will be quoted as a precedent.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If the rolls were not laid on the table yesterday they should be laid on the table to-day.

Hon. Mr. KERR—There is no reason for it. The Bill in this case is not parallel to the Act of the last revision. In this particular it is not the same as the Revision Act under which this revision takes place; it provides that the Governor General may proclaim them and they then become the revised statutes. It will be seen that this is one which provides not so much for these laws being our laws hereafter as to provide for the repeal of other Acts which would appear to be inconsistent with that which the Governor General might proclaim to be the law. That is the reason why it is not necessary to go through either the form of laying them on the table now or going into Committee of the Whole House on them. We are not now enacting revised statutes. The revised statutes have been provided for by an Act, previously passed, under which this revision took place, and they are the revised statutes whenever the Governor General proclaims them, but there would be this difficulty about it—doubts might be raised as to the condition of this legislation and other legislation. This Bill provides for that. It appears to me that the proceeding is quite regular, and there could be no harm in having it declared in our minutes that the rolls which have been presented and signed by the revisors has been laid on the table, and it is not necessary for us to go into their consideration, because apart from any consideration of this Bill they can be proclaimed and will be proclaimed, outside of any provision of this Act.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P. E. I).—Do not these revised statutes make a considerable difference in the law as it now stands? We ought to have some explanation as to what changes are made by this revisfon. We may be repealing Acts which many of us might not consider advisable to repeal, and making changes which may not be to the advantage of the country, and we should have an explanation from the government on that point.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will just read the clause under which they have been revised and hon. gentlemen will see to what extent the commissioners were authorized to make any change.

> The statute commissioners in consolidating the said statutes and incorporating therewith the Acts or parts of Acts passed subsequent thereto and selecting for inclusion therein as above provided, may make such alterations in their language as are requisite in order to preserve a uniform mode of expression and may make such minor amendments as are necessary to bring out more clearly what they deem to be the intention of parliament, or to reconcile seemingly inconsistent enactments or to correct clerical or typographical errors.

That is what the commissioners have done. The changes are very, very slight. Of course there is no change in the law as far as that went. There are modes of expression not thought grammatical, and errors of one kind and another which were inconsistent and amendments were made which were not consistent with former Acts. Of course it would be absolutely impossible for the Senate, or any other deliberative body to undertake to go through the volume in a short period. It would take a month or six weeks. I did not lay those documents on the table as a necessary adjunct to the Bill at all. It is simply for the information of the House to show what had been done. It had no connection with this Bill whatever.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think my hon. friend will find, if he will read another clause of that statute, that it declares what shall be done before they be laid upon the table, that is that they must receive the sanction of the Governor General and also of the clerk. That has not been done. That portion of the law has not been complied with. The remarks of the hon. gentleman from Toronto might have some force if the facts were as he stated them. There may be changes and alterations made in the language of these statutes to which my hon. friend took objection, and they are laid before parliament for the purpose of a revision by parliament, of receiving sanction, and more than that, the Act we are now dealing with provides for other matters besides the ratification of the work of the commissioners who revised those statutes. I would like to press that point to which I have called my hon. friend's attention two or three times, as to whether he thinks he has complied with the law in simply laying these volumes on the table without complying with that clause of the Act to which I have referred ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—My hon. friend will understand that it is quite impossible to lay the French version of it upon the table because it will not be completed probably for another month.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I refer to the English.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Well it is the same as the French. If the one has to be laid on the table the other must be laid on the table also.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—It seems to me the procedure in this matter has been rather extraordinary. We are sending it to the House of Commons without consideration, not knowing if that House will do the same, and we who are regarded as revisors would be revised by the other chamber if they give it mature consideration. At all events I do not see the necessity for such haste.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If the House will allow me to say another word, this matter is different from the case of the revised statutes of 1886. In that case the revisors had to gather in the statutes of the various provinces. In addition to revising and consolidating the Acts which had been passed by the parliament of Canada, they had to go over the legislation of the different provinces, which had been enacted before the union of the provinces, and it was a serious task in that way to decide what should be embodied in the revised statutes and what should not. The government of that day thought proper, I suppose largely on that account, to refer the report of the commissioners to a joint committee of the two houses. I had the honour of being a member of that committee, and we went over the two printed volumes with a good deal of care and suggested certain changes. In the present case it did not seem to be so necessary that this preliminary consideration should be given, and at any rate parliament in its wisdom decided that that preliminary inquiry on the part of both houses should not take place. While that is true, and while it is true that we can, without looking at these volumes, without having them before us, pass this Bill, still, as a matter of courtesy to this House, it is only right that we should know what we are doing, and as we are not pressed for time, I think the government are taking the proper course in referring this Bill to the committee. We are not referring the revised statutes to the committee. The first subsection of the 3rd clause reads as follows :

> The revised statutes of Canada, 1906, are hereby ratified and confirmed, and declared to have and to have had on, from and after the first day of January, 1907, the force of law as if herein enacted.

It seems to me it is only fair to this House that before we pass that clause we should have those revised statutes before us so that we shall be able to say that we did not confirm the revised statutes without having at least seen them. Then there is another provision in this Bill which is new, and which is also important, and which does not appear in the Act of 1903, and that is the one with respect to the translation of the revised statutes into French. I understand that largely it is ratifying something which has been done. I understand the work of the translation had been nearly completed, but it has been done without any parliamentary authority. I venture to differ from the hon. gentleman from Belleville as to the fact that the revised statutes would as a matter of course be translated. The section of the British North America Act, which the hon. gentleman referred to, states that the Journals and records of the House should appear in both languages. Well, the revised statutes are not a record of the Senate, and naturally the Minister of Justice and his officers—I rather think this Bill is the work of the deputy—would not come to the Senate and ask for a Bill which they did not think necessary. They have had this subject under consideration and given it a great deal more thought than any member of this House has given it, and they think that this Bill if not absolutely necessary, is at any rate advisable, and, therefore, I think that we should pass it.

Hon. SIR MACKENZIE BOWELL—As this is a question more particularly pertaining to the records and the mode of procedure, we might be excused for speaking twice on the measure. The 16th clause of the Bill provides for a repeal of the Act which my hon. friend read an extract from a moment ago in reply to the hon. senator from Toronto. The very first clause of the Bill makes this provision, and it is still the law of the land until it is repealed :

> As soon as the said commissioners or a majority of them shall report in writing a completion of the said consolidation including therein such Acts or parts of Acts passed during the present session and subsequent thereto as the Governor General may deem it advisable to be so included, the Governor General may cause a printed roll thereof, attested under the signature of the Governor General and that of the clerk of parliament, to be deposited in the office of the said clerk, and such roll shall be held to be the original of the said statutes as revised, classified and consolidated.

Now, I would like to ask whether that has been done before the consolidated statutes were laid on the table ? If my informaton is correct, it has not been done, and if not, are we acting in conformity with the law ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We are adopting a different plan. We are confirming the statutes now revised and declaring them to be the law. We are not proceeding under the Act of 1903. This Bill does not go into force until January 1.

The motion was agreed to.

COMMITTEE OF SELECTION.

REPORT ADOPTED.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON moved the adoption of the first report of the Select Committee appointed to nominate the senators to serve on the Standing Committees of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I do not know that I desire to criticise the appointments made by the committee struck for that purpose, but I should like to say a few words with respect to the rules which govern the number of senators who shall be appointed on each of the committees of the House. I find by the rules that there shall be on the Committee of Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours fifty senators. I want to say that this country is growing, and growing very rapidly. There are certain gentlemen from the Northwest Territories, or what were the Northwest Territories, but which are now the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan, and they would like to be on the Railway Committee. I think it would be good for the House and good for the country if they were appointed. Other members of the committee and of this House would like to get all the information they can when the questions with reference to building railways in the Northwest are being discussed, because two-thirds of the roads projected are being constructed in that country, and if there are any hon. gentlemen in this House from there who are able to give valuable information to the committee, I do not see why they should not be on the committee. We are told that they can go to the committee meetings and speak, but cannot vote. But they do not know when the committee is going to sit. They are not members and are not notified. Some people may think the west is a little too fast in desiring to get their representatives on the several committees, and that we are getting all we are entitled to, but I want to draw attention to this fact—and in the discussion on the Autonomy Bill I mentioned the same point—that the west has not its proper representation in this House. I understand when the different provinces were formed into the confederation that it was divided for the purpose of representation in this chamber into three parts. The west at that time was an unknown quantity. We had the maritime provinces placed in one group and given twenty-four senators; Ontario was placed in another group and given twenty-four members, and Quebec was the third group with the same representation. Here we have four provinces in the west and only fifteen senators. We are entitled to twenty-four and have not got them, but we have a right to ask that the few we have here should have a little more representation on the committees of the Senate than they have at the present time. I went over the names of the members selected for the committees carefully. I did not object to the suspension of the rules because I hadn't any objection to the work done by the striking committee, but I wanted to go over the list of names to see who was on the committee and who was not. I think that was right and proper. There is no necessity to railroad anything through this chamber. I did not take the objection in order to obstruct, but simply to have an opportunity to see who was on the committees. I have gone over the list, and I will not say that there is a single name on the committees that should be struck off. But is there any objection to making the committees a little larger, as the country is growing? Take the Standing Orders Committee, one of the most important committees of this House, because it is the committee that throws the searchlight on all the private Bill legislation which comes into this House, to find out whether it has been properly advertised before it comes to this House, and we find nine members on that committee. And then we turn to the Library Committee, and I think it has fifteen, another committee twenty-one, and the most important of these committees is the Standing Orders Commitee, which has only nine members. I venture to say fifteen members would do a great deal better than nine, and is there any reason why it should not be a larger committee? There are hon. gentlemen sitting idle in the different rooms every day when that committee meets who would only be too glad to serve, whose judgment would be good and whose advice would be worth something. Why should there be only nine when you can make the committee fifteen just as well as nine? I think that a larger committee would better satisfy all the interests of the country. If you have nine on a committee and four are absent—

Hon. Mr. POWER—I rise to a question of order. The hon. gentleman is not discussing the report of the committee. He is discussing the rules of the House, and if he wishes to change the rules, he must give notice of a motion, and then he can discuss the question as much as he pleases.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—I think the intention of the hon. gentleman who is addressing the House is to move that the rule be suspended.

The SPEAKER—These rules cannot be suspended, and the point of order is well taken. The hon. gentleman would have to move specially to revise the standing rules of the Senate, and he would have to summon the House officially for that purpose.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I am sorry my hon. friend's time is so precious and valuable that I seem to be trespassing when discussing the rules of the House. I am satisfied that we are not so much overworked that we cannot at times listen to something which might be beneficial to my hon. friend who has resumed his seat, although I am bound to believe the hon. gentleman thinks he has embodied within himself all the wisdom of the Senate; still I think occasionally a drop of wisdom might fall——

Some hon. MEMBERS—Order, order.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I hear from the chief engineer of the Power House that he wants order. I have been informed that we cannot change the rules without giving notice. I do not know that I have anything more to say on this question, but I will give notice later on to amend that rule, in order to increase the number of members on the committees, so that my hon. friend from Assiniboïa and some other hon. gentlemen who should be on the committees shall have a chance to be nominated.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I just wish to say one word on behalf of the committee, with respect to the western provinces. The hon gentleman is perfectly right in saying that there is now going on, and is likely to go on for some time, a good deal of railway building in the Northwest. But surely the hon. gentleman does not mean to give this House to understand that gentlemen who come from other portions of the Dominion may not be able to give suggestions and exercise judgment which would be nearly as valuable as that of the persons who are locally interested ?

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I do not ask to have anybody put on the committee. I wanted more members placed on the committees.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If it is a question about a railway in a remote province, members of this House who are not locally interested are perhaps more likely to exercise sound judgment on it than gentlemen who reside on the spot, and who might have local interests which should not prevail in these cases. But, as a matter of fact, there is not any ground whatever for the complaint made by the hon. gentleman. The province of British Columbia has two representatives on the Railway Committee, Saskatchewan two, Alberta two and Manitoba three.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—Four.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—New Brunswick has six.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Halifax)—Nova Scotia has only two.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Three Manitobans have as much influence as six members from the lower provinces, as things go, but the fact is that considerably more than half of the western members are on the Railway Committee, and there is no substantial ground for complaint at all.

Hon. Mr. DOUGLAS—I wish to make a few observations on the question before the House. I do not suppose that anything I may say will change the opinion of the House in reference to receiving or passing this report ; still, being interested in the west, and knowing the very great necessity that the people should be fully represented, especially in this Railway Committee, I am forced to make some observations. I notice in looking at the personnel of the Railway Committee from the different provinces the following result : Ontario has ten upon that committee, Quebec 16, Nova Scotia 3, New Brunswick 2, Prince Edward Island 2, British Columbia 2, Manitoba 3, Saskatchewan 2, Alberta 2. I might make the inquiry, why the great number from Ontario and Quebec ? I do not know the usage of this House, and have no right to say anything about it. I do not know the principle on which the committee appointed to select the standing committees acts, whether it is a fact or not, that when a gentleman is once put upon a committee he is supposed to remain there until he dies, whether he attends or not. I believe there is a good deal of representation on this committee that would be much better off it altogether. With regard to the senior members, while we do not despise their ability, and do not despise their experience, if it is a fact that they are unable, through age or otherwise, to be present and take a prominent interest in the work of this committee, then they ought not, looking at the relation of the country and its interests, to stand in the way of others being appointed, and we make it a rule that if a member of this House is unable to appear and occupy his seat for two years that he looses his seat. It would be a good thing for this committee in future, if not this year, to adopt some rule that if a member of a committee fails to attend and take a reasonable interest in the work of the committee, that he should not expect to be continued. I do not think it would be quite fair to ask this committee, just on the spur of the moment, to write to all these hon. gentlemen and ascertain their minds on the question, but it ought to be done in the interests of the country. I wish to say that probably if these committees were purged, and you selected active men, there would be no difficulty about representation. It is important that these gentlemen should be present. There is another matter I desire to call attention to: why three in Manitoba?

The province of Manitoba has had its day. Its branch lines are all about built. and now we in the larger provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta are largely engaged in railway building, and our people are alive to that question and expect their representatives, few as they are, to take a very active interest in what pertains to their business and their interests in the development of that country. If the number cannot be increased, as I am well aware it cannot without changing our rules, it might be a gracious act on the part of some representative from Manitoba to say 'I am in the way,' and to gracefully step down and let one of us take the position, or it might be quite possible that some of our generous senators from Quebec and Ontario might do the same thing, and I am sure it would be very greatly appreciated by the people of the west. The people of the west are the people of the east. The eastern people are buildng up that country and the same interest should pervade the whole. I do not want to find unnecessary fault with the Striking Committee. I dare say they have had a great deal of trouble in naming the committee. I know the difficulties that surround them in work of this kind to give satisfaction to all, but I hope, for the future, some principle will be adopted and that they will see to it when striking these committees that they name men who are likely to take their places and perform their duties. I feel that the new provinces are not duly represented on this committee. I have that strong conviction, and usage and wont and ought not to take the place of justice and right.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I quite agree with the hon. senator from the west and the hon. gentleman who preceded him in this discussion. The hon. senator said Ontario has ten senators on this committee. I have figured out the names, as I know them personally, and find there are fifteen from Ontario, and there are sixteen from Quebec. Coming from the east, as I do, I have a good deal of sympathy with the demands of the young senators from the west. I have been an aspirant for appointment to that committee, and yet those representing the richest constituency in Canada have been unable to secure appointment. I have never said a word about it until to-day. I am prepared to allow my claims to go to any gentleman from the west, because I thoroughly agree with the hon. senator from Saskatchewan, that the railroad interests of this day have been displaced from Quebec and Ontario to the great west, and we are not entitled to such large representation on this committee. If any representative men are capable of giving information to the committee they are the members who come from the young provinces of the west. I understand that we cannot materially change the committees at this late hour and in this thin House, but in a full house it might have been advisable to do so. It should be a warning to those who are in power or who assume or control power in regard to the formation of those committees for next year, to bear in mind that there is growing in this House a sentiment which will not brook control which is not consented to by the members at large. What I say here is said firmly and determinedly. We will not allow the hon. members of this House to be pulled from one side to the other in matters of this kind without their consent. Every member of the Senate is equal to any other member, and should not be expected to submit when three or four gather in a room and talk over schemes and put them through. I am quite in accord with the feeling that is finding vent in this House in regard to the matter. Apart from this important Railway Committee, I find that on the Divorce Committee two hon. gentlemen are named who are never here. On the Railway Committee you have two or three gentlemen with great influence, but they are very little in this House. On the Divorce Committee I find the names of gentlemen who cannot be here because their business interests take them out of the Senate. Why not have a senator who is constantly in attendance, like the hon. senator from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Ross) on that committee in place of the member from Toronto. I point to these facts, not because I am in a position to ask for a change in the committees now, but in the hope that the Striking Committee next year will do better.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Halifax)—The hon. senator has made reference to myself. There is one thing I can boast of—I am regular in my attendance in this House from the opening to the close of the session, yet I am placed on only one committee, the Committee on Standing Orders and Private Bills. The other of course is the Committee on Printing, which is a joint committee of the two Houses. Now I do not like to feel that I would like the moss to grow over me in this House for want of employment. Although I am an old man I think I would be found as active and useful on some of the committees as some of the youuger members who have been named. I do not like on behalf of myself or my province to be so humbled and ignored as I have been by the Committee of Selection.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The principle laid down in selecting members in the committee has been carried out as far as it was practicable to do so, and as far as the committee thought they were justified in doing it, by leaving off or changing the names of many members of committees who have not been in the habit of attending regularly. That has been the case particularly with the Committee of Divorce, to which the hon. gentleman from Montreal has called attention. One member of the committee unfortunately died, and the other, though one of the brightest intellects in the House, and not second to any in Canada, was not able to attend. Two active, energetic members have been appointed to that committee in the persons of the hon. senator from Killarney and the hon. senator from British Columbia. I think the standing committee have performed their duty faithfully in the selections they have made. The hon. senator from Montreal spoke of the hon. senator from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Cox) being absent from the meetings of the Divorce Committee. I am told by those who form the committee that he has been a very good attendant at its meetings, and with the additions of two active, energetic young men, who have been added to that committee, it will be not only effective, but there will be no difficulty in obtaining a quorum at any time. The hon. gentleman from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Cloran) objects to the formation of the Committee of Railways and Canals and desires that the older members be removed and younger members be put on. I presume he means older members of the Senate and that younger men should take their places. Last session I was on four committees. This year I asked specially to be relieved of two, and I remain on two. Being the oldest senator on the committee I have no objection that the hon. senator should take my place, and if he is better able to attend his duties than I am, the Senate must be the best judge. Going over the names of that committee, I do not see one who has neglected his duties. I am strongly in accord with the sentiments uttered by the hon. senator from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power) that gentlemen who has been in parliamentary life for thirty and forty years are just as capable of judging what is in the interest even of the Northwest, though they may not live there, as gentlemen who have just been appointed to the Senate whose good fortune it has been to adopt that part of Canada as their home. I go further, I am inclined to think that some of the older senators on that committee know as much about that part of the country as some who come from there, and have seen probably as much of it and studied its capabilities, and know as much about it as those who claim to be more familiar with it. They are just as capable of judging what is in the interest of those new provinces as any senator from the west. If the hon. gentleman can point out a single member of the Railway Committee who has obstructed legislation that was in the interest of that country, I would join him heart and hand in having that senator removed. Membership on the committee appointed to select the standing committees is not an enviable position. In almost every instance, strange to say, members cling to that committee. Nearly every member of the Senate wishes to be appointed to the Railway Committee, and all the Committee on Selection can do is to exercise their best judgment, as has been done in this instance, and in the past, and I hope will be done in the future. Next year the striking committee must not forget the warning of the hon. senator from Montreal, and must bow with due submission to his dictates and the threats he has uttered. I may say they will not affect me, speaking individually, in the least. I was surprised to hear my venerable friend (Hon. Mr. Ross) say he was only on one committee. In that he is in error ; he is on two committees. As an old paraliamentarian, with a good deal of experience, having been a member of a cabinet, my own impression is that he ought to be on some of the more important committees. If he considers himself sighted, I can speak for the whole committee when I say that there was no intention of slighting him or any other member. They did the best they could under all the circumstances.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—The committee did me the honour of selecting me as chairman and it is due to the House that some explanation should be given of the report of the committee. In the first place, the Library Committee had eighteen members; by the rule of the House that has been reduced to seventeen. Then the Printing Committee has been reduced from twenty-four to twenty-one, thus depriving us of four places on those two committees. I am happy to say that only two of our members have departed since last session, but we had four new members to provide for, and each of those members was placed on two committees. In the past, as every one knows, it was generally a year, and some times two years, before a new member could be put on a committee because of the delicacy felt in setting aside gentlemen who had long served the country. With regard to the hon. senator from Halifax (Hon Mr. Ross) he is quite mistaken in saying he has been appointed to only one committee; he is on two committees.

Hon. Mr. ROSS—What are they?

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—The Printing Committee and the Private Bills Committee; one of the most important committees of the House. Every senator is on at least two committees. In order to accomplish that the hon. senator from Belleville (Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell) graciously gave up two; Sir Wm. Hingston gave up one, and Senator Watson gave up one committee, and thus provision was made for the four gentlemen who are now making complaints. I do not know that they have much to complain about. You have fifteen men from the west out of a committee of fifty, and I think, with all due respect to the hon. senator opposite (Hon. Mr. Douglas), that part of Canada is well represented. He would like some senator from Manitoba to drop out and give the two new provinces three, leaving Manitoba only one.

Hon. Mr. DOUGLAS—I hold that the large provinces in the west, under existing circumstances, have not fair representation with two members when we have other provinces with ten to sixteen members each.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—The hon. gentleman asks that Manitoba drop one.

Hon. Mr. DOUGLAS—I say they might gracefully do so and then be in line with the other provinces.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—The hon. member should not forget that we gave Senator De Veber the position on the Railway Committee rendered vacant by the death of Senator Vidal. The Striking Committee did all they could to give fair representation to every part of the country. We have no vacancies left for the six members yet to come to the House and those gentlemen have just as good a right as any of us to make complaint that there is no committee work for them. This occurs every year. The attendance at the committee of the Senate would set a very good example to the committees of the House of Commons, and for that reason it is all the more difficult for the committee to strike off any name from any standing committee. I was sorry that two names were mentioned this afternoon, one the senator from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Cox). I want to say this in his absence, and I am speaking in the hearing of members of the Divorce Committee, that his attendance at the meetings of that committee was as good as that of any other member of the committee. With regard to Sir George Drummond, I am astonished at a member from Montreal suggesting that he should be removed from the committee. A man who is a director of the Canadian Pacific Railway to be asked to step aside from an important committee like that!

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The Canadian Pacific Railway has no more right than any other road to special representation.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—Sir George Drummond has as much right in this House as any other senator.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I did not ask to have him removed.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I am not going to bandy words across the floor of this House; it is not consistent with the dignity of the Senate. The committee removed, with very great reluctance, Sir James Gowan from the Divorce Committee because of his great age and infirmity. In doing so every member of that committee expressed his personal regret that it became our duty to do so. But it was necessary that new and active men should be appointed, and I am in the judgment of the House when I say that the selections which have been made should meet with unanimous approval. Sir James Gowan is a man who has occupied a large place in the Dominion of Canada. He was 40 years a judge, and for many years a member of the Senate. He is full of years and of honour. He has been knighted by his King and honoured by his country, and I am sure every senator feels, as the committee felt, great reluctance in being obliged to remove his name from the committee which he adorned so many years.

Hon. Mr. McGREGOR—I am sure the committee has done everything they possibly could do, and yet I cannot agree with the principle laid down by the chairman of the committee that a senator who is once appointed to a committee should not be removed from it. Do I understand him to say that when a man is appointed to a committee he should remain on it to the end of his days?

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I never made a statement about any one having a leasehold of a committee.

Hon. Mr. McGREGOR—I am not finding fault with the appointments. I am satisfied to act on any committee I may be placed on, but I do not think that because a man has acted for a year or two on any committee he should remain there for ever. He might be found incapable and, therefore, I say there is no reason why an appointment to a committee should be permanent.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I think, frankly speaking that any one who finds fault with the work of the committee ought to be man enough to stand up and name any member of the Senate who is unfit to act on a committee.

Hon. Mr. McGREGOR—The chairman misunderstood me; I have not found fault with any one. My objection is to the principle that he has laid down, that appointments to committees should be permanent.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday next at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE.

OTTAWA, Tuesday, December 4, 1906.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Eight o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

LEGISLATION AFFECTING JUVENILE CRIMINALS.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I should like to say to hon. gentlemen that there is a very interesting and important meeting being held this evening at eight o'clock—or perhaps a little later—at the Normal School, for the discussion of improved legislation affecting juvenile criminals. In some parts of the world a very great advantage has been derived from such legislation, and it would be an advantage to Canada if we were in line in this matter. Several interesting speakers will discuss the subject, and as the matter will in time come before us, I think it would be probably more interesting and useful for the senators to hear the arguments pro and con, than to lose very much time over formal matters to-night that might be postponed till to-morrow.

SITE FOR PUBLIC BUILDING AT GLACE BAY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (Cape Breton) inquired:

1. Whether the government has bought a site for a public building at Glace Bay?
2. When?
3. What price was paid?
4. Was there a report made by a government engineer respecting such a site, and were there more than one site reported on?
5. Do the government intend to ask for tenders for the construction of a public building soon?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The answers to the inquiry are as follow:—

1. Yes.

2. First lot purchased in June, 1905, additional lot in July, 1906.

3. First lot $6,600, second lot, $4,599.

4. Yes, an examination was made by a government architect who reported on several sites.

5. Yes, as soon as plans and specifications are completed public tenders will be invited.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being called:

Second reading (Bill C) An Act to amend the Criminal Code, 1892.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved that the Order of the Day be discharged and that it be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Tuesday next.

He said. This Bill was introduced with the intention of presenting to the House a larger measure on the subject, and until that measure comes down this Bill cannot very well be taken up.

The motion was agreed to.

FRENCH VERSION OF REVISED STATUTES BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (B) An Act respecting the Revised Statutes, 1906, and to provide for the French version thereof.

On clause 3,

3. The Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, are hereby ratified and confirmed and declared to have and to have had, on, from and after the first day of January, 1907, the force of law as if herein enacted.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The revised statutes, 1906, as I understand, and as appears from this Bill, are to be brought into operation on the 1st day of January next, and this Bill is to be assented to before the 1st day of January. The clause reads, 'confirmed and declared to have and to have had.' There is no object in inserting the words 'to have had,' because the revised statutes will not be in force until this Bill passes.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, yes, this Bill will not pass the same time as the other.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Then the hon. Secretary of State gave us to understand that this Bill had to be passed before January 1st.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, so it has.

Hon. Mr. POWER—And I received the same information at the Department of Justice. If this Bill passes before the 1st day of January, then how can this Bill say that the revised statutes had, before its passing, the force of law? Clearly the words 'and to have had' in line eight, should be stricken out. I therefore move that those words be expunged.

The motion was agreed to, and the clause as amended was adopted.

On clause 10,

French version.

10. The Governor in Council may appoint two or more competent translators to translate the said Revised Statutes into the French language, and the translators shall proceed as speedily as possible to make and complete such translation and report the same to the Governor in Council.

2. The Governor General shall thereupon cause a printed roll of the translation so made and reported, attested under the signature of the Governor General and that of the clerk of the parliaments, to be deposited in the office of the said clerk, and such roll shall be deemed to be the authentic original French version of the said statutes, and as such shall have the force of law as if herein enacted.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Will the leader of the government state why this clause is inserted ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I mentioned when I introduced the Bill that it was considered by the Department of Justice that an error had been committed in 1886 in not having the French version confirmed.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think it is the duty of the government to bring the French version into force at the same time as the English version.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Surely there can be no harm done in the enactment of this clause.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—But the government has not done its duty.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The French version is not here now. What will be the effect if the French version should not be ready by the 1st of January? I think some doubt has been expressed as to whether the French translation will be completed and ready for distribution before the end of the year. It would be a serious thing to have the statutes going into force on the 1st of January if the French version is not to be ready until some time later.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I understand they are making rapid progress with it. Additional translators are employed, and it is hoped it will be ready on the 1st January.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—And if it is not, what then ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Then it cannot be proclaimed. There are certain schedules which must go with it and the index has to be prepared, so it is possible that it cannot be ready for distribution in time.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (De Lanaudière)—If everything was complete in the English version, could it be proclaimed without the French version being ready at the same time ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think so.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—I have been consulting some gentlemen in Montreal on the subject and they tell me that the statutes cannot go into force until the French version is ready.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—That is quite correct. Coming from the province of Quebec, I know that a number of magistrates and judges in that province do not speak English, and you would expect them to administer a law which they know nothing about. You cannot have the laws administered in the province of Quebec without having them printed in the French language.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Instead of bringing this Bill into force on the 1st of January, the government should take power to bring it into operation by order in council. It is quite manifest that the revised statutes in both languages will not be printed and distributed by the 1st of January. I suppose there is no section of the public printing done more slowly than the publication and distribution of the statutes. I understand that the statutes of last session have not yet been distributed. It seems to me the hon. gentleman should take power, before we give this Bill the third reading to-morrow, to insert a clause to ensure a complete distribution of the revised statutes throughout the Dominion before they go into operation.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We had better leave that to the House of Commons. My own opinion has been for some time that they cannot be proclaimed on the 1st of January. As a matter of fact, there are now about 5,000 copies already in type, but in the roll that has been filed in the office of the Clerk of parliament, changes have been made, verbal and typographical corrections that will involve considerable delay. I understand there are about 300,000 copies ready to be stitched, and bound, and these can be circulated at an early date; but as I said before, the index is not ready and the French translation may not be ready, and my own opinion—not speaking for the government—is that they cannot be got ready in time. It is not the fault of the Printing Bureau, but of the translators.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This clause cannot do any harm at any rate, and there is no reason why we should continue to discuss it.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—The clause seems to me to be very objectionable for this reason, that it implies the possibility that the law may be brought into operation in English and not in French.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Hear, hear, that is the point.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It will be in force in French and in English, but it cannot be translated into French in the time.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—It implies the possibility that the French version may not be ready for a month or two, or possibly six months after the 1st of January. It can only be in force in French from the time the roll has been deposited in the House, so I think that the suggestion of the leader of the opposition should commend itself to all of us—that it come into force by proclamation.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Both languages being on an equal footing here, suppose the statutes had been completed in the French language and not in the English language, could they be put in force throughout the country ? They might just as well have completed the French version first, and had it printed and distributed; would the statutes be in force throughout the length and breadth of the land under those circumstances ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—The point is this: as I understand, in 1886, there was no express recognition by law of the authoritative character of the French version of the revised statutes. They were translated, but there was nothing to show that they were translated under the authority of parliament or the government.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—That is the point.

Hon. Mr. POWER—And in order to remove any question on that point, the commissioners thought it was desirable that, in the present instance, there should be no question about that, and the French version is just put on the same footing as the English, and the clause cannot do any harm.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think there cannot be any objection to that, but the point that is troubling some of us is that it is more than likely the French version will not be ready by the 1st January when this Bill will become law. As the consolidation does not change the law, is there any good reason why we should name the 1st January? Would the 1st July or the 1st of some other month not suit just as well, and there would be no doubt in the world that the French translation would be ready by that time?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I would suggest that my hon. friend the Secretary of State should bring down an amendment permitting the government to take power to bring the Act into effect at any time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I gave my opinion just now. There are gentlemen in the government who think it can all be done before the 1st January, and there is no use in making a change. The subject has been thoroughly threshed out and discussed.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—We have no right to make a translation in one language only when the two languages are official. We have not the French copy.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman will see that in the Act of 1903 provision was made for the English version, and this provision is on all fours with the provision made in the Act of 1903. I fail to see how it can do any harm whatever, and it removes any doubt.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is not answering the objections at all. If in 1883 or 1885, or 1886 a wrong has been done, that is no reason why it should be repeated now.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The point is that it was not done then, and I have the authority of one of the best lawyers in the country for saying there is grave doubt whether the French version of the revised statutes was ever really in force.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I take it there is a little misunderstanding about the matter. Section 10 provides for a translation of the revised statutes into the French language—that is a translation of the revised statutes as adopted and declared to be law. Clause 10, which has already been quoted, provides that the Governor General shall cause a printed roll of that translation to be filed, etc. Clause 11 reads:

> 11. Copies of the said Revised Statutes, either in the English or French language, purporting to be printed by the King's Printer, shall be evidence of the said Revised Statutes and of their contents.

So that provision is made for a translation of the revised statutes. Provision is made for one copy to be filed in the roll, and provision is made for a copy of the revised statutes as prepared, purporting to be printed by the King's Printer, being evidence of the revised statutes. I think that that makes the matter complete, and is a proper thing in order to insure the French version being the authorized French version. Otherwise there being no such provision for an authorized version, the question would be open as to what was the true translation of the roll which was printed in both languages. Supposing there were no such provision, and a doubt arose with reference to the French version which had been printed, the question would be, is that a correct translation? But this precludes the possibility of that difficulty by declaring that the copy filed shall be the correct translation and correct version from the roll. The roll which is filed is one roll, and that one roll must necessarily be in one language; and therefore being so, what we want is to get an authorized version of that issue by the authority of parliament, and that is the object of this legislation. It will be borne in mind that until these revised statutes are adopted, there is no authority under the British North America Act or requirement that they should be printed in more than one language. The second paragraph of the British North America Act provides that the Acts of the parliament of Canada and of the legislature of Quebec shall be printed and published in both languages; so that it is after they become the Acts of parliament that their publication as Acts have to be made under the British North America Act. Supposing that this provides for practically a simultaneous publication of those Acts, both the English and French versions, I think it is perfectly plain; it gets rid of any question as to whether there was a French version before.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I heard the hon. gentleman a few years ago proclaiming the doctrine that we had no right here to a French version.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I never said it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I beg pardon, the hon. gentleman stated it once in this House. I will find the speech, and if I am not wrong, the minister set him down at that time. We claim it here as a right, not as a grant given by the people, but a right to have the public records of this House printed in both languages.

Hon. Mr. KERR—Quite so. I always agreed with that.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—And what is proposed to-day? We are now proposing legislation which will grant us a translation.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Nothing of the kind. From time to time the translation has been going on.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If the translation has been going on from time to time, why have we not the translation of this Bill to-day? We have not the French version of it yet. The Bill we are studying at the present moment is not printed in French.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think it is the fault of the people who are connected with the translation. It has been long enough in print to be translated a dozen times over.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Here is an Act that upsets all the fine theory advanced by my hon. friend. Cap. 2 of the revised statutes of 1886, provides:

> And copies of the said volume shall be printed in the English and French language respectively by the Queen's Printer, who shall as soon after the close of each session as is practicable deliver or send by post, &c., the proper number of copies to the parties hereinafter mentioned.

That is to the members of the two Houses. Here is a statutory provision saying that Acts of the parliament of Canada shall be printed in both languages.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—So they are.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—But not in this case. You are asking leave to get them printed, how many months after, we do not know; it might be two months, it might be three months. The government should employ two or three translators. If some of them fall sick the work is delayed. I think the best thing to do is to have the translation immediately.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They are trying to push it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—As I understand, the translation is now nearly completed. The difficulty with respect to the revised statutes of 1886 was that in certain cases there was a variation between the English and French versions. It is in order to prevent anything of that sort happening in the future that this legislation is proposed. Then the question arose as to which was the official version, and I think the feeling was that the English version, which was the one signed by the Governor General and the Clerk of Parliament, was the version which was to be looked upon as official. The object now is to provide that there shall be a French version which will correspond with the English version and shall be binding in all courts. No question can be raised as to whether it is the English version or French version which makes the law. I happen to know that this particular clause comes from the permanent officers of the department who wish to avoid the difficulty which arose in connection with the revised statutes of 1886.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think this clause which is before us is perfectly right. We are proceeding I think more correctly, and we propose to do the French language, and our friends who speak the French language a greater justice than they ever received before. The doubt I had was regarding another clause, one we have already passed, about the time the Act should come into operation. However, that has been called to my hon. friend's attention, and I hope, before it leaves this House, his mind will be clearly made up on the point, and if the Act is to go into operation at a period later than the 1st January, then the amendment should be made here, so that we will not be receiving an amendment from the House of Commons by and by in the line which we are pointing out as the one that we think ought to be pursued just now. However, this discussion has brought up another subject in which I feel a very considerable amount of interest; and that is this: section 10 of the Bill before us provides to place the French language in a proper condition in regard to the revised statutes, but from what my hon. friend to my right has read from the Act of 1886, I think there is a doubt as to whether the French language is put in that position with regard to the Acts that we pass here each session. Is there any Act of this parliament or any declaration on the part of this parliament which will give the laws that we are passing this session, the same authority that we are giving in section 10 of this Bill to the revised statutes?

Hon. Mr. POWER—The British North America Act does that.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—From what I have heard, it is not so, and, with regard to the special authorization of the French translation of the Acts that are passed each year, there will still be lacking the authority that we are giving to the French version with regard to the revised statutes.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière)—I suppose if the clause is carried in committee, it can be objected to on third reading.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Certainly.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 14,

Hon. Mr. POWER—Before the committee reports, I wish to make one observation. Clause 14 provides that this Act shall be printed with the said revised statutes. I have not noticed that there is any provision for printing the British North America Act together with the revised statutes, and I think it is desirable that the British North America Act and the Acts which amend it should be printed in the same volume, and further that there should be a table of contents at the beginning as well as an index at the end of the volume.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There will be a fourth volume which does not practically belong to the revised statutes, but which embraces what is known as schedule B, which is referred to also in the Acts of 1886. There will also in that volume be the British North America Act and the Acts amending the British North America Act and likewise the index. That will comprise a fair sized volume. It will make four volumes in all.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the Bill is reported, I should like to ask the hon. Secretary of State, who is in charge of this committee, that all Bills be printed in French. He must understand that if the law exists, if we have a right to have it, we shall claim it. This Bill has passed the committee stage without being printed in French, but I warn the hon. Secretary of State that in future we will insist on our rights, and will ask that all the Bills which come before us be printed in French, and it will be useless for him to ask the House to go into committee unless the Bill is printed in French.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—My hon. friend is quite within his rights in making that request, but we cannot get the translators to do the work. I have made inquiries about it time and again, and the delay is due to the translators.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Get some other translators.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Sir Wilfrid Laurier thought he was getting a good, educated Frenchman in the House of Commons to do the work. Well, that man has been a nuisance from time to time. They present a paper to be printed; he revises it, and will tear the whole thing to pieces, and it has all to be set again. It is impossible to find men who will do the work with some degree of common sense.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If the government will leave the choice to this side of the House we will see that there will be no difficulty.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There seems to be some difference as to the idiom. No two translators will agree. That is where the trouble comes in. After the translation is completed it goes before another translator who finds fault with every fourth or fifth line, and it has all to be reset. You have no idea of the trouble we have. Give us translators that will agree on some idiom.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudiere)—I give notice that when this Bill is up for third reading I shall move that clause 10 be struck out.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE, from the Committee, reported the Bill with amendments, which were concurred in.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at 3 o'clock.

THE SENATE.

OTTAWA, Wednesday, December 5, 1906.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

INTERVENTION OF GOVERNMENT IN STRIKES AND RIOTS.

ORDER OF THE DAY POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being called :

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate a copy of all papers and correspondence having reference to the calling out of militia and to the intervention of the government in the late strikes and riots in Hamilton and Buckingham.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—Will the House permit me to state what the object of my motion is, so that the honourable Senate and the country will know the object I have in view. I have already discussed before this Chamber the question of the payment of the militia by the municipalities when they are called out during labour strikes. I have always contended that the municipalities should not pay for the services for the militia when they are called out under such circumstances, and if the obligation is imposed on the municipalities to pay a substantial sum for the services of the militia, it will necessarily be the cause of great difficulties. The militia may not be called out when necessary. I desire that my motion be allowed to stand for the present.

The motion was allowed to stand.

ROSS RIFLE BUILDINGS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired of the government :

1. To whom do the lands belong upon which are the buildings erected by the Ross Rifle Company, and also the lands which adjoins them ?
2. Had the government the right to dispose of these lands without the consent of the city council of the city of Quebec ?
3. Has it still that right ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The answer to the 1st question is that the title is in the Crown. The 2nd, yes, to the 3rd, yes.

LIFE-SAVING APPLIANCES ON THE PACIFIC COAST.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON rose to Call the attention of the government to an address passed by the legislative assembly of British Columbia on the 12th of March last, urging the government of Canada to establish life-saving appliances on the west coast of Vancouver island; and will inquire of the government if any action has been taken by the government in providing such life-saving appliances ?

He said : In calling attention to this subject I have no desire to take the matter out of the hands of the hon. gentlemen representing British Columbia in this House. I merely introduce it for the purpose of getting preliminary information on the subject of the inquiry that follows regarding Prince Edward Island. I might say as a citizen of Canada, I felt a very deep interest in the question of providing life-saving appliances on the west coast of Canada, having read the appalling story of the loss of life which occurred on that coast in connection with the wreck of the ship 'Valencia' about a year ago.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The government have recently established, or are now building, the following aids to navigation, possible life-saving precaution : A lighthouse and fog alarm on Trial Island—recently put in operation, a whistling buoy at Port San Juan. Light and fog alarm at Camanah will be strengthened. A first class lighthouse and fog alarm station is under construction at Pachena Point, and a temporary light is established. Cape Beale lighthouse has been rebuilt, the light will be improved, and a fog alarm will be established next year. A whistling buoy has been established by the United States government on Swiftsure bank. A whistling buoy has been moored in Carolina channel. Small lights have been established on Swale Rock, Barkley Sound, at Amphitrite Point, Ucluelet ; at Kyuquot entrance ; and at Quatsino entrance. A first-class light is to be built next year on Estevan Point, Hesquiot. A system of Marconi wireless telegraph stations will be established along the west coast. A lifeboat has been built and manned and is now in commission in Victoria, and a wide extension of the life-saving service, including the equipment of a motor life-boat is under consideration of the government, to be kept in Barkley Sound. The question of building a coast road is under consideration of the government. This is a matter that ought to fall within the duties of the provincial government, but the premier of British Columbia having notified the Canadian government that he did not consider it a function of the provincial government, the Dominion government are willing to undertake such work as is required in this direction.

LIFE-SAVING APPLIANCES ON THE COAST OF PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON rose to Call the attention of the House to the serious loss of life caused by the recent wreck of several vessels on the north coast of Prince Edward Island, and to the absence of life-saving appliances in that locality; and will inquire of the government if they intend taking action to provide absolutely necessary facilities to aid in the preservation of the lives of seamen on that coast ?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON.

He said : Hon. gentlemen are, no doubt, aware that early in November we were visited with a series of remarkable storms on that coast and quite a number of ships were cast ashore and many lives lost. It was found that no provision whatever had been found to meet cases of that kind. I shall not take up the time of the House with details of what occurred. Red tapeism in its worse form appeared to stand as an obstacle in the way of obtaining relief. A Finnish barque went ashore on the east point of Prince Edward Island and great difficulty was found in getting the departments or their agents in the province to do anything whatever towards saving those who were wrecked. Several men could be seen from the shore on these wrecks in a most perilous position, and it was known at the time that several lives had been lost. One of the sailors who drifted ashore was still alive, but in a very serious condition. Notwithstanding that state of things the agent of the Department of Marine and Fisheries would not move or do anything without the authority of the department at Ottawa. Finally when a life boat was obtained the Department of Railways would not run a special train to Souris unless $60 was paid. Finally a private citizen put up the $60, and the life-boat was dispatched. All this time valuable human lives were in peril and some were actually lost while official red tapeism stood in the way and prevented anything being done. Very great feeling arose in the province on the subject, and while the officials of the government could not do anything, apparently from the strictness of their orders, and the manner in which they were tied down by the departments in Ottawa, two brave young men whose names will be long remembered in Canada, I hope, Austin Grady and Duncan Campbell, finally took a dory and faced the sea in a terrible state of commotion, went to the wreck, took off three men and saved their lives. While this heroism was being displayed by the people of the locality, public spirit was aroused to the extent of private citizens paying the fares on railways when the officials of the government would not do any thing. My object is not so much to call attention to this, though the blame must rest somewhere for the state of things I have

I notice that very many things have been provided and are to be provided in the case of British Columbia. I observe that part of the British Columbia demand was that a steamer should be maintained on that coast, and, as far as I could follow the hon. Secretary of State, I did not notice that that request had been complied with. In the case of Prince Edward Island no such request as that has been made, and a steamer would not be necessary. The railway runs the entire length of the province, and if there were efficient life-saving appliances available they could be moved along by the railway and sent to any point on the north shore of the province wherever they would be needed. What appears to be required is that these life-saving appliances should be first procured and made available, and secondly that the officials representing the government of the province would be in a position to implement them without having to communicate with the department at Ottawa. It seems extraordinary that when human life is in peril red tapeism would go so far as to require these officers to stand by and allow men to drown without having it in their power to do anything until they would communicate with the departments at Ottawa, and when the whole trouble would be over before any authority could be obtained.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The incident to which my hon. friend has alluded is of course a very regrettable one, and also the fact that persons were in charge there who, when human life was at stake, had not the courage to act independently of any authority. I had no explanation of the fact from the department, and therefore I am unable to discuss that element of it, other than to say that I shall see that the hon. gentleman's remarks reach the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. The answer he has placed in my hands is a very brief one. It reads as follows:—'The department is aware of the recent unfortunate wrecks on Prince Edward Island, and is taking steps to provide a life-saving station on the north coast of the island.'

We hope that the persons in charge of the station will have—and I have no doubt they will possess—the authority to act in a case of emergency such as the hon. gentleman has described.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—I intended to move a resolution somewhat similar to the motion under discussion, relating to the inland waters, but there is no necessity for doing so now that the hon. gentleman from Marshfield has brought in this resolution. I look at it altogether from a humane point of view. I think it concerns all parties, particularly those who live in the neighbourhood of where those accidents are liable to occur. Instead of an investigation in regard to Prince Edward Island, the inquiry should take a much wider scope and should embrace the whole of the inland waters of Canada. There is a resolution on the order paper of the House of Commons with reference to Toronto, and if every one is to move in this matter as accidents occur in any locality, there will be no general system. I think that it is not necessary to establish life-saving stations if the apparatus can be procured at certain points. I live at one of the lake ports, and I do not know as there has been any great loss of life there or any at all, as a result of not having life-saving apparatus, but accidents may happen. I have not the means of knowing just exactly what the causes of these disasters were, but there is no doubt that the season of navigation which has just closed has been fruitful of death by ship wreck, and by stress of weather; therefore I think it would be opportune, if the House will allow me to make the suggestion, that an investigation or an inquiry might be held as to the necessity for obtaining this apparatus, not for one particular locality, but for certain points throughout the whole of Canada, and not for the ocean ports alone, but also for the great lakes and bays, &c. I have no doubt such a measure as that would be necessary in any event. We have every sort of apparatus provided for saving the lives of cattle, and we neglect, I am afraid, the health and the lives of individuals. If we could decide what could be provided in the shape of apparatus of a life saving nature, it would result in much greater good.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—I may say that almost at the same time that the wreck occurred on Prince Edward Island, there was a wreck on the coast of Kent, at Rexton, outside of the bar there in our province, and for three or four days some of the men were alive upon the wreck. They might have been saved if the locality had had some appliances with which to reach them but they were all lost. A few days afterwards there was a wreck on the St. Lawrence. A barque was lost, and all hands were drowned within sight of their home, and there were no appliances to save them. The Rexton disaster was a bad one. The men were Norwegian sailors, and those on the seashore had a good deal of sympathy with them. It seems too bad that these men could not be saved. The answer which the hon. Secretary of State has made to the inquiry in regard to British Columbia is not an answer to the question which the hon. gentleman from Marshfield asked. A lighthouse is not a life-saving appliance in the sense in which we understand it, nor is an electric wire. The government should go to work deliberately, and even at considerable expense provide along the whole of the coast, all the modern appliances of life-saving that are provided by those institutions which are kept up by the United States government. After every storm on their coasts we read of the saving of Canadian sailors along the New England shores by the splendid modern appliances which the United States government have provided. The government should take that matter up. It is true that in the thirty or forty years which have elapsed since confederation, we have secured our coast, but the Department of Marine and Fisheries has not grappled with the important question of having good men and life boats and all the guns and modern appliances by which they are able to throw ropes to ships. I trust the hon. Secretary of State will press upon his colleagues and the government the necessity of making an entirely new departure in doing the work which we have too long neglected, which we have not taken up by reason of the expense of it; but in these days when there is so much public money that we do not know what to do with it, we ought not to leave unanswered the call, particularly as that work is done for us by the United States government on the New England coast, where our own seamen are sometimes in peril.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—I am pleased to learn that it was not at the department the trouble arose. It seems to me from what has been stated that the trouble was entirely with the agent of the Marine Department in Prince Edward Island. Of course the people of Prince Edward Island did not know where the trouble was, and they were very indignant indeed. Fancy a large ship 1,800 tons being torn in two on the ledges on the point of Prince Edward Island. There were human lives on both parts of the vessel and they were there for sixty hours. One after another was carried off. The older ones were washed away first, and it was only the young and strong that were able to endure what these unfortunate people had to undergo. Some of them lashed themselves to deals and reached the shore in that way, the people on the shore coming as far as they could and bringing them to land. Two of these people remained very nearly sixty hours. Young Campbell and Grady took a dory, went out and brought off two, but there was a man left on one part of the ship. There was no getting near him so he lashed himself to a deal and came ashore alive. He was very ill and exhausted for a while, but he revived. All this time the agent of marine dilly-dallied and did nothing at all. We all thought he might have taken the responsibility upon his own shoulders—and the whole people of Prince Edward Island and the people of Canada would have backed him up if he had taken the risk and been man enough to send the life boat down from Charlottetown as quickly as possible and help these people off. I am glad to hear the statement the hon. gentleman has made because if such a thing occurs again we will know where to put the blame.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I think the hon. gentleman from Montague entirely misapprehends the position of the hon. Secretary of State. I understand the hon. Secretary of State did not palliate the act of the department in restricting the instructions given to its agents. All I understood the leader of the government to say was that those men were to be condemned—that is the representatives of the government or the government agents in Prince Edward Island—were to be condemned for not having sufficient courage to entirely disregard the instructions of the Department of Marine and Fisheries. This in no wise should palliate the negligence of the department; in fact I might say the criminal negligence of the Department of Marine and Fisheries in thus restricting the government agents at the various points where they are stationed. These men should certainly be permitted to exercise the very widest discretion in the case of life or death. It is absurd to suppose for one moment that those men should be tied down to the red tapeism to which my hon. friend from Marshfield has referred. This House is certainly under a debt of gratitude to my hon. friend for directing the attention of the government, not only of the government but of the public to this matter, because it is necessary that public opinion should protest most strongly against the administration of a department, or the maladministration of a department such as is indicated by the remarks of my hon. friend from Marshfield. If it were not for the tragic features of the circumstances mentioned, one would think we were listening to a comic opera in relation to the events referred to; that in a case of life and death communication should have to be made between Prince Edward Island and Ottawa to obtain the permission of the Ottawa authorities to allow their representatives in Prince Edward Island to go to the rescue of men on the very verge of death, is monstrous in the extreme. Language certainly is not sufficiently strong to denounce the indifference and negligence of a department so conducted, and I think it is very fortunate in the public interest that attention has been directed to this fact. The only thing I do regret is that my hon. friend in his inquiry did not go further than he has done in having my hon. friend bring down to this Chamber the instructions given by the Department of Marine and Fisheries to these officers. We then might have been able to determine wherein the fault lies; but nothing which has been stated here should for one moment lessen the responsibility of the department to the public for the mal-administration of affairs in this way, and the great loss of life which has resulted therefrom.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I think my hon. friend who has just resumed his seat has entirely misapprehended the position so far as the Department of Marine and Fisheries is concerned. I am speaking without having consulted them on the point, but I will venture to assure him that neither that department or any other department of government has ever issued instructions to their officers which could in any shape or form be construed as forbidding them to render assistance in such a case as the hon. gentleman from Marshfield has described. The department, as a matter of course, could not be expected to provide for every accident or every case that has occurred, but its officers could not say, and could not plead, I am quite sure, that any instructions will ever be found from the department which will forbid them to exercise their discretion in a case of this kind. They may have been unwilling to take the responsibility. That is possible enough, but most assuredly it was not in consequence of instructions from this department. With respect to the important matter that has been brought up, and which well deserves the consideration of honourable gentlemen and of the Senate Chamber as well as the government, as respects the establishment of a proper system of life-saving throughout the Dominion, that may very fairly engage the attention of the Department of Marine and Fisheries. I believe it has been called to it, partly, no doubt, on account of these unfortunate accidents to which allusion has been made; but I would observe to honourable gentlemen generally that our coast line is one of very great extent. If you include the great lakes, I should say our coast line must extend for a matter of five or six thousand miles in all, and we cannot be able or expected to provide life-saving stations at every point along such an extended coast at which accidents may occur. That is not saying that the question should not receive attention. It has received attention from the department, and I have no doubt this discussion will be useful and valuable when brought to the attention of the Department of Marine and Fisheries in encouraging them to proceed further in the establishment of such life-saving stations as can reasonably be provided. Honourable gentlemen who have paid any attention to this matter are aware that even in European countries and particularly in England itself, where very great pains have been taken to provide as many life-saving stations as possible, accidents not unlike those that have been described have very frequently occurred, in which it has not been found possible, even with the appliances so numerous scattered along the English coast, to render relief to the unfortunate sufferers. Nevertheless I quite agree with hon. gentlemen on both sides, that this is a matter which can very fairly engage the attention of the Department of Marine and Fisheries. I do not think it is fair, unless the hon. gentleman has the instructions in his possession, to show that these men were forbidden to render assistance, to accuse them of criminal negligence, because agents at a distance may not always have felt ready to take the responsibility which I think they might very fairly have assumed.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—That is the way I understood it. I never heard that the agent of the Marine Department ever wired to the department for instructions. He allowed two or three days to pass and did literally nothing; therefore the blame rests entirely on him and not on the department.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—My hon. friend from Montague is mistaken in thinking that the agent of the Marine Department did not telegraph. I understood he telegraphed almost immediately, on the application being made to him, to the department for instructions. The superintendent of the railway in Prince Edward Island refused positively, in my own presence, to allow an engine and car to be sent with a life boat until the money was first put up by private citizens. When that was done the life boat, which was at Charlottetown, was taken to the scene of the wreck at East point.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—How many miles is it from Charlottetown to that place?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—About forty miles. The people of Prince Edward Island, knowing that these two young men had at the risk of their lives gone on board this vessel and saved some people who were then at the mercy of the waves on the wreck, had made up the sum of $500 by public subscription and presented it to them for their humane efforts in saving life. I trust and feel assured that the government will bestow on these young men the medals which are generally given to people who have risked their lives in such cases.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Halifax)—I think it would be well if better attention were paid to providing life saving stations more effective in character and better managed than we have at present. We had two life saving stations on the island of Cape Breton established by the imperial government, and afterwards handed over to the government of Nova Scotia, which subsequently came under the control of the Dominion. They had life boats, and I know the value of one of those life saving stations when my own life and the lives of the crew that were with me were saved on St. Patrick's Day, 1857. If a life boat had not been there at that time that would have been the last that would have been known of us. I have had some correspondence with the inspector of lighthouses in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, who reported to me that the appliances of some of those stations were of the crudest kind, and he requested the Department of Marine and Fisheries to send experts to Maine and Massachusetts to study the way that life saving stations are conducted there. Even if we do not increase the number—and I hope we will—it would be well that those we have should be of the best quality, and the men in charge of them properly trained for the purpose of saving life. As my hon. friend from St. John has well said, the government has money to burn and it could not be better employed than in providing properly equipped life-saving stations of the most improved character.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—I have no desire to prolong this discussion, important though it is, but I watched the newspapres very closely at the time of these occurrences. They were very indignant at the conduct of the government officials, and I never saw any mention of the agent of the Marine Department having wired to Ottawa for instructions. If he did eventually do so, it must have been at a very late date after the public had become indignant at his conduct. I am doubtful if he did so at all. He allowed these men to be lost while he dallied away the time, and did nothing.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is just one point which is suggested by this discussion, which is that it now becomes the duty of the government to make some inquiry into the conduct of their officers in Prince Edward Island. If it is a fact that the superintendent of the island railway refused to allow an engine to go to Souris, and if the agent of the Marine and Fisheries Department neglected his duty, then the conduct of these gentlemen should be investigated, and should it be found that they have not done their duty, they should be got rid of and others appointed who will act differently.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—This is unquestionably an exceedingly important matter, and I entirely concur in the remarks that have dropped from the hon. senators from Halifax. If the individual in charge of the Prince Edward Island Railway positively refused in such an emergency to allow the use of an engine and car to take a lifeboat for the purpose of saving life, he is not fit to fill a public position, and the government should remove him. A man possessed of so little human feeling as to refuse to let a life-boat be taken to the scene of a wreck until a deposit of $60 was made, should not hold a public office. I hope the government will hold an investigation, and if that man has been guilty of any such conduct he should not be continued where he is. I admit the force of the statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce that we have a very extended coast line. Canada has been endeavouring to provide protection for her marine business by the erection of lighthouses, and they have been constructed as rapidly, I presume, as the resources at the command of the government would permit. There are two or three places where special effort should be put forth. We all regret very seriously the unfortunate disasters that have taken place on the St. Lawrence, and think that the government should spare no money that may be necessary to equip the whole of that important water-course with lighthouses, and provide fog horns to such an extent as to render navigation safe. That is a national matter. Every Canadian has an interest in the great St. Lawrence waterway, and its navigation should be made as safe as human ingenuity can make it. Another exceedingly important water route is that from Owen Sound and the eastern coast of Georgian bay to the head of Lake Superior. That should be protected by lighthouses and fog horns to render it as safe as it can possibly be made. An unfortunate disaster took place recently on the west coast of Georgian bay. A steamer, possibly a local steamer, and not very seaworthy, left Owen Sound with twenty-six people on board altogether, every one of whom was lost. It has not been ascertained yet whether that disaster was due to want of lighthouses and fog horns.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The vessel went down in seventy feet of water.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—That is a very important stretch of navigable water. The accumulation of freight in the western provinces is likely to become larger, and the traffic carried by that route is likely to increase steadily, and every kind of protective apparatus should be provided to save human life when disasters occur. With regard to the Prince Edward Island matter, I quite agree that some efforts should be made to protect those who are exposed to the dangers of the sea on that coast. No doubt the Minister of Marine and Fisheries feels he has a very serious burden on his shoulders, and is doing all he can to protect life and save property. We have had a statement from the hon. Secretary of State with regard to the unfortunate wreck at Vancouver, and it is quite clear that active measures have been taken to prevent the recurrence of such a disaster, and works are now in progress with that end in view. We have such an enormous coast line that it is not much wonder if some portion of the work has not yet been reached, but I hope the Marine Department will never cease their active efforts until our whole coast is so efficiently protected that disasters may be reduced, human life saved, and the great sacrifices of past years may not be repeated.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—In connection with the Prince Edward Island matter the action of the official in requiring a deposit of $60 before he would allow an engine to carry a life boat to save drowning men is particularly odious. Somebody must be responsible for that. I do not believe for a moment that an order to exact $60 for saving the lives of five or six persons emanated from my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals. However, the condition is so grave that the public should know upon whose shoulders the blame must rest. The suggestion that an investigation should be made to find out the guilty person or persons is a proper one. The department at Ottawa must feel like relieving themselves from the odium of all this matter if they can. If they cannot, let them have the opprobrium of it, but let the person who was callous and lacking in humanity to the extent of exacting money to save the lives of men who were shipwrecked be known, and let them be punished by public opinion or otherwise.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I have no desire to defend the agent of the Department of Marine and Fisheries or the superintendent of the Prince Edward Island Railway in this matter. As far as the latter is concerned the only consequence to him of violating any instruction would have been the loss of the $60. His conduct in refusing to allow an engine to be used to take a life boat to Souris contrasts very unfavourably with the conduct of Austin Grady and Duncan Campbell who risked their lives to save those unfortunate seamen. On that account I cannot possibly undertake to defend the conduct of the superintendent of the railway. I should like to be informed whether the department has remitted the $60 paid to permit the engine to be sent out ?

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have never heard of it. This is the first time I have heard of the incident.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I would not expect my hon. friend to know it, but it would be interesting to learn if the department remitted the $60 to the gentleman who paid it out of his own pocket on that occasion. This is not a new question so far as that department is concerned. We know that the agent in the province is tied down by very strict rules and has been again and again threatened with severe consequences if he violated any of the regulations. Less than three years ago the steamer 'Stanley' got entangled in the ice, where she remained for three months. The other steamer went to her assistance, and broke her propeller and remained in the ice drifting about and lives were imperilled, and yet Mr. Lord was not permitted at very critical times to do anything without wiring to Ottawa for permission to act. Finally, as in this case, citizens took the matter in hand themselves, and at their own expense—perhaps it was reimbursed afterwards—they assisted very materially in rescuing the crews of those boats. I do not say that efforts were not put forth during that time by the agent of the department, but red tapeism appeared over and over again at that critical time when many lives and valuable property were in danger. It is no new thing to us in Prince Edward Island to learn that the agent of the Department of Marine and Fisheries is not permitted to offer assistance even in cases where the safety of human life was involved.

THE TERMINAL STATION AT QUEBEC.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY moved :

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that His Excellency will be pleased to cause to be laid before this House a copy of all the correspondence exchanged between the government or the chairman of the Commissioners of the Transcontinental Railway, or any other of the said commissioners, and the different railway companies having, or about to have access, to Quebec, or any other association or body or person whomsoever, on the subject of the choice to be made, of a union, central or terminal railway station in the city of Quebec ; as well as of every report whatsoever made on this subject, whether by the companies or the bodies in question, or by the aforesaid commissioners.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The subject is still under consideration, and therefore there are no papers that can be brought down until some decision is reached. It is not usual to bring down papers while a matter is under consideration.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I suppose if the subject is under consideration we shall have before long the government's decision. But in the meantime why should we not have the correspondence between the government and the chairman of the commission and other parties ? The question is this : two set of railways have already or require access to Quebec. The Canadian Pacific Railway enters by the north of the city, as also do the Quebec and Lake St. John Railway, the Great Northern Railway, and in the future I am told, the Quebec and Lake Huron also will enter on the north. At the south, the Quebec Central and probably in the near future the Delaware and Hudson having acquired the railway called the Quebec, Montreal and Southern, will enter from the south by the bridge. These are the railways entering at Quebec outside of the National Transcontinental.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—The Grand Trunk Railway.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The Grand Trunk Railway and Intercolonial Railway are on the south shore also. The Grand Trunk Railway and National Transcontinental Railway may be regarded as the same line. Those railways are supposed to come into Quebec by a bridge built, not in Quebec but in a parish near Quebec. The Transcontinental wants a station, and if such a station be a union one, the other railway companies are supposed to contribute to its erection. The place where the proposed station is expected to be built is at the Champlain market at the foot of the terrace on which the Chateau Frontenac is built. The place is very narrow. I suppose the market will be expropriated, but you cannot find room for a railway terminus for all those roads at that place. Those that enter on the north side have no interest in it at all, and those on the south shore coming over the bridge will require room for yards and accommodation for their trains. Though there is not sufficient room at the foot of the terrace, public rumour in Quebec states that certain parties have acquired some lots and houses in that locality which they are to sell to the Grand Trunk Pacific, or to the railroads which combine to have a union station at the foot of the terrace. I think the government should tell us what has taken place and what offers have been made. Until lately the Canadian Pacific Railway and the other railways which enter on the north side have been opposed to the scheme which places the union station on the site of the Champlain market. Suddenly the Canadian Pacific and the other railways have changed their minds. We want to know the cause of that change, and what the scheme actually is. It should be in the public interest as well as in the interest of the city of Quebec and of the commerce of the country generally to select the best place for a central or union station, and I call the attention of the government before the choice is made to the physical impossibility of constructing a union station at the foot of the terrace. It may serve private interests but it will never suit the public interest.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—The hon. member is not properly informed. I happened to attend, representing the interest of the Delaware and Hudson, or the Quebec, Montreal and Southern Railway, the first meeting called about six weeks ago, and the consensus at that meeting of the railways there represented, except the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian Northern, was in favour of a station at the foot of the terrace. Two committees were formed, one for the shipping interest and one for the railway interest and it was decided to obtain the necessary information from three engineers—the engineer of the Harbour Board, the engineer of the Transcontinental Commission and another engineer, I forget his name, representing another interest.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—All representing the same interests.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—These three engineers made reports. Two of them agreed upon one suggestion and the other made a different suggestion. These reports were submitted to a new meeting ; that of the dissenting engineer was not entertained. There were three meetings altogether, and at the last meeting the Canadian Pacific Railway was represented by its vice-president Mr. McNicol, who declared the willingness of the Canadian Pacific to join in building a station of that kind provided it would not interfere with the location of the Chateau Frontenac. Of course the question has not been entirely matured yet ; it will have to be ascertained whether there is enough space between the cliff and the river.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—So far the very strong impression of all the parties interested is that there is sufficient space for their requirements ; therefore I doubt if there is any occasion for the objection made by the hon. member. Anyway it is premature to entertain these doubts. The hon. gentleman should wait until the parties interested have come to a final conclusion in the matter.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—This question is of the greatest importance not only to Quebec, but to the railways and the public in general. As a matter of fact, the whole city of Quebec, except a few people, are against the union station being built at the Champlain market, because there is no space, and it will cost an immense amount of money which could be expended in a better way. The board of trade and the harbour commissioners are against it. A few days ago I brought the question myself before the board of trade. We had a big meeting and it was unanimous in pronouncing itself against the site at the foot of the terrace, on the ground that there is not space enough. In order to put the question fairly before the public and to enable the government to study it properly, I suggest that a commission of three independent engineers should be appointed to ascertain if it is possible to locate a station there, and, if it is not, where would be the best place to put it. I have no personal interest, and nearly all members of the board of trade have none in the matter. I know there was a report of some engineers, as the hon. gentleman from DeSalaberry has mentioned ; three engineers were appointed who pronounced themselves one against and two in favour of that site, but the two were the engineers of the bridge company and of the Grand Trunk Pacific, and I am not much mistaken in saying that their report was made on the advice of the chairman of these two companies, and the chairman of these two companies is Mr. Parent. I do not wish to discuss the question at length here, but the government will do well to look into the matter before arriving at a decision.

As a matter of fact, at the meeting referred to where the press was excluded if my information is correct—and I think it is—it was only the Bridge Company and the Transcontinental Company who were in favour of that site. Perhaps they had good reason for it. But all the other companies were against. Mr. McNicol, of the Canadian Pacific Railway, later on said he had no objection to have the Union Station at the Champlain market; but I am not surprised, because the way he put it his company will gain much; their trains will take passengers from the Union, then taking them at their present one and go to Montreal. If I were interested I would be in favour of that, but he added that if all moneys that were to be spent for wharfs, &c., ought to be spent according to the views of the corporation and not what the Board of Trade and Harbour Commissioners are asking, from Champlain market up to Sillery. According to the report of the two engineers it would cost over $10,000,000.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—$15,000,000.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Perhaps it will cost $15,000,000 or $20,000,000 to build the wharf, &c., asked for and erect a station there. I have no interest in it whatever, but I know the Board of Trade and Harbour Commissioners are against that site. I know the parties, especially the parties who are interested in the Grand Trunk Pacific and the bridge company are very strong in their determination, and the president of the two companies is the same man. The two engineers who report favourably to their views, are reliable men, but are in the hands of the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Bridge Company, and they made a report to their company. I think we should have a commission of disinterested men to make a report, and if these men say that Champlain market is the best site I will support them. I do not know what my hon. friend has said, but as far as Quebec is concerned, nine-tenths of the public are against the site, because they say there is no reason to put it there. It is a bad place to put it. I think the Government should pause before accepting the reports of the Grand Trunk Pacific Bridge Company and taking action in the matter.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is nothing to bring down. While the matters are in an unfinished condition it is absurd to ask for correspondence, and it only tends to make the final settlement more difficulty.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If it is as absurd as the hon. gentleman says, then he must know all about it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I know nothing about it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—He says they have come to no decision and are deliberating on the mattter. We might allow the motion to stand until another day or drop it for the moment.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Dropped.

The motion was dropped.

TENDERS FOR SLEEPERS ON TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY.

INQUIRY POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being called :

Hon. Mr. LANDRY that he will inquire of the government—

1. Have the commissoners of the Transcontinental Railway asked for tenders for supply of sleepers for any part whatsoever of the Transcontinental Railway ?
2. Who are the tenderers ?
3. What are the prices asked by each of them?
4. Who obtained the contract ?
5. At what price and for what quantity ?
6. Has the contractor begun the execution of his contract ?
7. What quantity has he delivered up to this date?
8. To whom and at what place ?
9. What amount of money has he received in payment ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have a letter from Mr. Butler, in which he says that he has been unable to obtain that information but hopes he will be furnished with it in a few days.

The Order of the Day was allowed to stand.

SALE OF LOCOMOTIVES AT HADLOW COVE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired of the government—

1. To whom, where and when were the workshops for repairing locomotives at Hadlow Cove, Lévis, sold ?
2. Were there tenders for the purchase or the pulling down of these workshops ?
3. What was the price paid ?
4. How much freight do the purchasers pay on the materials to transport them from Lévis to St. Romuald or elsewhere?
5. Is it to the knowledge of the government that a member of parliament has bought, or obtained from the contractors who are demolishing these workshops, a part of the woodwork in order to build stores upon his properties?
6. What price did this member of parliament pay to the Intercolonial Railway for the transportation of these materials from Hadlow Cove to Lévis?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The answers to the hon. gentleman's questions are as follows:

1. The workshops for repairing locomotives at Hadlow Cove, Levis, were sold to Mr. Joseph Garand, of St. Romuald, in October, 1906.

2. No tenders were asked, but offers were received from three parties.

3. One thousand dollars ($1,000) paid to the railway, and the site to be cleared of the rubbish, party taking away old materials.

First party asked $2,500, and the old materials, to clean the site.

Second party offered to clear site for the old material, which he wished to keep; balance to be removed by the railway at its expense.

Third party offered to pay $1,000, and remove material—which was accepted.

4. There are no special rates, and it is presumed regular tariff rates are being paid on the materials if any are being carried over the railway.

5. No.

6. Answered by No. 4.

STRANDING OF STEAMER 'KENSINGTON.'

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY moved :

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that His Excellency will be pleased to cause to be laid before this House a copy of all the correspondence exchanged between the Department of Marine and Fisheries or any person or any company whatsover on the subject of the stranding at Matane of the steamer 'Kensington,' as well as of the inquiry which has been made into this subject, and of the judgment rendered by the commissioner making the inquiry.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is no objection to the motion.

The motion was agreed to.

VACANCIES IN THE SENATE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER inquired :

Whether it is the intention of the government to appoint successors in the Senate to the honourable messieurs Dever and Wark ?

When will those two vacancies be filled if they are ever going to be ?

He said : It is with the best intention, and in a kindly spirit that I make this inquiry. I do not doubt for a moment that the government have good reasons for not filling the vacancies, but the public is desirous of knowing what those reasons are. These vacancies have existed for several years, especially in the case of the late Senator Dever. It may be that the government is in the same predicament in New Brunswick as they appear to be in Nova Scotia, where they can find no candidates to fill two vacancies that exist there. They did find one gentleman, if I am well informed, but he refused to accept. If the government are in the same predicament, if I may use the expression in regard to New Brunswick; if they cannot find gentlemen among their supporters who will accept the position—I know, however, many gentlemen among them who would fill the position most creditably—if no gentlemen of the Liberal party is willing to fill the vacancy, I will venture, with all humility, but in the best of spirit, to offer the government some help from this side of the House, and suggest to them Conservatives, equally as fit and competent as their Liberal friends, who would condescend to accept the position. I have the honour at the present moment of proferring my good offices to the government.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The matter is now engaging the attention of the government, and I hope the vacancies referred to will be filled within a reasonable time.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—May I ask the hon. minister what he understands by a reasonable time ?

CORRESPONDENCE IN REFERENCE TO KING'S COLONIALS.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE moved :

He said : I suppose the motion for this address will hardly receive any consideration by anybody, because hon. members do not know what I am driving at, and I am sure that they will hardly understand it. My object in the proposed motion is to bring before Canada and the British empire beyond the seas the desirability of bringing together by an elastic bond all the loyal youth desiring to serve the empire at any critical moment, not to take the place of or interfere with the colonial forces, so-called, and not to interfere with the legislation of any of the colonies in regard to providing for a standing army. The King's Colonials was a regiment which existed in England, which I had the honour of visiting lately, inaugurated with the idea of appealing to the whole of the British empire for a volunteer force that would be willing to serve, if the necessity arose, without involving the idea of a tax being placed on the country, or colony, and subject to the call of parliament or of the people for the defence of the empire. It naturally would not be the wish of Canada, at any rate at the present day, to impose a war tax on the country, even in an emergency for defending the empire beyond the seas at any point that the empire might become involved, and therefore this regiment, which is endorsed by the Prince of Wales—nay, more than endorsed, because he is the Colonel Commandant of the regiment—was inaugurated. There are two gallant officers in the regiment who served in South Africa, Colonel Lawrence and Colonel Fortescue. The regiment was raised, not merely with the consent, but under the distinct patronage of the Prince of Wales, and has enlisted sympathy all over the world. It is a regiment of volunteers who are willing at any moment to say : 'We are ready to serve the empire,' but they are not to be forced out. Therefore it is called the King's Colonials, and they meet every year, and they have a squadron or a couple of squadrons, as the case may be, from Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and other parts of the world, and they come together in a friendly way from all over the world and discuss matters. They exchange views, and perhaps will tell the public in England what can be done in the colonies for the mother country. It seems to be a good idea that there should be headquarters in England of a volunteer army who are ready to serve, not by dictation from any one, not by forced taxation or by enrolment by any part of the empire, whether they wanted to go or not, but a regiment which would be willing to go to the front whenever the empire got into danger, and whenever the mother country wanted assistance—a volunteer corps entirely from the first to last. I have a couple of letters here, which I shall not bother the House with, which I wrote and which were placed before the Prince of Wales. I presume no one has a right to refer to the Prince of Wales except in his military capacity as commandant of a corps. His name appears on the army list, and one is able to refer to him as any other officer commanding a corps. However, I expressed my views that this should not be called the King's Colonials, but should be called the King's Legion, so that every nationality could join in it, and every regiment of any nationality in Canada or elsewhere could ask to be affiliated with that regiment in England known as the King's Legion. Then all parts of the empire, Canada and Australia and the other colonies, would have an affiliated force of their own, not only to defend their country but to deal with civil, internal difficulties if necessary. There should be something very gratifying in having an army that would be prepared to come to the front and place their services at the disposal of the empire, regiment by regiment, squadron by squadron, battery by battery, as the case might be, and that without any pressure from the colonies or pressure from the government. It seemed to strike the people as the correct idea, and I simply said : 'I will make it my business to lay this matter before the British authorities, and if there is any credit to be given for it, that Canada should be the very first in the whole British empire to lead the van in these matters. In these days nations are watching to see how they can overcome each other. They look at England with her fleet. The taxpayer in England is only able to show the world at large a very small army, four divisions, which may be sent at any moment to some part of the world, not so much for aggression as for defence, looking to India and elsewhere, and if England should get into trouble, the first line of defence is her fleet, and if that fleet is overcome by the opposing fleet, then England has nothing to do but rely on every male in England to defend the home and homestead. The world is watching what England is doing. The nations know that while she has her great colonial possessions at her back she will be able to say : 'They are a part of England's standing army.' In these countries themselves there is an immense army, an immense legion, 500,000 men, as the case may be, according as the patriotism of the empire rises to the occasion. Not only is England willing to stake the last man that she has got to defend the empire, but there is a willingness all over the world on the part of the volunteers to come to her service, and any nation attacking England has to face the fact that in Australia, Canada and New Zealand they have an immense army ready to back them. I may say that I have studiously avoided speaking to any members of the government on this subject, because I did not want to entangle them in the matter, nor did I want it to be thought that they were taking part in it whatever. As a member of this House, I have ventured to bring before the people of Canada my impression, as gained in England, and I desire that this impression shall go throughout the world, that the first British possession to express an opinion on it is this great country of Canada. No matter what our ideas may be politically, we are united in our patriotism and faith, in the future of this great country. Canada will be able, in future to say : 'The youth and volunteers of Canada will take their part in the defence of the empire, whether English, Scotch, Irish or French. It is simply a volunteer proposition, and it cannot be considered in any other sense. I merely throw out these suggestions for the consideration, not only of Canada but the British empire beyond the seas at large. This is only the commencement of the move. It binds nobody. It merely involves the idea of what may be done in respect of the mother country if trouble should ever arise and foreign nations would consider the fact that England has an immense army ready to help her if she should require it. It will not involve the government in any way. This King's Legion would be affiliated with regiments all over the British empire who desire to be connected with this great movement in England with regard to the whole empire. It does not require any legislation. It does not ask the government to place any tax on the people, or vote supply, or anything else, but these regiments in Canada and all over the world will consider it one of the greatest honours to be able to wear on the breast a small badge showing that they are part of the British empire, showing that they are affiliated with the King's Legion, and that the King's Legion is commanded by the Prince of Wales, the future king of this country. I desire to take this method of bringing the matter before the House. I do not suppose there are any papers to be brought down.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Minister of Militia states that he has had no correspondence.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—I suppose not. If the House will permit me, I shall withdraw the motion.

The motion was withdrawn.

FRENCH TRANSLATION.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I asked the hon. leader of the government if he was correctly reported last night in his remarks about the French translation. At page 64 of the unrevised edition of the Debates, he is reported as saying :—

> It is impossible to find men who will do the work with some degree of common sense.

Did the hon. gentleman really use that expression?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not know if these are the exact words. Perhaps that may be an exaggeration, but I have had occasion to criticise the long delays that have taken place in regard to translating papers from English into French. What I stated was, that often a translation was made by one official, would be taken up by another official, who would tear it all to pieces after the type had been set up. I have in my hands an illustration of what was sent down as a revise to the Bureau. That has been revised by another translator, and it is an illustration of a common practice.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—If it is true that the translators are good for nothing, I am sure that we could find hundreds of men who would be efficient. If the translators at present employed are not good ones, they should be dismissed and good men procured, but I do not like the statement to go to the country that these translators have no common sense. If they are no good, kick them out. I should not like that statement to appear in the debates. If the statement of the hon. minister is true, and can be proved, the only course is to dismiss these men and procure competent translators.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not make the appointment, nor does the government. I have been charged constantly by my friends from Quebec with neglecting the French translation, and it is quite apparent that the French translation is not prepared when it should be. I will take the order paper for to-day. Orders Nos. 1, 2 and 3, are printed in English only. No. 1 is Bill (B). The French copy was received on November 30th, Friday. The first proof was sent out on Saturday ; it was returned on Monday. The revise was sent out. They made the corrections on the same day—that is the revise after the proof had been corrected. That was on November 3rd, and that revise was sent back to-day. As far as Bill (B) was concerned, the French copy was sent to the Bureau on Friday last and the revise was only received to-day.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It was kept at the Bureau.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, I gave you the date on which the Bureau sent it back. The proof was kept back. Now I will give you the facts about Bill (A.)

The French copy was received at the Bureau on Tuesday November 29th. The first proof was sent out the following day. It was returned on the Monday following. They were not satisfied with that, and another revise was sent on December 3rd. That was kept over until December 5 and was not sent back to the Bureau. That is the history of every one of them. Hon. gentleman say it is the fault of the Bureau ; it is never the fault of the Bureau. The printing is done there more quickly than in any office in Canada. Take the House of Commons ; they already have had six or seven Bills in print—No. 2, November 30th, No. 3, 4 and 5, November 29th, Nos. 6, &c., December 5th. None of them were as early as those sent from this place, but the translators of the House of Commons have confidence in the Bureau, and they sent the order to print. In this House it is not so. —it comes back and back and back again. The government have no control over it. The inquiries I have made from time to time at the Bureau show that the Bureau is not to blame for it. They are exceedingly prompt, but when the proofs are kept here for days and days and not sent down promptly delay is inevitable. Take Bill (E) : That Bill was printed nearly a week ago, and yet we have not the French copy here yet.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—There are two on the staff of French translators. Mr. Bouchard and Mr. Chapman are entrusted with the translating of the Debates, and in fairness to them, I should like to ask the Secretary of State whether the proofs which he exhibited are any part of their work ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I know nothing at all about the internal economy.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—It is not part of their work. Their work is under the special control of the Debates Committee, and as chairman of that committee, I kept track of the work done by them during the recess, by way of pressing the publication and circulation of the French edition of the Debates, and I am in a position to say that there was considerable delay in the Printing Bureau. No doubt they had good reason for it, but the translations were promptly made, and the proofs were promptly corrected and returned, yet weeks and months intervened without the printing being done. I suggest that a motion be placed on the minutes of the committee asking the officials to appear before the committee on Friday next for the purpose of explaining the cause of the delay. Now, as far as the other part of the question is concerned, it is the first time that the matter was called to my attention, and if the hon. Secretary of State, when there is any delay, will bring it to the notice of the Debates Committee, the committee will see that there shall be no further delay. I am not in a position to speak so far as the other translators are concerned. I have not followed their work. I did not think there was any occasion to do so, but the committee will no doubt deem it advisable to look after their part of the work. So far as the translation of the debates is concerned, a record is kept, and we can trace each page, the day on which it was translated, the day it was sent to the Printing Bureau, when the proof was received from the Printing Bureau and when returned to the Printing Bureau. When the revise was received, and when it was sent back, with a certificate that it was ready for printing, and at the end of it the Printing Bureau is responsible for the balance of the delay. We have therefore a complete check, and I am in a position to put those details before the House at any time they are required. I make these remarks in fairness to Mr. Bouchard and Mr. Chapman, to show that these gentlemen are not in fault, because I have ascertained how they conducted their work.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I agree with every word that has fallen from the hon. Secretary of State. I have some connection with the Printing Bureau, and I know something about the Internal Economy Committee. The appointments were made regardless of the political leanings of the men appointed, solely on the recommendation of hon. gentlemen from the province of Quebec, who understand the French language.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—To whom does the hon. gentleman refer?

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I am speaking now of the Internal Economy Committee. If there are any faults to be found with the gentlemen who do the translating, a committee of experts should be appointed, gentlemen who understand the French language thoroughly, and they should make a report to this committee, and stop the incessant cry about the work falling behind, and blaming the Printing Bureau and the Secretary of State who really have nothing to do with it. The matter belongs to the Internal Economy Committee and the Debates Committee. You have heard from the chairman of the Debates Committee that there is no fault to be found with the translation of the Debates. The fault lies with the other translators, and it is not in the power of any hon. gentleman on either side of the House, who does not understand the French language to say who is to blame. Certainly, if there are two sets of men pulling against each other, the sooner that sort of business is stopped the better. We are paying large salaries, yet the salaries never seem to be adequate to the work they do. There is complaint on that ground annually, and before any further salary question is considered by the Internal Economy Committee, a committee of experts who understand the French language should be appointed to look into the whole matter.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—It is very unfair to bring that piece of paper as proof against the translators. The paper the hon. gentleman has read to us dates from 1891. On that sheet of paper there are three columns, two English and one French, and most of the errors are in the English columns. Most of the errors in the French column are typographical and not errors in translation. I do not undertake to defend the translators of 1891, but it is most unfair to say that the translation now is improperly done when the proof furnished dates back 15 years to 1891. It may be the French translation is late, but it is not because the translation is faulty, but because there are not enough translators employed. They have too much work on their hands. Before charging them with incompetency or lack of common sense, would it not be better to see if they are not over-worked? I repeat, with all respect to my hon. friend the Secretary of State, it is unfair to bring that paper here and submit it as proof against the translators when it is not applicable to the translators of to-day. I know the French translators and I know they are first-class men in every respect. They are old hands at the work and do their duty, and if there is delay in the translation it must not be charged to them, but to the fact that they are over-worked.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I did not intend to connect the document from which I quoted with the present translators. I was speaking generally of the work sent down to the Bureau, and the proofs and the revises. No other printing office in Canada would tolerate the treatment served out to the Bureau. Not only the translators but officials who make out the reports, instead of preparing them in typewriting and having them corrected, send their reports down in a careless way and only complete their work when they get the proofs. Necessarily that involves very many alterations. I produced that sample as proof of what I said, and not to connect the present translators with it. I gave it in answer to the accusation made yesterday as to the delay in translation. The Bureau keep a record of the time manuscript is sent to them, the time when the proofs are sent out and when revises are furnished, and when proofs and revises are returned. I have given the dates and every hon. gentleman can see the record relating to all the Bills on our order paper to-day.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—In regard to one of those entries, I am informed that what we call the order to print was given yesterday morning—that is the Bill we were discussing relative to the revised statutes—with a recommendation to rush it through for three o'clock. That was given yesterday morning; we did not receive the Bill until to-day at three o'clock.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There appears to be unnecessary delay. That is the one fact which I think is clear. It is the duty of the Clerk of the House, who is head of the executive of the House and the duty of the Committee on Internal Economy to locate the blame. We cannot do it here, and now that attention has been called to it, I assume that the committee and the clerk will do their duty.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—As a member of the Debates Committee, I wish to express my entire approval of what the chairman of that committee, the hon. member from De Salaberry has said. The committee has charge and management of the Debates and not of the other part of the work of translation. I am the more satisfied with what has been said, because when one of the gentlemen who now performs according to the certificate given him by the chairman of the committee, his duty so commendably, was appointed, I was chairman of the Debates committee. At that time I had some clash with the leader of the government on account of the supposed political complexion of the applicant. I did not know then to what political party the gentleman belonged, but I knew he was a competent man, and I insisted as much as I could—perhaps I was unparliamentary on that occasion—on the recommendation of the committee being carried out. The hon. gentleman will remember that when two or three years ago some other gentleman (I will not give the names) were appointed to look after the translation of the laws of the country, I asked that he should show that he was competent in all respects. That gentleman is certainly all right, but this being technical work, I asked it be not made a political affair but that the translator whosoever he might be, should prove himself equal to the task. I was voted down. I say this not to hurt in anyway the gentleman who has charge of the laws, but simply to vindicate the position I took then, that there are enough positions in this country that can be occupied by Tom, Dick and Harry to enable the government to recompense their faithful service with them and to leave technical positions to be occupied by men who are qualified to fill them. Now, to-day I have my vindication. I am sorry it is so for those gentlemen are fine men; but we suffer here for the lack of something that is made apparent by the situation we are in. Among the translators there are very good men. Most of them are good men, and I am sure that in the remarks he made last night the hon. leader of the government went a little further than he intended, because I know him to be a kindly and just man. I wish to vindicate the capability of most of the translators, but I again urge the government—I do not care which government it may be—when it comes to appointing men to do technical work, such as the translation of our laws, to set politics aside, or if politics must be considered, to see that the nominee be a man who is competent to fill the position.

Hon. Mr. COFFEY—Although the proofs shown by the hon. Secretary of State are not of recent date I can assure hon. gentleman that I have seen proofs of last year's work coming from the Printing Bureau that were pretty much along the same lines. This is simply disgraceful. I know such a thing would not be tolerated in any other printing office in the country. It is the cause of a great deal of the delay which occurs in getting the French work done. Now the fact is this; the translators, or the gentlemen in whose charge the work may be, should see first of all that they agree on what they want before they send the manuscripts to the Bureau to be printed. They should send clean copy, without mistakes, and in that case there will be no necessity for revises, no necessity for those vexatious delays. If the copy is sent in proper shape to the Bureau, I guarantee that it will come to us in good shape and in good time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—All the blame does not rest with the translators. I do not want that to be inferred by any one. I think it is in the transmission up and down between this Chamber and the Bureau, and the officials who receive it here who probably do not hand it to the translators in proper time. As far as I have been able to ascertain, I think there is a considerable loss of time after the proofs are sent up here before they are put in the hands of the translators.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—Why not send them direct?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is for the committee in charge to make the arrangements. There is a large waste of time, perhaps half a day or longer in that connection, between the message when it comes from the Bureau and before it reaches the translator, so I do not want to place all the blame on the translator. As my hon. friend from London (Mr. Coffey) observed, if the copy was sent down in good shape it would be correct when returned. There are good French scholars in the Bureau who are on the different machines and at the desk, men who are just as capable of translating as any one you can get, and they with the translations from the House of Commons take more responsibility than they do with translations from the Senate, therefore the revises do not go down from the House of Commons as frequently as they do from the Senate.

THE SOLICITOR GENERALSHIP.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to ask the leader of the government if any progress has been made in the nomination of a Solicitor General for Canada ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have heard nothing recently on the subject.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman has heard that he lost the one he had.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I understand that.

FRENCH VERSION OF REVISED STATUTES BILL.

THIRD READING POSTPONED.

The Orders of the Day being called :

Third reading Bill (B) An Act respecting the Revised Statutes, 1906, and to provide for the French version thereof.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—An hon. senator has asked me to postpone this Bill until to-morrow. I do not desire to press it on if the hon. gentleman has a reasonable objection.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I have conveyed my objection to the hon. gentleman and to the Minister of Justice.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved that the Order of the Day be discharged and that it be fixed for to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Would my hon. friend have any objection to stating that reason now, so that we may consider it before the third reading? Before the question comes up to-morrow we may desire to give it further consideration. If there is any vital objection it should be stated now.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—The objection is mainly what I mentioned yesterday in reference to clause 10 of the Bill. I have not had time enough to come to a final conclusion as to the form of the objection which shall be made with reference to that clause, and, therefore, I am not prepared to deal with the matter to-day. I saw the Minister of Justice for a moment and suggested that the matter should be laid over until to-morrow to give time to consider it.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—Is it understood that we shall have the Bills printed in only one language ? It has always been the rule to print them in the two languages ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think this Bill is printed in French. It has been distributed this afternoon.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I believe in senatorial courtesy, as they call it at Washington, but on the other hand hon. gentlemen who ask for a departure from our Orders of the Day should consider somewhat the convenience of the whole body. Now I put this to the hon. gentleman from De Salaberry : We are waiting here and the principle business we have to do before we adjourn over the Christmas holidays is to get this Bill passed through both Houses, and assented to by the Governor or his deputy. Now every day that this Bill is detained in this House means a day's postponement for our adjournment for the Christmas holidays. That does not affect the hon. member from De Salaberry alone ; it affects the 80 odd members of this House, and if there is anything wrong with the Bill, which I humbly submit there is not, that wrong can be made right in the House of Commons, just as well as here. When the Minister of Justice and the hon. member from De Salaberry have agreed as to the form in which the 10th clause of the Bill should appear, the amendment can be made in the House of Commons without involving necessarily the delay that putting it off from day to day here does. I would appeal to the hon. gentleman from De Salaberry to have a little consideration for the rest of us who are anxious to get home as soon as we reasonably can.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—Knowing the reasons why the hon. member from De Salaberry asks that the Bill be postponed, I would answer the hon. gentleman from Halifax by saying that the honour of the Senate would be more affected if the Bill were passed as it is than by having it delayed for some time.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I did not ask the hon. gentleman, who has just spoken; I asked the hon. member from De Salaberry, and I appeal to him.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Sometimes when I ask a question of the hon. minister, it is the hon. gentleman from Halifax who answers me.

The motion was agreed to.

TREATY BETWEEN CANADA AND JAPAN BILL.

SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (E) an Act respecting a certain treaty between Canada and Japan. He said: Hon. gentlemen are aware from the observations I made when introducing this Bill, that it requires the sanction of parliament. The Bill proper consists of only three lines—— 'The convention of the 31st day of January, 1906, which is set forth in the schedule of this Act is hereby sanctioned.' We have no power of course to alter the treaty itself. That is attached to the Bill and is practically the Bill. I would therefore ask that this clause be read at the table, and the Bill passed through its several stages, suspending rule 63, as we cannot make any alteration, and the only provision in the Bill being, as I have explained, that we sanction the treaty.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—Supposing it is delayed a day or two, what would be the harm ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I was asked to send some business down to the House of Commons. They adjourned yesterday at six o'clock, having no Bills to proceed with, They knew we had some Bills here and asked us to send any we could. As we cannot change the treaty, it would serve a very good purpose if we could send it down to that chamber.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Is it one of the conditions of this convention that it should receive the sanction of the parliament of Canada ? It is something unusual, I think, to have the sanction of the parliament of Canada given to an imperial treaty. True this may not be an imperial treaty in the sense that it is affecting the whole empire, yet in a constitutional sense it is. I should like to ask my hon. friend why there is that departure?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It was thought better to follow the precedent of the treaty with France which was also made with the imperial government and ratified, just as we are asking that this treaty should be ratified by the parliament of Canada. There is this difference, however, that in making the treaty between Great Britain and France it required to be confirmed by the parliament of Canada. The treaty with Japan does not contain any provision of that kind, but as it relates chiefly to customs duty the Department of Justice thought it was only proper that the parliament of Canada should sanction it.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

The Bill was then read at length at the table and passed.

NATURALIZATION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (A) an Act to amend the Naturalization Act. He said : Under the naturalization law as it exists in Canada, the effect of the naturalization is to limit the privileges entirely to Canada. A similar law exists in other parts of the empire—in Australasia, and in the Cape. In New Zealand, and I think in some part of Australia, before the union, they passed legislation which provided that any person who had resided for a time, three years, and was naturalized in any other part of the empire—that is parts outside of the United Kingdom—the residence would not be counted, that on taking certain oaths a certificate of naturalization might be granted.

Now it was found in Canada, as an illustration, persons coming from New Zealand or from Australia and taking up land in the Northwest, homesteading were not entitled to their patent unless they became naturalized. A case arose of a man who had been in New Zealand and been naturalized there, but his naturalization did not count in Canada. Well it is carrying the principle very very far that he should be compelled to stay for three years in Canada, after having remained the proper length of time in New Zealand, and, as New Zealand, and as parts of Australia were adapting themselves to the changes that are now proposed —that is of allowing the time passed in another part of the empire, outside of the United Kingdom, on complying with the oath required in that part of the country or colony, that then the three years' term in this country would be dispensed with. That is the object of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Do I understand my hon. friend to take the position that the Naturalization Act will not permit the recognition of a British subject by naturalization by any other colony being recognized as such in Canada ? I mention this with all deference to my hon. friend, but I would be very doubtful whether that construction could be placed upon the Act.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, that is the Act.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I call the attention of the hon. minister to the fact that this Bill is not printed in French.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Perhaps you will allow me to explain it and then we can let it stand till to-morrow. Our certificates of naturalization give a naturalized person no privileges if he goes to Australia or New Zealand or any point outside of Canada. If a man is naturalized in the United Kingdom that covers the whole empire, but if he is naturalized in any of the colonies, the rule in past years—although they are now departing from it—is that the naturalization only related to the particular colony where the subject was naturalized. If he was naturalized in South Africa and went outside of South Africa, the naturalization was no use to him, and the same in New Zealand and Australia. In New Zealand they have provided that residence in another colony shall count if the party desires to be naturalized in New Zealand and the party will not have to spend the three years in that colony, but any term that he has spent in another part of the British empire will count.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Do I understand my hon. friend to take the position that naturalization in any other British colony is not recognized under our Canadian law?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, not outside of Canada.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—But in Canada.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Naturalization in Canada is recognized.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Let us assume a naturalized British subject comes from New Zealand to Canada. Under our naturalization law we recognize him as a British subject.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Here was a case submitted to the Department of Justice the other day, where the Department of the Interior transmitted a document obtained under the Act of 1880. The point on which they desired ruling was whether the document was sufficient to meet the requirements of the Dominion Lands Act in the matter of an application for free homestead.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Where was the residence put in?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He came from New Zealand. He had been a foreigner, but was naturalized in New Zealand and it was felt that he had to become naturalized here, and the answer of the Justice Department acknowledging receipt, stated that the letters of naturalization issued by the government of New Zealand are not sufficient to meet the requirements of the Dominion Lands Act in the matter of an application for a free homestead. These letters give him the rights of naturalization only in New Zealand, and do not relate to Canada.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The question might arise, in a case of that kind, as to whether a colony can pass legislation giving a status outside of the colony. I doubt very much whether we can pass legislation whereby we can provide that a naturalized British subject going to any other country should be regarded as a British subject in that colony. That is what is proposed to be done.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh no, it is just the reverse. What I say is that a person who has become naturalized in a British colony outside of Canada, and coming to Canada, that his naturalization in the other country may count in Canada. We are not interfering with anything outside of Canada.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Does that presuppose that the provisions are as rigorous in the colony from which he comes as those which are in force in Canada, viz.: that there shall be a three-year residence?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It seems to me that is the way it should be.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In New Zealand the provision is that if any person who has been naturalized in Canada or any part of the British empire shall submit papers showing he is the person named in the said certificate of naturalization, and that the same has been obtained without fraud or intentional false statement, and so on, on taking that oath the government may issue naturalization papers.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—Will the hon. Secretary of State inform me where I will find the clause in the Bill declaring that parties must remain here one year before being naturalized.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is in our naturalization papers. Our naturalization papers require a three-years' residence.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—In the case of a foreigner, but not a British subject.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Well, we do not count persons who are naturalized in any colony of the empire. It appears under the law in the colony that the naturalization papers are only good within the colony. Naturalization papers issued in Canada are only good within Canada.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—I am asking where in this Bill that is before us is the clause which says that a British subject will be required to remain here one year before he is naturalized?

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is nothing of the kind there. There is no such provision here.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—I am asking the hon. Secretary of State.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is no clause of that kind in the Bill.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Will the hon. Secretary of State answer me a question in regard to the Chinese? We have a statute preventing the importation of Chinese unless they pay $500 head tax. If the Chinese are naturalized in South Africa or in any of the British colonies, can they come in here and be relieved of the payment?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, I should say not.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—There is no provision in the Act about that. This is quite general.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—But there are special laws affecting Chinamen. They could not come within this clause because they must pay a penalty of $500 to come in.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—But would this clause not counteract and destroy the other one?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think not.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is perfectly clear they could not, because this applies to any person resident in Canada or in the service of the government of Canada, or in any province of Canada. A Chinaman could not be a resident of Canada until he pays the $500.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—He comes in with the naturalization papers, and you could not keep him out.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He could not come in under the Act, because he must pay the $500.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—What is the hurry with this Bill?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We are not in a hurry. We will take the second reading, and let it stand until to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—We have not the French copy.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I wanted to give my hon. friend an illustration——

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I will give my hon. friend an illustration also. It is not to be sanctioned by the Governor General to-morrow or the day after. It is one of the Bills awaiting the sanction of the Crown.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Not necessarily. If there is opposition to it I will not press it. I move that the Order of the Day be discharged and placed on the Order of the Day to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

COMMERCIAL TREATIES BILL.

SECOND AND THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (D) An Act to amend an Act respecting commercial treaties affecting Canada. He said: The treaty with France was made in 1894, and this Bill was passed in 1895. It referred only to countries that had enjoyed the treaty. This is simply to include countries which, since the passing of that Act, had made treaties. I think there are one or two treaties that should come in under that commercial treaty, and it is just to correct that. It is the introduction of the words 'may hereafer be' in the seventh line. It is a mere matter of form.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I move that Bill be read at length at the table.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There are two ways of reading a Bill the second time. The hon. gentleman proposes to read the Bill at the table, but the Bill has been already read a second time, and it has been declared that it was read the second time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This is instead of going into committee.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not understand that our parliamentary procedure provides for any such practice as that of reading a Bill at length at the table after it has been read a second time. If the hon. gentleman had moved that the Bill be read a second time and be read at length, then he might dispense with the committee stage. I do not think, the Bill having been read a second time, and the clerk having declared that it was read a second time, there is any procedure that I am aware of under which you can read it at length. I think you have to go into committee on it, or drop the committee stage altogether.

Hon. Mr. De BOUCHERVILLE—There is no necessity of going into committee if the House is unanimous.

The SPEAKER—The hon. gentleman can move the third reading, or go into committee.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I move the suspension of rule 63, and that the Bill be now read a third time.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read a third time and passed.

The Senate adjourned until 3 p.m. tomorrow.

THE SENATE.

OTTAWA, Thursday, December 6, 1906.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

VACANCIES IN THE SENATE.

MOTION POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being called :

By the Hon. Mr. LANDRY :

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid on the table of the Senate copies of all letters received by any of the members of the government from applicants for appointment to the Senate to fill the seats made vacant by the lamented death of our late colleagues the Hon. Senators Dever, Wark, Black, Church, Vidal and Kerr, and the replies of the ministers thereto.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT. Stand.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I wish to call attention to the fact that I had put this motion as an order of the House, and it has been changed into an humble address. I think it should be in the nature of an order. Bourinot at page 359 explains the distinction between addresses and orders :—

I think this motion comes under the latter clause and should be made in order.

The motion was allowed to stand.

REVISED STATUTES BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the third reading of Bill (B) An Act respecting the revised statutes, 1906, and to provide for the French version thereof. He said : In making this motion I desire to say to the House that it was held over yesterday at the instance of the hon. gentleman from DeSalaberry in order that he might consider and submit certain amendments that he proposed. Those amendments have been submitted, and I am prepared to accept them. In the third section of the Bill, after the words 'The Revised Statutes of Canada of 1906,' he proposes to interline the following: 'Being the roll mentioned in section 1 of III., Edward VII., Chap. 61.'

There is no objection to those words that I can see. Then the next change in the Bill will be the clause which refers entirely to the French version. It has already been mentioned to the House that what is proposed in section 10 has been done. I mentioned to the House that the translators are now busy preparing the French version and are making as rapid progress as possible. The clause as amended will read in this way :—

The Governor in Council may appoint two or more competent translators to revise the French version of the said revised statutes.

This is the interlineation :—

And the translators shall proceed as speedily as possible to make and complete such revision and report, &c.

Then in subsection 2, in the second line, it is proposed to substitute the word 'revision' for the word 'translation.' I see no difference, and there is no obection to that. The next change comes after the word 'to.' It reads in this way: 'To have superseded the French version of the roll mentioned in section 1 in the Act of Edward III., Chap. 61.' That is the one I read first. I see no objection to that. In my judgment probably it was not necessary, but it makes it more clear. Then between sections 15 and 16, the last two sections of the Bill, a section to be known as 16, reads in this way:

The preamble of the Act respecting the revised statutes of Edward VII., chap. 61,' shall be read as having included, and shall be deemed to have always included.

These are the words: 'And the revised statutes of 1886,' immediately after the word '1886' in lines 3 and 4. It is simply making the clause more clear, and does not change in the slightest the meaning of the clause, but it is a concession to those who have given the subject some thought, and there can be no possible objection to it because it in no way interferes with the spirit of the Act.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE — Does the hon. Secretary of State think that we can accept those amendments without understanding them? The mere reading of them will not be sufficient. They should be printed and the third reading postponed until to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The amendments are simply declaring in clearer language, out of deference to some gentlemen who think it is not clear enough, the intention of the Bill. It is not a departure from the Bill in any sense, but merely carrying out the intention which is that the French roll shall be on the same footing as the English roll. I am told that in a few days the French translators will have finished the written portion and it can be deposited as the French roll. Now, I am prepared to give every facility to that. The object is to place the French version on a par with the English version. Any delay until to-morrow means that the Bill cannot go to the House of Commons until Monday, and with the desire exhibited to-day to adjourn over the holidays, which I am anxious to meet, the sooner the Bill goes to the House of Commons the sooner it will be passed. I have heard that the House of Commons will put it through in one day.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—The hon. gentleman has read the amendments and had time to consider them; we have not. If the amendments are as simple as the hon. gentleman says they are, I do not see how they can overcome the objection of the hon. senator from Stadacona, that we are in reality passing a law which is in one language only and therefore cannot be sanctioned by the Governor General.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—It is only fair to the House and to myself that I should give some explanation of the amendments which I propose to move. After having done so, it will be time enough to consider the suggestion of the hon. senator from Montarville. As I was not yesterday in a position to defer to the demand of the leader of the opposition, when he asked me what was the object of the amendments I proposed to make, I thought it was but fair that I should apprise him before the House met this afternoon of the nature of the amendments I proposed to offer, and I have done so. The first amendment which I propose to move is in clause 3 of the Bill. It is merely for the purpose of identifying the revised statutes. There is nothing in the clause to identify the revised statutes. The revised statutes have never come into force and, therefore, it is better to add after the words '1906' the following: Being the roll mentioned in section 1 of the Act of 1903.' The object is to connect these revised statutes of 1906 as being the revised statutes referred to in the roll which was to be deposited, pursuant to the Act of 1903, Chap. 61. Then I propose to go on and strike out in the same section the word 'ratify' and leave the word 'confirm,' because it is an Act which has not become law.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—You can only confirm what is already in existence. It is the same question.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—It is the roll. The roll is deposited in virtue of the Act of 1903, and it is the suggestion of the hon. Minister of Justice that the word 'confirm' would come in there very properly, and I think he is right.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—I see the same objection to 'confirm' as to 'ratify.'

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is no objection to either—let it go.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—In Committee of the Whole, at the suggestion of the hon. senator from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power), we struck out the words 'and to have had.' The hon. Minister of Justice thinks that these words should remain, because the statutes are always speaking for the past as well as for the future, and there can be no objection to the amendment.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Anything for a quiet life.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Then as to section 10. I may state the nature of my objection to the clause as it was originally printed. Section 133 of the British North America Act, not the part of the section to which the hon. gentleman refers, but the first part of the section, provides as follows:

> Either the English or the French language may be used by any person in the debates of the Houses of the parliament of Canada and of the House of the legislature of Quebec ; and both those languages shall be used in the respective records and journals of those Houses.

These words are ample enough, but on turning to the French version you find that the words are still clearer. The words used are:

> Mais dans la rédaction des archives, procès-verbaux et journaux respectifs de ces chambres, l'usage de ces deux langues sera obligatorie.

Therefore, there is no question that the wording covers all the Bills. To comply with the British North America Act there has to be a French roll as well as an English roll. That roll need not be printed; it may be a manuscript roll, but the Act, if passed as it was originally printed, according to my contention, would not be a valid Act, because no French version of the roll would have been deposited. Therefore, I propose to move an amendment to clause 10 in order to comply fully with that section of the British North America Act. I have ascertained by communicating with the translators that the French version is about complete, that the only thing remaining to be revised is a part of the Criminal Act which can be completed within a week. Therefore, it can easily be completed in good time for the 1st January. What I propose is to change the wording of clause 10 in order to permit the French version being deposited as the French roll in the same way as the English roll is deposited with the clerks of the two Houses, and to merely provide for the revising of this French roll before it is printed in order to correct any mistakes which may have been made. There might be some objection to that course being followed if we were not dealing with the old law, and with laws which are to be found and which will remain to be found in the statutes which are in force. But we must bear in mind that the mission which was given to the commissioners was not a mission to make new laws, but merely to consolidate the statutes of this Dominion. They are not supposed to have made any new laws, and pending the printing of the French version any one who desires to consult the French version of the statutes can have recourse to the laws as they exist in the statute-books, though they are not in as concise a form as they will be hereafter when the consolidated statutes are issued in printed form.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That argument applies to the English version alone.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Yes, but the English version is ready. I understand that 5,000 copies of the English version are printed and ready for distribution. Therefore I propose to amend clause 10 by striking out the words 'to translate' and insert instead 'to revise.'

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Must those persons necessarily be translators?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Yes, necessarily, because to make the two versions agree they have to be translators. The amendment is to substitute 'revision' for 'translation.' Then in the second paragraph I propose to strike out the word 'translation' and substitute for it the word 'revision.' After the word 'to' add the following words: 'To have superseded the French version of the roll mentioned in section 1 of the Act 3 Edward VII., chap. 61, and being the authentic original French version, &c.'

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Would the hon. gentleman allow me to ask a question? Does he not think it would be much better to defer the consideration of this Bill until to-morrow?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I am dealing with all the amendments for the sake of consecutiveness. The meaning of this amendment is that there must be a roll before the Act comes into force, a French roll as well as an English roll, but it provides for machinery so that revision is made of that French roll, and when the revision is made it supersedes and takes the place of the roll which shall have been deposited in the meantime. Then I propose to suggest that there be a further amendment by adding a new clause, which will be numbered 16, and making clause 16 No. 17.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Better put it in after clause 13.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Yes, it would come after clause 13. The reason for inserting the new clause is this: When the statute of 1903 was passed, respecting the revision of the statutes of Canada, our omission was made. It provided for the revision of all statutes subsequent to the enactment of the revised statutes of 1886, but it omitted to include the revised sattutes of 1886. Therefore if we were to leave the Bill as it was presented, we might be without them. They were intended to be incorporated in the new revision. The revised statutes of 1886 have been incorporated; otherwise they would not have been repealed and their incorporation in the new revised statutes would have been questionable as to whether they really form a part of the law or not. The preamble in the Act of 1903, Chap. 61, reads as follows:

Whereas it has been found expedient to revise, classify and consolidate the public general statutes of Canada passed since the date of the revised statutes of Canada, 1886, and whereas such classification.

You will notice that it limited the revision to the statutes passed subsequently to the revised statutes 1886, not including the statutes of 1886. Therefore, I propose to suggest that clause 14 read as follows:

The preamble of the Act respecting the revised statutes of Canada, chap. 61, shall be read as having included, and shall have been deemed to have always included, the words 'and the revised statutes of 1886,' immediately after the words 'of 1886' in line 3 and 4 thereof.

This amendment merely has the effect of amending the preamble of the Act, 1883, so that it will be deemed to read as follows:

Whereas it has been found expedient to revise, classify and consolidate the public general statutes of Canada, passed since the date of the revised statutes of Canada, 1886, and the revised statutes of 1886.

These are the only explanations I desire to make. I would have suggested further that the title be changed, that instead of saying that the title shall read 'this Act may be cited as the revised statutes of Canada, 1906,' that it be made to read '1907,' as it is coming into force in 1907, but on turning to these English statutes, the English version which has been printed, I find that they bear the date of 1906, and, therefore, it had better remain that way. These are the only explanations I am ready to make, and now I am ready to answer questions.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I wish to ask the hon. gentleman, in view of the very interesting explanation which he has given the House of his amendments, would it not be better to postpone the third reading until to-morrow so that we can have these amendments printed and be able to discuss them, and see if the statutes of 1903 are absolutely in accord with them? Because, after having heard the hon. gentleman make his explanation, I am very strongly of the opinion that these amendments do not improve the Bill and do not remove the objections which were urged against it. I think it is really impossible, at least for me, to accept the third reading of the Bill with the explanation, though very interesting and very clear, that the hon. gentleman has given us. I was going to suggest that the hon. gentleman should postpone the third reading until to-morrow in order that the amendments may be printed and we may have time to study them. If we are here to do legislative work we ought to do it correctly and properly. It is impossible for me to follow perfectly the explanation which has been given. Although I have taken some notes of the amendments he has proposed, I cannot follow this Bill and refer to the statutes to see if the amendments are proper ones. I have the greatest confidence in the hon. gentleman's judgment and capacity, but it seems to me that it will be requiring too much of us to ask us to permit the third reading to-day, and to accept as proper all the amendments the hon. gentleman has suggested.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I propose to move that the Bill instead of being read a third time presently, be recommitted to a Committee of the Whole House, and then the hon. gentleman and other members will have an opportunity of discussing it and ascertaining whether there can be any doubt if the objections are removed. I have conferred with the Minister of Justice, and I may say that he entirely approves of the amendments, and he is satisfied that they are proper. I move in amendment that the Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be recommitted to a Committee of the Whole House.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I must ask the hon. gentleman, supposing the Bill is amended on the lines he has just suggested, if it will come into force on the 1st January, 1907 ?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Supposing that on the 1st of January, 1907, the roll spoken of in section 10, is not ready?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Then it cannot come into force.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It does not do so. The law says the Governor in Council may appoint two or more competent translators to revise the French version of the said revised statutes, and the translators shall proceed as speedily as possible to make and complete such revision, and report the same to the Governor in Council. The Governor in Council shall thereupon cause a printed roll of the revision so made and reported, attested under the signature of the Governor, and so on. I suppose all that is done after the 1st of January.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—The hon. gentleman is confusing the revised roll with the roll which will be ready to be deposited in eight days. What is absolutely necessary is that the roll be deposited containing the French version. This roll can be deposited, and must of necessity be deposited. The Bill, as I propose to have it amended, 'cannot come into force until this has been done. The roll will be ready in eight days. It will be a temporary roll, and will be superseded by the final roll when all the revision has been made.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is just the question that we are discussing. We do not want a temporary roll. We want to be on the same footing as the English roll. Their roll ends there. It is not revised. The Governor accepts it, and for the purposes of the law it is the roll. The French copy is not the roll. It will be a sort of modus vivendi for the time being, and when it will be ready in five or six months we will have the real roll and the trick will be played.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Will my hon. friend allow me to draw his attention to the explanations which have been given by the hon. Secretary of State with closed doors, which are very appropriate. The explanation is this, that because of the necessity, on account of two languages being used, that the publication of one or the other version—here it is the French version; in Quebec it is the English version—has to be deferred. In practice it is an impossibility that the two printed versions should be distributed at the same time.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I contest that.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Can it be argued that in practice the French statutes are ready as early as the English statutes ? They are not ready. One is made before the other, invariably, and the hon. gentleman has not complained of that in the past. Invariably the French statutes are published three or four months after the English version. It will be the case in this instance as in ordinary instances, and I do not see any objection. For the present my motion is merely to have the Bill re-committed to Committee of the Whole, and then this question may be discussed, and possibly the Committee of the Whole may rise and merely report progress.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I should prefer that course rather than take the third reading now, but I maintain that it would be better to have the amendments printed and postpone the third reading until to-morrow, and we could put it through in a few minutes. If we go into committee on the amendments, we have to send for the statutes and refer to the explanation which is given. I should like to have before me to-morrow, while studying these amendments, the explanations that the hon. gentleman has given. I have not them. I cannot remember all that he said. Perhaps in reading the amendments I will come to the conclusion that he was right and I was wrong, and, in view of his great experience and judgment, I am quite willing to abide by his decision to a great extent; but I should like to have his statement before me; so that, although I think his suggestion is better than nothing, I should prefer that the whole matter be taken up to-morrow. Under the circumstances, I think we will perhaps save time and pass the Bill sooner if we postpone it until tomorrow. I am very anxious to help the government in this matter, and I would suggest in view of the fact that the French version will be ready in 10 or 15 days, and that both versions of the statutes will be ready before the 20th of this month, that it would be better to pass a statute to provide that the revised statutes shall come into force by proclamation. If the two versions are ready before the end of the month, they can be put in force on the 1st of January. It seems to me if we can agree on that point the whole difficulty can be settled. The hon. gentleman from DeSalaberry stated that on inquiry in proper quarters he learned that the French version will be ready very soon, while the English version is ready and 5,000 copies are printed. If the government is anxious to have the statutes ready by the 1st of January, what harm can there be in saying that they shall go into force by proclamation?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman's suggestion is quite impracticable, for this reason; you will be tieing up the House of Commons. The House of Commons will desire to adjourn long before that period. I heard to-day that the feeling among the members of the other Chamber was to adjourn very soon, and they propose to have a considerable adjournment. We should not so determine business here that we shall tie their hands. Besides the changes made in this Bill are only of a character that the original Bill was supposed to convey. It was supposed to really contain the views that have been expressed by the hon. gentleman from DeSalabery, but I said if they could make it more clear I was willing it should be done. I hope no further opposition will be offered, because hon. gentlemen will see how anxious the House is to finish the work. If we do not pass the Bill to-day it cannot go the House of Commons until Monday.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Does the government accept the suggestion ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Accept what?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The Bill is no longer a government Bill. I ask if the government accept that procedure ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I stated in the beginning that I accepted the amendments proposed by the hon. gentleman.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Did I understand the hon. gentleman to move the third reading of the Bill as amended ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Then it is entirely unnecessary to go into committee.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I should prefer not to go into committee, only I understand it is the unanimous feeling of the House that the Bill be read the third time to-day. It is only on the understanding that I consent.

Hon. Mr. POWER—As to the matter of procedure: the hon. Secretary of State said he had no objection to the amendments suggested by the hon. member from De Salabery, but that statement did not put the amendments into the Bill. The House had to go through the regular form to do it, and the more convenient way was to go into committee. To make several amendments to a Bill at the third reading is an awkward thing it is better that it should be done in committee.

The motion was agreed to and the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the Bill.

(In the Committee).

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I move that the following clause be added to the Bill.

This Act shall come into force on the 1st day of January, 1907, if the final revision of the French roll has taken place, and if not, upon proclamation of the Governor General in Council after such revision has taken place.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think my hon. friend had better not complicate it with that revision. It is impracticable. I hope no more amendments will be proposed, because it is quite impossible to accept them. That amendment is simply misleading, because it is absolutely impossible that the French edition can be ready by the 1st January.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—To what do all the amendments proposed now amount ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is with regard to the roll.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If the hon. member from DeSalaberry wants to do justice to the French version, let him say so.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am most anxious to get the French version through as rapidly as possible. We have put on an additional French translator and I have instructed the Bureau to hasten it as rapidly as possible. The amendment is misleading; it cannot be done; it will only be misleading the public.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I do not think it is misleading. It is very clear.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I understood the hon. member from DeSalaberry to say in answer to my hon. friend from Stadacona that if the roll was not recorded at the time, then the Act would not go into force. The amendment of my hon. friend is only carrying out that and making it clear.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is this difference : the official French version will be filed and duly certified by the Governor General before the 1st January, but the French version will not be quite ready for distribution then.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Not only will it not be ready for distribution, but it will not be revised.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is a very strange thing to me. I gathered that the gentlemen who have been engaged in the work of revising the French version would have their work completed in about eight days.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—The hon. gentleman misunderstood me.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Excuse me, it was not the hon. gentleman from DeSalabery that I heard say that, but another hon. gentleman. Looking at it from the point of view of the business of the country, this revision of the statutes has been delayed much longer than it should have been. All over the country the people who have to do with the statutes, professional men more particularly, are most anxious that these revised statutes should be made available, and, further, during the present session nearly every Act, whether a public or a private Act, which is passed will contain a reference to the revised statutes, and the reference must be to the statutes which are to go into operation on the 1st January. I appeal, therefore, to hon. gentlemen to let it go and let us make some progress with this very important work, a work which interests the public so very much. Let us get it through, and if in the House of Commons they think more amendments are necessary let them make the amendments.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Let there be no mistake about the question which is now before the chair. I stated that my information is to this effect, that the translation can be completed within eight days. I have reason to believe that it is being done by a competent man. I know him personally, and I would be very much mistaken if it was not well done, but we who represent the French population, and everybody in this country, are all interested in taking additional precautions for a work of this magnitude and importance, therefore it is only appropriate that we make sure that this French version is properly revised. I do not believe that the government will go as far as appointing two translators for the purpose; I think that it can be done very quickly, but that is outside of the question. A revision of this magnitude cannot be done between now and the 1st January. It may take until the 1st February or the middle of February, but it is a delay of no consequence, in my judgment. It is a delay which occurs in the distribution from year to year, in pratice, in the distribution of the French version of the statutes as of necessity, and it is only for the purpose of making sure that the text will be the best text possible that I have amended the clause in order to provide for this revision, and exact at the same time that before the 1st January, as a necessary condition of the law going into force, that the French version be deposited with the clerk of the House, subject only to those corrections, if any should be necessary between this and the 1st February, or the 1st March, or whatever time may be required.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I am really surprised to hear the hon. gentleman always making this error. There is a great distinction between the passing of a law and the proclamation of that law in the statutes generally. I do not object to delay in publishing the law, but I do object to passing a law which is not completed in every respect according to the constitution and put on the records. My hon. friend says that the French version may be completed in 8 or 10 days. If it is completed, there can be no objection to saying that the law shall come into force by proclamation; but he says it may not be ready for months. How can we pass into law something which is not completed? Supposing the translation is wrong, and we have to revise the work itself, we would have a law passed here and sanctioned before hand which would be bad. I object to that. If the motion is to the effect that the law come into force only after the revision is completed, I am in favour of that motion. If it can be translated and revised before the 1st of January, I am quite willing to have it put in force before the 1st of January; but if we are not sure that not only the translation but the revision will be completed, I strongly object to putting the statutes in force until they are completed. For this reason I favour the motion and shall support it, to the effect that this law come into force by proclamation or otherwise only after the revision is completed.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—The hon. gentleman is losing sight of clause 7 of the present Bill, which reads as follows :

7. The said revised statutes shall not be held to operate as new laws, but shall be construed and have effect as a consolidation and as declaratory of the law as contained in the said Acts and parts of Acts so repealed, and for which the said revised statutes are substituted.

Therefore, under this wording, as in all consolidations of statutes, we are not really enacting any new law; we are merely providing a convenient means of dealing with the laws as they exist, and, I repeat, if it was a new law I would side with the hon. gentleman. However, this is really a consolidation of the law; therefore, we have to suit the convenience of the country at large, and if the English edition of the statutes is ready to be distributed, I think it will be suiting the convenience of the French as well as the English population to let the distribution take place, because it may take 15 days or a month to ensure the French version being perfect. I prefer that delay rather than the French version being imperfect, although its imperfection cannot have the effect of changing the law. The law must remain as it is in the statutes passed from year to year. We must be governed by the law as contained in our statutes on the statute-book. It is not a new law we are dealing with, but merely a consolidation of the laws.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—I do not doubt that the gentlemen who have been appointed to translate the laws are fit and competent, but my information goes to this extent, that the French version cannot be ready by the 1st of January. True the laws are translated. That is an easy matter, because all that was necessary to be done after all, was to take the old laws which are already translated; but the revision which makes these new laws distinct from the old laws, is not ready and cannot be ready by the 1st of January. Whether I am right or wrong I do not know, but I have so been informed, and I wish to tell the leader of the government about it.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—How does the hon. gentleman reconcile his amendments with the amendment which has been adopted? According to the amendment moved by the hon. gentleman from Stadacona the roll will not be sufficient, but it will be necessary to have a revision.

The CHAIRMAN—I called the question, and nobody said 'content' and I declared it lost.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—We are not entitled to be taken by surprise. The hon. gentleman from Montarville proposes a series of amendments to the effect that a provisional roll shall be so placed in the hands of the clerk of parliament, and when that provisional roll shall be placed there, then the law can be assented to on the 1st of January.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—That amendment was carried.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Yes; I proposed another amendment saying that the law shall come into force not when the provisional roll will be assented to, but when the final revision of that roll shall be completed.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I rise to a question of order. I heard the chairman put the question. I heard one gentleman say 'content' and I heard several say 'non-content,' and the hon. chairman declared that the non-contents had it, and any discussion after that is altogether out of order.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I was going to raise the question of order. The amendment of the hon. gentleman is not in order because it is in conflict with clause 10 as amended.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Not at all. It is adding to the law and not taking out of the law.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS, from the committee, reported the Bill with amendments.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved concurrence in the amendments.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I object. Rule 24 reads :

> One day's notice must be given of any of the following motions :
> For the consideration of substantial amendments made in a public Bill in committee of the whole.

I suppose the first thing to do is to have those amendments considered.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think the hon. gentleman is astray in that. I consented to the House going into committee on the distinct understanding that the Bill was to be read a third time forthwith. Otherwise we would not have gone into committee.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I do not care what the hon. gentleman may say. We are here in opposition. We are opposed to what the hon. gentleman says and we are just insisting on our right.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not think there is any deadlock. This House, as a rule, is not in the habit of being discourteous, and in the present instance the Bill stood for its third reading. The Bill had been reported from the Committee of the Whole with one or two amendments. These amendments had been concurred in and the Bill stood for a third reading. The hon. Secretary of State proposed to move that the Bill be amended on the third reading, as he had a perfect right to do, and then at the suggestion of the hon. gentleman from De Salaberry it was thought it would be more convenient to consider these amendments in Committee of the Whole. We went into committee and the amendents are now just in the same position as they would have been if the other course had been taken. They are the same amendments which the hon. senator said he would move at the third reading. The House does not want, by a sort of trick, to place the leader of the government in the position of not being able to do what he had a perfect right to do. As a matter of convenience we went into committee on these amendments instead of moving them directly at the third reading; and because the hon. Secretary of State was courteous enough to give way, and particularly as the hon. Secretary of State spoke of that and stipulated that he was not to lose the right to move the third reading. he should not be prejudiced. Although we may have parliamentary rules, still they are subject the rules of good faith and understandings between members of the House.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—The hon. gentleman might move his amendment in amendment to the motion for third reading.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—No. I raise the point. I claim that under rule 24, clause B, the third reading cannot be taken now.

The SPEAKER—The point of order would be well taken if the House had not resolved itself into Committee of the Whole for convenience sake, and by a general understanding. The hon. leader of the government declared that he consented to go into Committee of the Whole House provided he could take the third reading today, and it was simply for the sake of convenience that he went into committee.

Therefore, under these circumstances, I think the point of order is not well taken.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I raise another point of order. The Bill has been amended. A stage has been taken, and I claim a third reading cannot take place.

Hon. Mr. KERR—The same point.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The first question was on the adoption of the report by the committee.

The SPEAKER—The motion is concurrence in the amendments.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I move in amendment that the Bill be recommitted to the Committee of the Whole House with instructions to insert after clause 15 the following words :

After the final revision of the French roll has taken place, and after any proclamation by the Governor General in Council, given after such revision has taken place

The House divided on the amendment, which was lost on the following division :

NATURALIZATION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (A) An Act to amend the Naturalization Act. He said : I explained this Bill on the first reading, and also on the second reading yesterday when it was stopped. It is for the purpose of enabling persons who have been naturalized in other parts of the British empire outside of the United Kingdom, when they come to Canada, to give them the advantage of the time that they spent in other parts of the empire. It arises in this way; a settler came the other day, as I gave the illustration yesterday, and took land in the Northwest. Under the homestead law he was obliged to take the oath of allegiance, and the Department of Justice held that although he was naturalized outside of Canada, he would have to be naturalized again, and that our law required he should reside three years in Canada. It is to do away with the necessity of that, that this law is proposed. In New Zealand they have already adopted a law similar to the one we propose; that is, that a residence in another part of the empire should count if a party wishes to be naturalized in a British colony. It has also been adopted in some of the provinces of Australia. There is no objection to the Bill I believe.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

The Senate adjourned until 3 p.m. tomorrow.

THE SENATE.

OTTAWA, Friday, December 7, 1906.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (F) An Act to amend the Conciliation Act, 1900.—(Mr. McMullen).

VACANCIES IN THE SENATE.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY moved

That an order of the Senate do issue calling for copies of all letters received by any of the members of the government from applicants for apointment to the Senate to fill the seats made vacant by the lamented death of our late colleagues, the hon. senators Dever, Wark, Black, Church, Vidal and Kerr, and the replies of the ministers thereto.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There are no letters on file on the subject.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I suppose the hon. minister is answering only for himself ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, I am answering for the government.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Oh, oh. Where are they on file ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We never put confidential letters on file.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. Secretary of State is in error when he says no confidential letters were put on file. If the hon. gentleman will look at the records he will find he brought down a number of them when he first came into office.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—They know better now.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They should not be there. Whenever the matter has come before me, I have given orders, no matter who the letters were from, to remove confidential letters from the file. They ought never to go on file.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman should be a little more particular with some of his colleagues. I know of a minister, in former days, who pursued the same course precisely ; consequently when returns were made, confidential letters did not appear in the returns that were not pertinent to the subject asked about. But the hon. gentleman and the leader of the opposition, know very well how they used to chastise a former government for not filling vacancies for a long time, and I have a distinct recollection of a very severe castigation that I received myself from the hon. gentleman who now occupies the position of Minister of Trade and Commerce for having written a letter to a gentleman who simply wrote me asking whether he had been an applicant for a senatorship. My reply was that he had not been an applicant so far as I knew, but I frankly admit now that I improperly stated that the vacancy that existed had been promised to another. My hon. friend who sits opposite me took very serious objection to that and also to the course pursued by the government of not filling vacancies. Now am I incorrect in stating that rumors have prevailed, particularly in the city in which I live, that the hon. gentleman himself has made promises to a certain gentleman who is an applicant for the office, and the promise made, as I understand it, through the political organizer of the present party, on behalf of the Minister of Trade and Commerce and of his chief, the Premier of the Dominion, was to the effect that this gentleman should have one of the first three vacancies that occurred.

Now, there have been some eight or ten vacancies in the province of Ontario since that letter, if written, was sent or given to this gentleman. I have not seen the letter myself; I am not speaking from personal knowledge, but merely stating I have been so informed by those who are interested in the matter. If it was a heinous crime on my part to make the statement I did, how much greater was the crime of the hon. gentleman opposite in making a positive promise, if made as alleged to have been made, that this gentleman should have one of the first three vacancies that might occur, and seven or eight have occurred since and the promise not fulfilled? I am not speaking authoritatively on this question, but my information is of such a character I feel that I am justified in putting the question plainly as I am doing to my hon. friend. It is possible that the government are unable to make a selection from the numerous applicants for senatorships vacant in the different provinces, Ontario, Quebec and New Brunswick? One has been vacant for over two years. There are two vacancies in Nova Scotia. I am not surprised that the government have been unable to fill these latter, because the hon. Secretary of State told us, when this subject was under discussion before, that it was difficult to find gentlemen in Nova Scotia to fill those positions. From what I have learned about the other provinces, however, the applications are very numerous. I noticed in the Ottawa correspondence of the 'Globe' yesterday or the day before four or five names were mentioned, and I suppose the correspondent speaks by the book, as he represents the semi-official or direct organ of the government. Among those to whom he called attention was Geo. W. Ross, late premier of the province of Ontario. Could the hon. gentleman tell us whether Mr. Ross is to be one of our colleagues? One of the others mentioned is Mr. Beith, a very respectable gentleman who was formerly a member of the other House, and Mr. John Charleton, a gentleman of long parliamentary experience. Then there is a Mr. McDonald, but there are so many McDonalds I can only surmise to whom it refers. I presume it is the late deputy speaker of the House of Commons. I could mention other names, but I am only giving those that appear in the 'Globe' correspondence. I am particularly anxious to know whether the promise, if made, to the Bay of Quinte Boy, is to receive recognition at present. The frankness with which questions are usually answered by the hon. Minister of Trade and Comerce, leads me to expect a direct answer which will satisfy not only myself, but the gentleman who is so anxious to be given a seat in the Senate.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I am obliged to the hon. gentleman for the interest he takes in the question of who the government will appoint to the Senate. I may remark to him I can remember a time, not perhaps so much under his own premiership as under the premiership of his former leaders, when he was not at all so anxious to fill vacancies in the Senate with as great promptitude as he is at present. I think I can recollect when there were eight or nine vacancies in the Senate, some of which had been of much longer standing than the vacancies now existing. The hon. gentleman, from his experience, is aware of the extreme danger of putting any credence in the various rumours which are always floating about as to what promises may have been made, of what letters may have been written or anything of that kind. When he produces letters, we will be prepared to consider them, and see what may have been said or done in any given case. As to the Ontario vacancies, he is aware that they have only existed for a matter of two or three weeks. The other vacancies may have been longer. In a general way I may say to the hon. gentleman that the present government have so high an idea of the Senate, and of the qualifications necessary to enable a man to hold a position here, that they think it is a matter which requires the maturest care and consideration and deliberation before they make an appointment, and they are now giving it such consideration.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I should like to ask my hon. friend if the suggestions which be made last session with reference to appointments being acceptable to both sides of the Senate are about to be put into operation, inasmuch as I find that various applications are being made to Conservative senators with reference to senatorial appointment? I should like to know if that is being done advisedly with a view to those appointments being acceptable to both sides of the House?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I might say to my hon. friend that my own views, which I took very good care to state, were strictly individual views and not given as a member of the government, but as a member of the Senate, have not altered at all as to the desirability of carrying out that principle; but I may also remind him that those views, which were tentatively submitted had not the happiness to meet with universal approbation on both sides of the House, either from his friends or from my friends. There seemed to be rather a strong disposition that we had better let well enough along. However, I have not altered my mind, and if it is any consolation to the hon. gentleman to know, I am in hopes at a reasonably future time of seeing my ideas prevail, but I do not think even my hon. friend himself jumped at the suggestion as I should have wished him to do, and I would hope from what he has seen he would be disposed to do.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—May I be permitted to thank the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce for the lucid and distinct manner in which he answered my question, that is that he will deal with the letter when I produce it. I think I can tell him by and by—not just now—more about the letter than I have mentioned to the House.

Hon. Mr. KERR—It would be interesting to the Senate also to know all the particulars of those applications which have been made to the leader of the opposition, and Conservative members. The names of those applicants will be interesting, and, no doubt, useful to those who would have to give the subject consideration. Perhaps he would be good enough to state to the Senate the names of those who have been applying to him and other members of the opposition. It would be interesting, and might be useful to the members of the government to have those names under consideration.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I think hon. senators on this side of the House would have no objection to divulging that information if we received an assurance from the government that proper consideration would be given to the recommendations we make.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Certainly, consideration will be given, if the hon. gentleman will forward them.

The motion was withdrawn.

THE PUBLIC BUILDINGS AT GLACE BAY.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (C.B.) moved

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate copies of all correspondence respecting a site or sites for a public building in the town of Glace Bay, Nova Scotia, between any member of the government and all other parties; the area of the sites, the price of each, the date of the purchase, the date of each payment, the name of the seller of each site, the report or reports of the government engineer, showing lots recommended and those not recommended by him, and all notes or memoranda referring to said sites.

He said: I am glad to learn that the government have decided to erect a public building in the town of Glace Bay. The people of that town claim that it is the largest town in Canada which is without a public building. The place which is used as a post office in Glace Bay, is a building about 20 by 30, and only 12 x 30 of that building is used for a post office. A room of that size is too small for a post office in a town containing an estimated population of 17,000. I find that the revenues arising from the post office in that town for the year ending June 30, 1905, amounted to a very large sum. It stood third in the province, next to Halifax and Sydney.

The post office orders for that town amounted for that year to $117,149, leading every town in the province except Halifax and Sydney. In other revenues it stood third in the provinces; in money orders it stood third in the province and is constantly increasing. Now, I think the government could not have been properly posted or I am very sure they would not have delayed the erection of a public building in a town of that importance, and if they have been misled in anyway with regard to that I hope they will not delay putting up a building in that town. Three years ago a sum of money was voted to erect a public building there. Two years ago another sum was voted, and this year another sum has been placed in the estimates for the purposes of a public building. It is said that the site for that public building was purchased in that town about two years ago. I wish to state that there is something wrong in connection with this. It is said that the government sent an engineer to report upon a site in that town, and it is to be presumed that on the report of that engineer the site has been purchased. It is well known in Glace Bay that the site for the public building in that town had been agreed upon, decided upon and purchased before the government engineer went there at all to report upon the site, and that it was simply deceiving the people. I am sure the government is not guilty of that, but they act on reports made to them on that point, and therefore they are responsible. They should guard themselves against any misrepresentations in that respect. A site for the building was bought; it turned out to be too small. When it was bought, and I do not want to introduce politics into this matter, but there is nothing like the truth—it was bought from a leading Conservative and immediately, on the purchase being made from him he became a good Liberal. I do not say that he is a good Liberal to-day. Then it was discovered that the site was too small although it was 60 feet by 100 feet, and this year they decided to buy another lot alongside to the east of it. In connection with that lot, I wish to say that it was bought a few days before it was purchased by the government, by a supporter of the government, who must have known that the government was going to purchase it—the representative of the government must have known it, for the man who held the site was offering it in the town of Glace Bay—offered to myself— for $3,500. The representatives of the government down there must have known that the site was for sale at that figure. Everybody knew that it was offered for $3,500. It was bought by a gentleman in that town who was a well-known supporter of the government, and the next day or a few days afterwards he sold it to the government, if he had not already sold it to them before he purchased it, which I believe he did. I think the understanding was that the government would buy it from him before he got the title. If an investigation is made that can be proven. However, after he got the title he sold it for $1,499 in advance of the price he paid for it. I think that is wrong, and the government has been misled. This is a rake-off. I do not believe any member of the government would consent to do a thing like that if they had known the facts. I make this statement so that the people who know these facts in the town of Glace Bay may see that I have laid the matter before the Senate. If the hon. leader of the Senate will be good enough to give me some additional information, which they have in the department, in connection with the matter I shall be very much obliged. What I desire is the statement from the engineer of the department giving the number of lots reported upon and the price of each lot. That is all the additional information I wish to obtain.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Does the hon. gentleman know the name of he engineer?

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (C.B.)—I do not.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is no objection to the motion. The facts are all new to me. I never heard of them before. I gave the answer which was placed on the paper a few days ago. The price paid for the lot was $4,999.

The motion was agreed to.

JOINT LIBRARIANS OF PARLIAMENT.

REPORT ADOPTED.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved the adoption of the report of the Joint Librarians of Parliament. He said: This report will be found at page 58 of our minutes. It does not contain anything which I think calls for the action of the House. It is simply a statement of things that have been done, and it gives a statement classified by subjects of the books added to the library since 1903.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It was intimated to the House a day or two ago by the hon. senator from St. John that the name of the gentleman appointed chairman of the committee should accompany the first report.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I might say, for the information of the hon. gentleman from Belleville, that inasmuch as the committee on the Library have not met yet, we are not in a position to name the chairman; but the uniform practice has been that the Speakers of the two Houses occupy the position alternately. My recollection is that last year the Speaker of the Commons was chairman, so that this year our own Speaker will be chairman of the committee.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That opens this question; this motion is for consideration of a report from the joint committee, and how could they report if the committee had not met?

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is the report of the librarians.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—Is this the only report made by the librarians for the year? Is this all that issues from the committee of librarians, which we see here?

Hon. Mr. POWER—This is just the report of the joint librarians, of what has happened during the recess of parliament.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—Is there a report published by one or moth librarians and submitted to parliament yearly? I never saw one.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is at page 58.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—That is no report.

The motion was agreed to.

NATURALIZATION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into a committee of the whole on Bill (A) An Act to amend the Naturalization Act.

(In the Committee.)

On clause 2,

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Is it necessary for a person who has been naturalized in any portion of the British Empire to become naturalized in Canada ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes. Under our law, a person who has been naturalized in any other part of the empire must be naturalized again here. Our law is confined to Canada as laws of the other colonies are confined to those colonies. They are now making a change. New Zealand and Australia are allowing residence in any other British colony to count. If a party goes into New Zealand or Australia, the time he may have lived in another colony will count as part of the 3 years.

The clause was adopted.

On the schedule.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is an error in form 3 in the schedule, and there are two slight errors in form 4 in the schedule. These errors have occurred in this way I think ; that the Bill as originally drawn up had no short title, and the references in these forms were made to the clauses in the Bill as originally drafted. After the drafting of the Bill clause 1, the short title, was put in, and the consequence is that the references are to section 2, where it should be section 3, and to section 3 where it should be section 4. If the hon. chairman will look at about the middle of of form 3, he will find the words 'prescribed by section 2 of the Naturalization Amendment Act, 1907.' That is this Bill. We find nothing about this matter in section 2, but it appears in section 3. I move that the figure 3 be substituted for the figure 2.

The amendment was adopted.

Hon. Mr. POWER—In form 4 the same amendment is required. It reads 'prescribed by the second section of the Naturalization Amendment Act, 1907.' It should be third section. I move that the word third be substituted for the word second, and that in the eighth line the word fourth be substituted for third.

The amendment was adopted.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—From the committee reported the Bill with amendments which were concurred in.

The Bill was then read the third time and passed.

The Senate adjourned till Wednesday, January 16, at 8 p.m.

TENDERS FOR SLEEPERS ON TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired:

1. Have the commissioners of the Transcontinental Railway asked for tenders for the supply of sleepers for any part whatsoever of the Transcontinental Railway ?
2. Who are the tenderers ?
3. What are the prices asked by each of them?
4. Who obtained the contract?
5. At what price and for what quantity ?
6. Has the contractor begun the execution of his contract ?
7. What quantity has he delivered up to this date?
9. To whom and at what place?
10. What amount of money has he received in payment ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Department of Railways informs me that the information is too voluminous to be given in the way of answers, and if the hon. gentleman will move for a return I shall be glad to have the information furnished.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I have no objection to putting my inquiry in the form of a return, provided I shall receive the information this year.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, I think so. They have promised it. The best we can get is their promise.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Then I will move that this inquiry be put to the House as a motion for a return.

The motion was agreed to.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT BILL.

ORDER POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being called :

Second reading Bill (C) An Act to amend the Criminal Code, 1892.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I move that the consideration of this Bill be postponed. The reason is that a sister Bill was to be introduced contemporaneously, which is still with the Justice Department. I, therefore, suggest that this order be struck from the Orders of the Day, and placed on the orders for two weeks hence.

The motion was agreed to.

CONCILIATION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being called :

Second reading Bill (F), An Act to amend the Conciliation Act.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—It appears that a number of the members have received communications on the subject-matter of this Bill, and I have been requested to postpone the motion for second reading until they have had an opportunity of looking over these communications and preparing whatever objections they intend to offer to the Bill, if any. I cannot see that any very sound objection can be offered. However, to meet their request, I move that the order of the day be discharged and that the Bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Wednesday next.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until 3 p.m., tomorrow.

CARRIAGE OF MAILS BETWEEN CANADA AND THE UNITED KINGDOM.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved :

That an order of the Senate do issue for copies of the contracts for the carrying of His Majesty's mails between Canada and the United Kingdom, as also, of all correspondence had between the honourable the Postmaster General or any member of the government or any officer thereof and the Allan Steamship Company or any officer thereof, or any other corporation or person, since June 30 last, with respect to the carrying and landing of the said mails during the portion of the year when the navigation of the St. Lawrence is not open.

He said : The resolution of which I have given notice has been, to a certain extent, already disposed of by what I understand to be the action of the government ; but the House will perhaps allow me to say a few words on the subject. This resolution deals altogether with the carriage of the mails between Canada and the old country. I wish the House to understand that it has nothing to do with freight. The object of the Post Office Department, as I understand, should be to have the mails transported between England and Canada in the shortest practicable time. It strikes me that that is a self-evident proposition. Up to the present winter it had always been assumed that Halifax was the port through which the mails should be shipped and landed, with a view of getting them over the distance between Great Britain and Canada, in the shortest possible time, and I understand that the contract between the Allan Company and the government contains a provision to the effect that the mails should be landed and shipped at Halifax. The Allan Company, apparently feeling that they had not a sufficient number of steamships of a high character to carry the mails entered into an arrangement with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, under which certain steamers of the Canadian Pacific Railway line were to take the place of certain steamers of the Allan Company. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company, acting as the substitute and agent of the Allan Company, were undoubtedly bound by the contract of the Allan Company to do whatever the Allan Company were bound to do. However, when the Canadian Pacific Railway Company undertook the work they took a different view, and made the most strenuous efforts to get rid of that provision in the contract which compelled them to land and ship the mails at Halifax. Their efforts to set aside this provision in the contract, however, were unsuccessful. The government insisted, as I understand, that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company were bound, as the Allans were bound, to ship and land the mails at Halifax. There is no doubt that the government were right, and that the view which has been held ever since 1867 was the correct view. Halifax is 250 miles nearer to Liverpool than is the port of St. John, and these boats, as a rule, do not average more than about 16 knots an hour, so that Halifax is 15 hours nearer to England than is St. John. The sea voyage is that much less ; the land voyage to Montreal is perhaps five hours longer, so that under ordinary circumstances the mails coming by Halifax would have an advantage of about 10 hours over the mails landed at St. John—that is, they would be in Montreal about 10 hours earlier than mails leaving England at the same time for St. John. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company, although defeated in their main object, did not give up the struggle in a good humoured way, but adopted the plan of having the mails shipped and landed by means of tenders, instead of having their steamers come to the wharf as had always been the practice. I may say that the mails have been landed and shipped by steamers at Halifax for over sixty years, and the uniform practice had been that the landing and shipping were done at the wharf. There is no difficulty whatever in ships coming to the wharf at Halifax, and that has been the practice, except once, when the Allan Company first took over the contract. I think that for three or four trips they landed and received the mails by means of a tender; but during all the remainder of this period of over sixty years the mails have been shipped from and landed at the wharf. It was found that the landing of mails by means of tenders instead of at the wharf involved a delay of not less than two hours at Halifax. Experience has shown that in addition to that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have thrown every obstacle in the way of passengers landing at Halifax or boarding the ships there. Practically, the passengers were obliged to board the ships and land from the ships at St. John. I think the action of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company during the present winter has had one good effect. It has made clear, not only to the people of Canada, a great many of whom have somewhat indistinct ideas as to the positions of St. John and Halifax, but also to the people of England, that Halifax is the proper port for the landing and shipping of mails in the winter season. I do not mean to say that at some future date some other port may not be developed in Nova Scotia which may have advantages over Halifax, but, as things are at the present time, Halifax is undoubtedly the port for the shipping and landing of the mails in the winter. I was glad to see in a despatch from Ottawa, before I left Halifax, that the government have seen that it is their duty to so arrange that the mails shall get to Montreal in the quickest possible time, and that they have ordered that the mails shall be landed and shipped at the wharf at Halifax. I can only say that the people of Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island are naturally gratified at this decision. I have put the advantage which Halifax has over St. John at 15 hours, but that does not tell the whole story, because that would be true if the steamer, when she got to St. John, was able to enter the port at once. But as a matter of fact the steamer cannot enter the port of St. John safely unless the tide is nearly high. The steamer, for instance, in which Lord Strathcona came out the other day had to wait for some six or seven hours off the harbour, until the tide would allow her to come in, and in that case the advantage of Halifax over St. John might be over 20 hours. In the case of the vessel in which Lord Strathcona came out, the mails landed at Halifax and were in Montreal before Lord Strathcona and his fellow passengers landed at St. John. There is another circumstance which should not be lost sight of, and which has not generally been brought forward when discussing this question, and that is that as regards the province of Nova Scotia and the province of Prince Edward Island, the advantage arising from landing the mails from Halifax, is much greater than in the case of mails going to the upper provinces. The difference in favour of Halifax as to mail destined to any part of Nova Scotia or to Prince Edward Island is probably at the least 24 hours. Now I think that the convenience of the 650,000, or more, people who live in those two provinces, deserves to be considered.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—How many people ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—650,000.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—In Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—How do you make that out ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—There are over 500,000 people in Nova Scotia,

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—Not by the census.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes, but that census was taken some time ago. Well, I will say 550,000, if the hon. gentleman thinks I have put the figures too high. I think it unnecessary to say that I trust that the despatch to which I have referred is correct ; if it is I can only say that, while I am generally ready to criticise the government——

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes, I think the hon. gentleman from Stadacona knows that. Still I think that when they do the right thing, in the face of some difficulty, they deserve credit, and I wish to express my own gratification at the action they have taken.

I should like to express my own view with respect to these mail contracts. When the Postmaster General makes a contract for the carriage of the mails, I do not think that he should go further than to stipulate that the mails should be landed and shipped at Halifax, that being at the present time the best port, and that he should not provide that the steamships shall make their terminus at St. John. The owners of the mail steamers should be obliged to make their terminal port in Canada. But if the Allan's, for instance, think it is more to their advantage to let their steamers stop in Halifax, the Post Office Department is not concerned in compelling them to go to St. John, although that is the present condition of things. As I understand it, during the latter part of the last summer, the Allan Company were very anxious to be allowed to terminate their voyages at Halifax, and I do not see any reason why the Post Office should undertake to compel them to go to St. John. The case of mail steamers is altogether different from that of freight steamers. There are a number of freight steamers subsidized to run to St. John. Some to St. John alone and some to St. John and Halifax. Their case is altogether different, but my contention is that in the case of the mail steamers, which are paid solely for carrying the mail, there is no just ground for insisting that these steamers having brought the mails to Halifax shall be obliged to go any further.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—I have seconded the motion of my hon. friend, because as a resident of St. John, I am perfectly willing that there shall be an investigation or inquiry, and that all possible information on the subject should be laid before the House. I, of course, did not know the line of argument my hon. friend would take, and am not prepared to go into the whole subject; but it must be remembered that the Canadian Pacific Railway have two very fine steamers. I think hon. gentlemen know something about them, and the company was naturally very desirous of making the quickest and best record it could in crossing the Atlantic and in landing the mails. I think that there is an independent contract to which my hon. friend has not referred, and that is the carriage of the China mails, and mails for the east, the arrangements for which were made entirely with the British government, and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company desire to as speedily as possible carry and control the through mails across the Atlantic, the continent and the Pacific, and thence to China.

It is possible, I think, to show that it is a little shorter to cross the Atlantic from Halifax than from St. John, but if you have good steamers and if you control a line of railway across the continent, it is quite possible that you may do the service more quickly by way of St. John, notwithstanding the greater length of water transit than if you had not that railway system behind it. It must be remembered also that the Canadian Pacific Railway contractors are very naturally desirous to avoid the expense which devolve on them by reason of transporting their passengers over the Intercolonial Railway. My hon. friend refers to the fact that passengers are not allowed to be landed by the Canadian Pacific Railway at Halifax. I do not understand that that is an absolute fact. I assume that when Lord Strathcona came out from England the other day, he could have landed at Halifax if he desired to do so ; but it must be remembered that if through passengers land at Halifax, the Canadian Pacific Railway will have to pay the Intercolonial Railway for their transit over the distance the passengers are carried by that line, probably as far as Montreal, and they naturally desire to avoid that if possible. Then, again, it is not all the plain sailing that my hon. friend would lead you to suppose. The Canadian Pacific Railway objects to having its steamers waiting at Halifax for the mails. The steamer going out the other day had to wait several hours because the mails by the Intercolonial Railway were late. These are all points in the consideration of the question which will convince hon. gentlemen that it is a much larger question than my hon. friend has assumed it to be in addressing the House. The great thing is to get the mails carried as quickly as possible. I do not say that that can be done more quickly by way of St. John than by way of Halifax, but if the company which is carrying the mails believes it can do so, and puts up the machinery by which to do so, it should have at least a fair trial. My hon. friend, as I said before, did not touch at all the points with regard to the Chinese mail—the contract with the British government—which is the one great motive of the Canadian Pacific Railway in the fast service. My hon. friend also refers to the fact that the steamers cannot always get into the port of St. John —at least that it is not safe to risk taking them in when the tide is not well up. That may be so, too ; on the other hand, if a steamer came direct to St. John, the possibilities are that she would just as likely not meet that obstruction as to meet it. So there is nothing in that objection as such. I am not prepared to controvert all the statements made by the hon. gentleman, because I have not gone into the matter, but having said that much with regard to the desire of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to transact the business over its own line entirely and not depend on any other company. Hon. members will see that it is natural the railway company should take the position it does, and no one can blame it for doing so.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS

Hon. Mr. MacDONALD (Prince Edward Island)—While these two hon. gentlemen are advocating the merits of their respective ports for the landing of mails, I should like to call their attention to the report of the Prince Edward Island Board of Trade in which reference is made to this subject in a manner, throwing new light upon it. It would be of interest to these hon. members specially, as well as to the senators generally, what the Prince Edward Island Board of Trade has said of its report on this very point. It is published in the island press from which I take the following extracts from the report of the president of the board, Mr. Tidmarsh, a gentleman doing an extensive business in the island :

> The greater part of Mr. Tidmarsh's report dealt with the transportation problem. He emphasized the importance of considering the establishment of car carrying steamers across the Strait of Northumberland, between Capes Traverse and Tormentine. He advocated the extension of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway system to Georgetown the winter port of Prince Edward Island, the connection being supplied by a car ferry at the capes. This would necessitate the taking over New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island Railway, or the construction of a railway from Painsec to Cape Tormentine and from Carleton Head to the Cape Traverse branch, the placing of proper aids to navigation at or near the terminals, and the laying of a third rail on the Prince Edward Island Railway, to make it broad gauge and connect Georgetown, Summerside and Charlottetown with the terminal at Carleton Head. He claimed that Georgetown would be available for ocean going stamers during the entire year, thus affording a Gulf port open to navigation three months after Montreal is closed. By the winter route it is 50 miles nearer Liverpool than Halifax, and 250 miles nearer than St. John, and in summer by the Strait of Belle Isle route, it is about 125 miles nearer Liverpool than Halifax and 325 miles nearer than St. John.
> By the Intercolonial Railway if the connecting links were supplied at the Capes, Georgetown route would be 23 miles nearer Montreal than Halifax. Thus in winter the Georgetown route would bring Montreal 73 miles nearer Liverpool than the Halifax route does. He further claimed that this extension of the Grand Trunk Pacific to Georgetown is a matter of great national importance, as it brings Western Canada in closer contact with the Mother Country than any port in the maritime provinces from which ocean liners now sail. The traffic created by this line would be sufficient to warrant weekly sailings from Georgetown during the entire season of open navigation.

This is the report of an influential body. The boards of trade throughout the different provinces are considered to represent the principal interest of the trading people and the community generally, and this report evidently favours Georgetown as preferable to either Halifax or St. John, owing to the fact that it is nearer than those ports to Great Britain.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière)—I think it was very appropriate for the hon. member from Halifax to bring up this discussion as to the desirability of making Halifax the point for receiving and shipping the mails. There is an active movement now on foot to establish a really fast line of steamers between Halifax and Liverpool, with steamers having a speed equal to those plying between Liverpool and New York, 24 and 25 knots, making the crossing from Liverpool to Halifax in less than four days. Hon. gentlemen will see that the mails have already been carried from Montreal to Halifax in 18 hours. Now with the proposed shortening of the Intercolonial Railway running from a point between Kamouraska and Rivière du Loup to Moncton, shortening the Intercolonial Railway by one hundred miles.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—That would lessen the time by two hours ? making it 16 hours from Halifax to Montreal. The Canadian Pacific Railway steamers, travelling at the same rate as the New York steamers, would cross the ocean in less than four days, and we would have the mails from Liverpool in Montreal over the Intercolonial Railway in Montreal in less than five days. There the Canadian Pacific Railway could take the mails and carry them across the continent as they did last summer by the Over Seas Limited. In Montreal we could receive the mail quicker than the people of New York do to-day and even land them in Chicago as early as they are delivered in New York. The interests of localities must be somewhat forgotten ; there must be a national sentiment in this. Quebec also looks forward to being the terminus of the fast line ; but in a case of this kind we must be all Canadians and we cannot consider merely the interest of Halifax, St. John or Quebec, but must select the best place in the interests of the country. There is no doubt in the minds of impartial people that Halifax would be the nearest and best port to receive the mail, and the fast service should stop there both winter and summer. It is very expensive for steamship lines to shift their headquarters from one place to another every summer and winter ; they should be at the one place the year round. The cost would be minimized, because instead of requiring four steamers for the service three would do, and that would reduce the expense 25 per cent. This subject has been discussed by business men in Montreal, and I believe that if the government would, this session, offer sufficient inducement, a company could be formed and I think the Canadian Pacific Railway would join in the enterprise and would be quite willing to make Halifax the terminal point the year round. These steamers would not go to St. John at all or Quebec either, much less to Montreal. They would make Halifax the port on this side all the year round, and with that system we would have the mails from Liverpool delivered in Montreal in a little more than four days. That is the system to adopt if the government would meet the views of the business community of this country and grant substantial aid to any company which would guarantee the establishment of such a service. I think it was very appropriate that the hon. member from Halifax should bring up this question to-day.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I had not intended to say a word on this subject, but the few remarks made by my hon. friend reminds me of one of La Fontaine's fables. Once the foxes assembled and one of them proposed that they should cut off their tails. After some discussion they asked the fox who had made the proposition to turn round and then they found that he had lost his own tail and that is why he wanted all the others to lose theirs also.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière)—Where is the point ?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The point is that Montreal being unable to secure the fast service, my friend from de Lanaudière wants also the other cities, as Quebec and St. John, to be curtailed in the same manner. The only suitable port would be Halifax, and he knows why.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—There can be no possible objection to granting the return asked for by my hon. friend, and as he and some of the other speakers have said the subject is one of very great interest and of very great importance. It has been engaging the attention of the government in more aspects than one for a very considerable period of time. I would say with respect to the general question that at the present moment we have, largely due to the contract made between the Allans and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, a service vastly superior to anything we have ever had before, and I think all the hon. gentlemen who have crossed the Atlantic recently will agree with me in saying that the turbiners provided by the Allans, and more especially the two 'Empresses' provided by the Canadian Pacific Railway, are boats of a very good class indeed and very creditable to Canada. I would ask my hon. friends, however, to be a little patient both with respect to any possible negotiations which may be going on as regards a very fast service and also as to a matter to which my hon. friend from St. John has rightly referred as being not entirely free from difficulty, with respect to the Canadian Pacific Railway service. We intend, of course, that the contract which has been made shall be carried out. That goes without saying, but I think the House will agree that it is very desirable indeed that, subject of course to the due stipulations which have been made, nothing should be done by us which would in any way interfere with the fulfilment of that rather remarkable contract recently made by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company with the British government, by which mails are conveyed through British territory from London to the Pacific Ocean and thence to Yokohama and Shanghai in a very much shorter time than they can be carried by any other route, and certainly very much shorter time than has ever been done before. It is highly creditable to Canada and quite a feather in the cap of the Dominion that we should be able to provide such a service, and I would deprecate anything which might interfere with it. I am in accord a good deal with the remarks of the hon. senator from St. John in pointing out to you that under certain conditions that service might be considerably interfered with, and it would be inexpedient to do so. As to the larger question presented by my hon. friend from de Lanaudière, I would just say to him that I have very little doubt that in the not distant future something of that kind may be brought about, but I have had a good deal of experience from time to time as to the cost which such a fast service entails. I may remark to him that vessels which run four and twenty and five and twenty knots per hour are enormously more expensive than vessels running from sixteen to eighteen knots an hour, and while if the British government were disposed to co-operate with us—which I think they might fairly do for such a purpose—any difficulty in the way of cost might be overcome, still there is no doubt that vessels which could carry very little freight and which would have to run at very high speed, would require a much larger subsidy than any we have heretofore proposed to give. I am not at the moment quite certain of the cost of the two great Cunarders which are about to ply between Liverpool and New York, but if my memory serves me, I think that those vessels will run into many millions of dollars. I think they are rather more than a million pounds sterling at least—probably ten or twelve million dollars, and a very heavy subsidy besides would have to be paid to them, even if they went to New York. Going to one of our own ports it is probable they would demand a still higher subsidy, because, as every one knows, we could not afford them at first, at least, anything like the number of passengers they might expect going to a larger port. However, when the papers come down we will be able to discuss the whole matter with more information, and in the light of the correspondence that has passed between various members of the government and these companies with respect to this matter. I will only say in conclusion to the hon. senator from Halifax that I was informed that the difficulty which he had alluded to, as to the landing of passengers, will not occur again; that passengers if they choose can disembark at Halifax just as they used to do.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—The remarks made by the hon. senator from de Lanaudière are very appropriate indeed, when he says that we should look in selecting a port of landing for the British mail for the place most convenient and advantageous to the Dominion generally. That being the case, I believe that that port is neither St. John nor Halifax nor Georgetown, the places mentioned to-day, but Louisburg, at the eastern most point of the Dominion and, therefore, the closest to the British Isles. The port of Louisburg is as good as that of Halifax, if not better. It never freezes. Navigation which is impeded sometimes at Halifax, though seldom, which is sometimes impeded for other causes than ice at St. John, N.B., and which is uncertain at Georgetown, is free and open the whole year round at old Louisburg. So much so that even the city people had to build a railway from Sydney to Louisburg in order to take in their supplies for such times in winter as their port was icebound. The port of Louisburg, which has been the scene of tremendous battles between England and France, a town which was once called the Gibraltar of America, in my estimation—I do not pose as a prophet, just as a geographer—is destined to be the port of landing for the mails from England to Canada, and the ultimate terminus of our railroads for passengers boarding the transatlantic steamers. Therefore it is that this question, very properly brought up here to-day, cannot now be solved. We have to wait until the railroads that are now being built are all completed, and then if a port, which is the nearest to England, and the most commodious, is to be selected, as it will ultimately be, in my opinion that port will yet be old Louisburg.

Hon. Mr. MacKEEN—I do not wish to say anything to detract from the merits of Louisburg, which is in the county I had the honour to represent for many years in the lower house. Its capabilities as a port are well known and, I need say nothing in support of what the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat has stated in that regard; but I must remark that he is mistaken in saying that the port of Louisburg is more accessible during winter months than Halifax. It is a mistake entirely. I know both ports personally. I have lived near them for a great many years and I know that the port of Louisburg, which has a fine harbour in every respect, is no more accessible than Halifax, and I simply make this correction because I do not think it is fair that he should say that Louisburg harbour is more free from ice during the winter months than Halifax. That is not correct. I presume the hon. gentleman has been misinformed. As regards the route that has been outlined, it strikes me as one that will some day be adopted, and there is no doubt the proposition, as I first heard it suggested, came from Lord Strathcona, made on a visit during the autumn sometime when Lord Strathcona and Sir George Drummond came cross the Atlantic together. This is a large proposition, but it is one that I think will be taken up before many years. When the time comes that we shall have a population of five to ten millions of people west of the lakes, you will find that that will be the main outlet for the trade that they will have. It may take some time, but there is no question about it, that if we have a fast line of steamers, I am not going to say directly to Halifax, although that has been the port mentioned, but to some port on the eastern coast of Nova Scotia or New Brunswick, the railway service will cover the ground between there and Montreal at a rate of fifty miles an hour, as they might easily do, which is a rate of speed quite common in England, so that the mails could be landed and delivered in Montreal, in Ottawa, and even I think in Chicago, in about the same time as they can now be delivered in New York. The hon. gentleman from de Lanaudière, in speaking of this scheme, perhaps forgot to mention that there was another scheme by which a port in Ireland is to be made the port of landing. I do not know anything as to the merits of a port there, but it is thought that that will be a shorter route than the route to Liverpool. Whether it will ever be made use of I cannot tell. However these discussions certainly do no harm. I do not profess to know which is going to be the better port, but there is no doubt that in due time investigation will be made that will satisfy the public. I think the people of Nova Scotia, as a whole, are pretty well satisfied that the more searching the investigation the more likely it is that a route favourable to their interests will be adopted.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—The matter of the winter port of landing for the mails or the passengers coming to Canada is not one that troubles me. The port which will give the greatest facilities and be the best for the general public of Canada is the one that will suit me best. But in the course of the discussion which has taken place there has been a suggestion I think of aiding fast steamers plying between the port of Liverpool and some port in Canada, and reverting to that subject the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce referred to the conditions conferred on the two steamers that are being built for the Cunard line. He said those steamers required very large subsidies, but he did not say that the conditions are that the Cunard line have to borrow the money from the British government to build those steamers, every cent of it. The Cunard line is one of the lines which has committed the great folly for many years of running a service between New York and Liverpool, which has never paid, for the reason that they have run very fast steamers. The steamers that were popular years ago are not popular to-day. The travelling public patronize the large, comfortable though somewhat slow going steamers. There was a time when it was necesary for a great many of the gentlemen engaged in mercantile and financial pursuits to get across the Atlantic as rapidly as possible. That necessity has disappeared because of the introduction of wireless telegraphy. They are in communication with both continents all the way across.

Now what is best for Canada is that which will pay Canada and those running these lines commercially. These fast lines have not, up to date, paid commercially and they never will, for the reason that they have to carry too much machinery. There is not sufficient carrying space for freight, and these very fast steamers running from New York do not carry over ten thousand pounds of freight. No greater mistake could be made, and I sincerely hope that the government of Canada will turn a deaf ear to the suggestion which I observe in the papers, and the request which I expect is to be made for a large subsidy to aid the operating of these fast steamers. Canada has a great advantage in so far as the transatlantic service is concerned. Its nearness to Liverpool and to Europe makes it possible for steamship companies to run steamers of a capacity which will be paying, and at the same time beat out the New York steamers as to time. The conditions now are that two steamers running from Quebec in summer time and from St. John in winter, make just as good time to the port of Liverpool as the fastest New York steamers. Those steamers are of proportions and of carrying capacity which can be run commercially successfully, and these are the kind of steamers which the Canadian people should advocate and not begin an experiment which has been tried as between New York and Liverpool for years and has proved an utter failure. The 'Campania' and the 'Lucania', the fastest steamers running between New York and Liverpool, the finest equipped steamers that ever crossed the Atlantic Ocean, are to-day neglected in so far as travel is concerned, but the steamers such as the 'Baltic', the 'Oceanic', these large paying steamers are the steamers which are getting the transatlantic traffic. For these reasons I hope the suggestions made by my hon. friend with reference to fast steamers will not be entertained for one moment by the Canadian government.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—I desire, with the permission of the House, to make one more observation. With regard to the port of Georgetown, the port of Halifax, and the port of Louisburg, while these ports have been talking a great deal, we in St. John have got ready for the service and we are doing it. The hon. member from Belleville will be glad to hear the statement which I shall make: The customs officials from all parts of the country assembled to-day to wait upon the Minister of Customs. Just before I left St. John, the collector of customs there came to me and said that the business of the winter port was driving him so much that he was not able to spare a man to come to Ottawa at the time.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (3) An Act to amend the Railway Act, 1903.

Bill (4) An Act in further amendment of the Railway Act of 1903.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Let these Bills lie on the Table till some hon. gentleman makes a motion for the second reading.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Before the House adjourns, I should like to ask my hon. friend the leader of the government what the prospects are of any public measure or Bills being presented to this chamber for our immediate consideration? When I returned to Ottawa after the late adjournment, I certainly did expect to find a congestion of business before this chamber which would have dismayed us. I had in view the very grave expressions of apprehension uttered by my hon. friend the leader of the House immediately previous to that adjournment, and reinforced by my hon. friend from Wellington, as to the probable sacrifice of the public interests should that adjournment take place. But on my return to-day, instead of an accumulation of business, as we anticipated, I find the Orders of the Day without anything before us ; in fact nothing is looming up until a week hence. I would again impress upon my hon. friend the leader of the government the fact that this chamber is entitled to more consideration at the hands of the government with reference to the presentation before us of more of the public business than it is at present receiving. My hon. friend doubtless will be startled if at an early day another adjournment is proposed, and I have no doubt if that adjournment is proposed he will, as on previous occasions, and the hon. gentleman from North Wellington, point out that the public interests are to be sacrificed, and that public measures are not receiving the attention or consideration at the hands of this House that they are entitled to. I, simply mention this fact so that my hon. friend, the Secretary of State, may be apprised of the condition of affairs which confronts us to-day.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—It only shows how very small the ground is that the hon. gentlemen of the opposition have to complain of the conduct of the government, that they cannot bring up anything whatever in the way of censure on the government to occupy the time of this House. I think they are quite right, but I wish they could communicate a little of their discrimination and forebearing spirit to their friends in the other Chamber. It might greatly expedite public business. With a view to meeting my hon. friend's desires I propose to ask leave to introduce a Bill to amend the Petroleum Bounty Act. It is a small matter, but possibly it will serve to appease my hon. friend to some extent.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is throwing oil on the troubled waters.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (G) An Act to amend the Petroleum Bounty Act, 1904.—(Sir Richard Cartwright).

Bill (H) An Act respecting the Quebec, Montreal and Southern Railway Company. —(Hon. Mr. Béique).

WEEKLY ADJOURNMENTS.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In accordance with the custom in former sessions, I desire to give notice of a motion that, until further ordered, when the House adjourns on Friday it do stand adjourned until Tuesday at three o'clock.

Some hon. MEMBERS—Make it eight o'clock.

TELEGRAPHIC COMMUNICATION WITH PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Before the House adjourns, I wish to call the attention of the House, and more particularly of the government, to a question that is of very great interest to the province from which I come. It is the interruption in the telegraph service between the province and the mainland. For nearly two weeks there has been no communication by telegraph between Prince Edward Island and the mainland, owing to the breaking of the cable somewhere near the middle of the strait. I do not intend to make many observations on this matter. It has been before the House on former occasions, and we have placed our case before the government as well as we know how, but I must say that I feel a sense of humiliation in having to address the House on this question at all, because the treatment that we have received with regard to it, as well as with regard to other matters affecting our communication with the mainland, has been met with such indifference on the part of the government of Canada that we feel as if it were utterly useless for us to complain at all. Hon. gentlemen know that it was one of the terms of confederation with Prince Edward Island that the government should maintain telegraphic communication between the island and the mainland. That was one of the duties that was assumed by Canada at confederation. We have been labouring under a contract that was made before confederation, and from that time up to the present a very inefficient service has been rendered. I had the honour of bringing this matter before this House in the session of 1903, when I made an effort to explain the whole situation and to discuss the arrangement at confederation, I referred hon. gentlemen to the various local Acts, as well as the Acts of parliament of Canada that referred to it, and I think I pointed out to the satisfaction of all hon. gentlemen that there is no exclusive right possessed by any company. Yet in the face of that we have now a break in the cable between the island and the mainland, and wireless telegraphy is not utilized, although it is available. There is a Marconi station established at Cap Bear on the island side. There is apparatus for a Marconi service on both of the winter boats, and still the Anglo-American Company is able to hold up their contract at the government apparently and at every one else and say 'We have a monopoly and you dare not communicate across this strait,' even when their own cable is broken, and the province is left in the condition in which it is at the present moment. I feel humiliated that it is necessary for me, as a representative of the province, to rise in this House, or anywhere else, and plead for justice, when we are met with such dilly dallying as this. A short time after a discussion took place before a committee of this House and in this chamber with regard to this subject, and just before the last general election, the government dealt with this contract with the Anglo-American Telegraph Company. Feeling that there was something going on, and prompted by a letter which my hon. friend from St. John very kindly placed in my hands from a telegraph expert, and which suggested the importance of provision being made in any arrangement that would be made with that company, for the laying of the second cable between the island and the mainland, I addressed a letter to one of the newspapers of the province, warning the government or their friends, or anybody who had anything to do with that contract, not to patch up any new arrangement with the Anglo-American Company that did not require the laying of a second cable, because it had been pointed out in the letter to which I had refered, from a telegraphic expert, that their cable that was being used was quite an old one. It was never a very good one and was liable at any time to be broken and the telegraph service to be interrupted. I warned the government to make no new arrangement with the company which did not require the laying of a second cable so that the province would not be exposed to the great danger of having its telegraph communication interrupted early in the winter and remaining in that position the remainder of the season. Notwithstanding that warning the company were given five thousand dollars a year for merely the reduction of the expense of cabling from fifty to thirty cents, and for a modified night service, two things which were undoubtedly advantageous to us but the more important point the insisting on laying an additional cable was entirely overlooked. Now we find ourselves without telegraphic communication at the beginning of the year, and the break is so far out in the strait, in a particular part of the strait, where it is impossible to get a steamer or any other vessel, to relieve or repair the cable until spring. Notwithstanding all that, we find the government is standing by, listlessly apparently, and idly, doing nothing. The reply given in the other branch of parliament to one gentleman from Prince Edward Island was that the government would call upon the Anglo-American Company to repair the cable, or something to that effect, a thing which is utterly impossible, which they cannot do at this season of the year. My contention is that it is the duty of the government to provide—and they should have done it long before this—for the installation of another Marconi tower at Pictou, opposite Cape Bear, which would have given us communication, and that they should have at once given the Anglo-American Company to understand that they would tolerate no further nonsense about that company claiming an exclusive privilege that they did not possess.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—When the agreement was made with the Anglo-American Company by the government some three years ago, it was thought that it would provide all the facilities that were required in Prince Edward Island. The terms were that the rates should be very considerably reduced, that additional service should be furnished ; and in consideration of doing so, and of keeping up the communication, the subsidy was increased from $1,900 to $5,000 per year. The action taken by the government when they heard of the break of this cable was to notify the Anglo-American Company that their subsidy ceased until they made some provision for enabling persons in Prince Edward Island and on the mainland to communicate with each other, either by the Marconi system, or in some other way. There are two boats, the 'Stanley' and the 'Minto,' both fitted up with the Marconi apparatus, and there is always one of these boats at Pictou harbour. And my learned friend stated there is a Marconi station at Cape Bear, and in that way the communication might be kept up.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It is not kept up.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It may not be, but no answer has been received from the Anglo-American Company since the notification was sent them that their subsidy ceases immediately unless they arrange with the Marconi Company to convey the messages. Nothing more can be done by the government. There is nothing to prevent a private company laying a cable across the strait. The government have shown their earnestness by the notification they have given. The Anglo-American Company has no exclusive right; any one can lay a cable. It is not for the government to enter into a contest with them. Private enterprise ought to be equal to laying a cable across the strait connecting the two nearest points on the island and the mainland. My hon. friend thinks the government should do it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If it is a condition of the contract.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Then if it is, it ought to be carried out.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It could not be done without the consent of the government. Would the government give that consent?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Surely the hon. gentleman's answer is not satisfactory to the House. I know it will not be satisfactory to the people of Prince Edward Island. He says the government have given notice to the Anglo-American Company that they will not continue their subsidy.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Unless they make an arrangement with the Marconi Company to deliver the messages.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—All they are going to suffer is that their subsidy will be held back a few months with the strong presumption that it will be paid later through the pressure they know how to exert on the government. My hon. friend says it is open to any company to lay a cable across the strait. They cannot do so at this time of the year, and my hon. friend has no right to say that some private person may provide the service which the government guarantees to provide. Here are the terms of confederation:

> The Dominion government will assume and defray all the expenses of the following services:

Then follows a list of the services, and we come down to 'k.'

> The maintanence of telegraphic communication between the island and the main land and such other charges as may be incident to and connected with such service.

Surely my hon. friend does not think the government is doing its duty when it points out that any company can lay a cable there? Surely he does not consider they are doing their duty by serving notice on the Anglo-American Company that if they do not mend their cable in the middle of the winter their subsidy will not be paid? The government can arrange with the Marconi Company to put up a tower at very small expense. At Cape Bear there is one already, and another could be erected at Pictou and communication established with the railway only five miles distant from the cape. It is high time we should drop having any nonsense with this Anglo-American Company. The government should make arrangements with the Marconi people or somebody else by which we will get efficient service and not be liable to be treated this way at the beginning of the year loosing our communication the whole winter.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—As I explained before, the department having charge of the service has already communicated with the Anglo-American Company, and until their answer is known it is quite impossible for the government to decide what course they will take. The Anglo-American Company have the inducement to maintain the service in order to preserve their bounty. My hon. friend smiles; surely he will admit that the government have shown their earnestness in making this contract and giving more than double the subsidy that was granted before. The Government could do no more than they have done already.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The hon. gentleman's government is very good to the company.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—It is almost inconceivable to hon. gentlemen here how important it is to our small island that this telegraph wire which is broken at the present moment should be repaired. Trade is going on, but it is very much interrupted and interfered with for the want of this cable. While I am pleased to know that the government try to do their best, I think they should have insisted, when renewing the contract, on the cable company having a second cable, because this is not the first time their cable has broken in midwinter, and we have been obliged to do without telegraphic communication until the spring. They cannot mend it now because of the ice, but if they had a second cable it is not likely that both would be broken at the same time. Would it not be possible for the government to establish a service between the boat and the island ? As the hon. Secretary of State says, there is always one of the boats in Pictou harbour and she can communicate at the station at Cape Bear and there is a telephone line from the railway station at Murray harbour south of Cape Bear. All they want is to get the boat at Pictou to communicate with Cape Bear and then the communications can be conveyed all over the island. It is a matter involving very small expense, and I hope the government will look into it seriously and have that communication established. There is a boat at Pictou every night and they can communicate with the island at any time.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think my hon. friend has not thought over the matter carefuly. Each boat leaves port in the morning and is likely to be out all day and in bad weather sometimes for two or three days. Communication with the boats will not do at all. What we want is a Marconi tower at Pictou which will correspond with the Marconi tower at Cape Bear.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—It seldom happens that a boat is not at Pictou every day.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—When the weather is fair.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—When the weather is fair, and communication could be had at any time in the way I have suggested. Of course in very bad weather the boats are sometimes delayed. Something should be done because this cable cannot be repaired until April or May.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I hope the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce in the face of what we have heard, will withdraw his very inconvenient expression when he said we have nothing to report to the government.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Marine Department has placed the communication in my hands, stating that either the 'Minto' or the 'Stanley' is always in Pictou.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—As a matter of fact business men have not been able to get messages through. For one or two days they obtained occasional communications, but since then they have not been able to get messages through at all.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will make the representation.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at three o'clock.

THE SENATE.

OTTAWA, January 18, 1907.

The SPEAKER took the chair at three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

PAYMENT OF MILITIA SERVICES DURING STRIKES.

The notice of motion being called:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General ; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid upon the table of the Senate :—

1. List of all labour troubles or strikes in the Dominion within the last five years.
2. The reasons or causes of each of such strikes, their duration and the number of men intervene.
3. Cases where the Department of Labour intervened, and the result of such intervention, and what happened or how the troubles or strikes ended when the department did not intervene.
4. Whether the militia was called out on the occasion of these labour troubles or strikes, and how much it did cost in each case.
5. Copies of all papers, resolutions and correspondence in connection with these labour troubles or strikes and the settlement of difficulties between labour and capital by means of an arbitration board.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—In order to be able to proceed with this matter, I would ask the hon. Secretary of State if he would give me information on some of the points referred to in this inquiry; for instance, whether the militia was called out on the occasion of these strikes, and how much it cost? I am interested in knowing how much was paid in each case when the militia was called out, and whether it was paid by the municipality interested or by the government. I have reason to believe that in certain cases the government paid for the services of the militia. Would the hon. Secretary of State be kind enough to furnish the information by Wednesday next?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes. The hon. gentleman had better put it in writing, so that I will not forget it.

WEEKLY ADJOURNMENTS.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved:

That pending further order, when the Senate adjourns on Fridays it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, at eight o'clock in the evening.

He said: Yesterday an hon. gentleman proposed to move that when the House adjourns to-day it stand adjourned until Tuesday at 8 o'clock. He came over and saw me and gave me the notice. I felt that it ought to be three o'clock, and changed the figure '8' to '3.' Subsequently, after I had made the motion, a number of gentlemen said it was going to be very inconvenient for them to leave home the night before, and asked if I could not make it 8 o'clock. I consented to make it 8 o'clock, because it seemed to be the feeling of so large a number of members of the House and did not seem to interfere with anybody else, because there will be little or no business for Tuesday.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I do not think that these motions should be submitted to the House; the work of the Senate is being demoralized by these adjournments from Friday until Tuesday night. Such adjournments are very unfair to members who live at a distance from the capital. The answer will probably be made that there is no business before the House, but the barrenness of our paper at this moment is due to the recent long adjournment to a large extent, and our order paper will remain barren if hon. members are getting ready every Friday to leave for home ten minutes after the House meets and can remain away until Tuesdey evening. When they go away their thoughts are not on parliamentary work, and the result is we have no business prepared for the Senate. This practice which has sprung up in recent years of taking these week end adjournments is very injurious to the business of the House. This motion comes at the request and desire of gentlemen who will be found later on offering all kinds of objections to a long adjournment at a time when the House may very properly take a long adjournment. To my mind a long adjournment is not so objectionable as these short adjournments are, while it has the advantage of being a convenience to all the members of the Senate. The short adjournments are only an advantage to those who live within a few hours' run from Ottawa by rail. From some of the gentlemen who are urging these adjournments over Monday we have had long lectures whenever a long adjournment is proposed. Not only that, but on other occasions when the question of adjournment is not up before the House hon. gentlemen who are most interested in obtaining these short adjournments every week through the session, are prone to lecture those who happen to be away towards the end of the session because they do not devote their attention more continuously to business. Hon. gentlemen who, in this way, are able to attend to their own private business every week, will undertake towards the end of the session to say that members who are not present on the last day should resign their seats and give place to men who would be present at such a time. We should have a little fair-play and reciprocity in these things. It is all very well for the members who remain to the closing day to discuss Bills which they cannot amend or change to organize themselves into a mutual admiration society and institute comparisons between themselves and their colleagues who happen to be absent just at that period of the session. They can enjoy that pastime if they please. I am one of those who happened to be absent a few days before the close of last session. My attendance in this House will not compare unfavourably with that of most hon. members. I remain here throughout the session and try to devote my attention to something which will be of advantage in the discussion of public questions, and it is unfair to those who, after remaining here until near the end of the session while others take a holiday every week, to be criticised as we were towards the close of last session by a few gentlemen who happened to be here, and one of whom admitted that he remained because he had already lost the fifteen days. Still he joined in a denunciation of those who happened to be absent on the closing day.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—The hon. gentleman from Marshfield may possibly be making some allusion to remarks which I made at the close of last session in connection with the passage of the Lord's Day Bill. We had on that occasion an exceedingly thin House, and I considered it a very important measure, and thought it would have been better had hon. gentlemen who had undertaken the duties of senators remained in their places and given a measure like that fair and reasonable consideration. My own feeling is that in the interest of the legislation of this country the government should alter the Act regulating the attendance of members of both Houses. When the sessional indemnity was $1,500, members were allowed fifteen or seventeen days' absence during the session. Prior to that they had been allowed some ten days. Now, I think all absent days should be wiped out. Members are fairly well paid for their services, and should devote the time during which parliament is sitting to their public duties here. If there is not day by day legislation to bring before them they should wait until it is introduced. They certainly should be in attendance at least. Such a thing as long adjournments of the United States Senate, or even of the upper houses of the states, is never thought of. Members are in attendance from the beginning to the close of the session, and we ought to have followed the same rule. In England, no doubt, adjournments do take place, but not such very long adjournments as we have here. I sympathize with hon. gentlemen who come from a distance. I see the objection to these short adjournments from Friday to Tuesday comes from members who live at a distance from the capital. I admit it is lonely wandering about here Saturday, Sunday and Monday until the return of members who live within a short distance of the capital, but you must remember that we do not have a Tariff Bill every year. We have not had a Tariff Bill of very great importance for nine or ten years. The last one we had was in 1898. The tariff revision in the House of Commons is largely the cause of the delay in business being put through and sent up to the Senate for our consideration. Until that Tariff Bill is through, the probabilities are that we will have but little work on our hands. Nevertheless, we should be here ready to perform work when there is work for us to do instead of rushing through business at the close of the session, suspending all rules and giving them three readings at the same sitting. It is neither creditable to the Senate to do it, nor is it giving the measures that are presented to us the consideration that they deserve at our hands. It is not discharging our duty properly when we close a session by rushing measures through in that way. For my part, I have objected to it on several occasions, and I earnestly hope the government will not ask us to do it this year.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—I am perfectly willing, as one man that must remain here, that Monday shall be allowed as a full day to those who wish to go away. These hon. gentlemen might remain at home on Monday, but to make us return on Tuesday night is hardly fair. We who remain here during the short adjournments are pining for the companionship of hon. members of the Senate, and we would like to meet them on Tuesday at 3 o'clock. Aside from that, the effect of meeting on Tuesday night is that every hon. member who has anything to bring before the House fixes it for Wednesday, so that everything is set down for Wednesday, and there is no business for Tuesday night. These orders could be placed on the order paper for Tuesday afternoon instead of Wednesday.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière)—There are only three orders for Wednesday.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—We have hardly commenced business yet, and these orders are thrown over in that way. I think the better plan is to agree, without further discussion, that we shall give Monday to these hon. members, but that we shall meet on Tuesday at the usual hour. Many of us are compelled to remain here whether we wish to or not.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—I do not wish to take advantage of this adjournment, but, on behalf of those who desire to go away, it will be no use to them if we are to meet on Tuesday afternoon because there are hon. gentlemen who cannot travel at night; I would not advise them to travel at night, and therefore they should have an opportunity to travel in the day time. I say this on behalf of those hon. members, for whose health I have the utmost regard.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Does the hon. member from Kingston not think that an hon. gentleman whose health is in such a condition that he cannot travel at night would suffer in performing the arduous duties of a senator at an evening session? I feel that I could stand travelling at night, but I really think that working at night in the Senate might seriously injure my health. There is no doubt that the notice which the hon. Secretary of State gave yesterday afternoon was for 3 o'clock, and possibly hon. gentlemen who were in favour of adjourning until 3 o'clock on Tuesday, and opposed to the 8 o'clock adjournment, have gone away under the impression that the adjournment was to be until 3 o'clock. I quite concur in the remarks of the hon. gentleman from St. John. I am satisfied to give up Monday, but I think we should meet at 3 o'clock on Tuesday, for the reasons given by that hon. gentleman.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned till Tuesday evening at 8 o'clock.

THE SENATE.

OTTAWA, Tuesday, January 22, 1907.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Eight o'clock p.m.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

NEW SENATORS.

Hon. Robt. Beith, Hon. Daniel Gillmor, and Hon. Ambrose Hillaire Comeau.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (14) An Act respecting the Georgian Bay and Seaboard Railway Co.—(Hon. Mr. McMullen.)

Bill (10) An Act respecting a patent of the George E. Smith Lumber Co.—(Hon. Mr. Mitchell.)

Bill (9) An Act respecting a patent of Edgar Webster Summers and Hadley Herbert Summers.—(Hon. Mr. Coffee.)

Bill (8) An Act respecting patents of William A. Damen.—(Hon. Mr. Lougheed.)

THE INSURANCE COMMISSION.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I should like to ask my hon. friend the leader of the House, if the government is yet in possession of the report of the Insurance Commission, and, if so, when it will be laid before parliament?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am not aware that it has been received. It was expected some days ago. I will ascertain positively tomorrow, but I do not think it has been received. It will be laid on the table just as soon as it is received.

THE PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND CABLE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Before the Order of the Day is proceeded with, I should like to ask my hon. friend if he can inform the House whether the cable between Prince Edward Island and the mainland is yet repaired, or whether the island is still without telegraphic communication?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am afraid it is still without telegraphic communication. I brought the subject before Mr. Fisher, acting Minister of Public Works, and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and they say they are doing all they possibly can. In the first place, the Anglo-American Company were necessarily entitled to notice and inquiry as to whether they were prepared to go on with the service. The last advice I got from Mr. Fisher was that he had not yet received any communication from the company, although he was hourly expecting it. I impressed on my colleagues the importance of dealing with the matter promptly.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I shall have to trouble my hon. friend with this question daily until I get some information upon it.

PETROLEUM BOUNTY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

The order of the day being called :

Second reading Bill (G) An Act to amend the Petroleum Bounty Act, 1904.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved that the order of the day be discharged, and that the Bill be fixed for second reading to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I would remind my hon. friend that this Bill of three lines is the Bill that has been submitted to the House by the government for the purpose of occupying its attention for the next few days, and I was anticipating a rather interesting discussion emanating from the government on this Bill. I must express my disappointment that the time is not being occupied by that discussion.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Minister of Trade and Commerce is, no doubt, preparing his speech.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at three p.m.

THE SENATE.

OTTAWA, Wednesday January 23, 1907.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON STANDING ORDERS.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG from the Committee on Standing Orders presented their report. He said : If there is no objection I will move that this report be adopted.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Unless there is something very urgent, I would object to the adoption of the report to-day.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I do not know there is anything pressing, unless there be some private Bills.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—There are none on the Order of the Day.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—In all the petitions reported upon to-day, the rules of the House have been complied with.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Then we shall comply with the rules ourselves.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Let it stand till to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The effect is to throw over for another day any business that may come up from the other House. It is purely formal, because the report says that the rules of the Senate have been complied with. Of course, until this report is adopted, the private Bills at present before the House cannot be proceeded with.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—What Bills are there ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There are a number, I think.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Not one.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I understand it is the practice to adopt this report formally. When we have the report from this committee that the rules of the House have been complied with, then it is in order to introduce any private Bills.

The SPEAKER—Is there any motion on this report ? Or is it laid on the table ?

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—We have a double barrelled practice with reference to the report of the Standing Orders Committee. The practice in the past has been that, where no special recommendation is made, the report is accepted formally without any motion at all ; but I have always felt that it was only fair to the House that the report of the committee, whether formal or not, should be adopted by the House. However, there is nothing in this report which is of a contentious character because the whole proceedings are formal. Every petition has been reported upon, and it was only for the convenience of the House that I moved that it be adopted to-day, so that if anybody desired to proceed with a Bill he could do so immediately. I have no objection to the report standing until to-morrow.

The SPEAKER—There is no motion from the hon. gentleman from Killarney.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—No. There was a motion but it was objected to, and as it cannot be put to the House without the suspension of the rule, the motion will stand.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (I) An Act to incorporate the Canadian Mutual and Dramatic Association, Limited. —(Hon. Mr. Casgrain, de Lanaudière.)

ST. JOSEPH TRANSPORTATION COMPANY BILL.

FIRST READING.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE introduced Bill (J) An Act to incorporate the St. Joseph Transportation Company.

The Bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I want to call the attention of the House to rule 113 which says :—

Every private Bill is introduced on petition, and presented to the Senate after the petition has been favourably reportd on by the Committee on Standing Orders.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I wish to assure my hon. friend that the Committee on Standing Orders have reported favourably on the petition.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Yes, but that report has not been adopted yet.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The rule does not say it must be adopted.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Then what is the object of the rule ?

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The hon. gentleman is taking the wording of the rule, and that is what I am doing.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If that is the rule, I should like to have the Speaker's ruling on it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The almost uniform practice in the past has been where the committee reported that the rules had been complied with, the report has not been formally adopted, but where the report recommends a suspension of the rules or some other action, then the report should be adopted. One object of the committee making the report which they have done to-day is to inform the House that the rules have been complied with. That report is before the House, and the House is in a position to deal with the Bill.

The SPEAKER—As there is no recommendation in this report, the report need not be adopted.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (K) An Act to incorporate the Stratford and St. Joseph Radial Railroad Company.—(Hon. Mr. Choquette.)

Bill (L) An Act respecting the Traders Fire Insurance Company.—(Hon. Mr. McSweeney.)

THE PAYMENT OF MILITIA IN STRIKE EMERGENCIES.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. DAVID moved :

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General ; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate a copy of all papers and correspondence having reference to the calling out of militia and to the intervention of the government in the late strikes and riots in Hamilton and Buckingham.

He said : Although I have not obtained all the information which I require, and I do not blame the hon. Secretary of State for that, because I am sure he has done everything in his power to give me what I asked for, with the object I have in view in presenting this motion, I think I may proceed, and make a few remarks with the hope that some hon. members of this House will express their opinions on the subject. When the Militia Bill was discussed three years ago, I expressed the opinion that the government should pay for the services of the militia when called out to suppress riots or disturbances in any part of the country, and I even offered an amendment to the Bill at the time, which was rejected by a small majority of two or three. I think it would have been carried had not the hon. member from Victoria stated that the hon. Minister of Militia had intimated that next year he would probably amend the law in the way that I have indicated. The object of my amendment at the time was to oblige the government to pay for the services of the militia when they should be called out to suppress riots or disturbances taking place on government property or in connection with government works. I at the time was of the opinion, and I am now more of that opinion, that it was not just to oblige the municipalities to pay for the services of the militia in cases especially where those disturbances or riots had taken place on government property or in connection with a government work, and sometimes because of the injustice or neglect of government officials. But now I am inclined to go further and express the opinion, and even to propose a Bill to that effect if I find that I am sustained by the hon. members of this House, and provide that in any case the government shall not discriminate but shall pay for the services of the militia when called out to aid the civic authorities. I propose this for many reasons, and the principal are the following: First, the country pays for the maintenance of the militia. The amount paid for the administration of the entire Militia Deparment costs between four and five million dollars a year. Why does the country pay such an amount, and especially for the maintenance of a permanent force? Is it to protect the frontier against invasion or against foreign aggression? No, no, we are perfectly safe in this respect; we have no wars to fear, no enemies to fight. We are the happiest country in the world, and I doubt whether we appreciate the goodness of Providence towards us. No, the only compensation which we may expect and which we have for the sacrifices we make for the maintenance of a militia force is that that militia may be used and employed as a police force under certain circumstances to help the civic authorities to keep the peace and suppress riots and other disturbances in cases of emergency. I contend that those services ought to be gratuitous; that the least the militia might do is to give its services free, or that they should be paid by the government. My remarks apply especially to the permanent force. As you know, we maintain a permanent force which is composed now of about 2,500 or 2,800 men.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Not more than two thousand.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—The government have a right to raise the permanent force to 5,000, and in the month of June next the number composing the permanent force will be 3,000. I contend that with a permanent force of from three to four or five thousand soldiers, the government is in a position to come to the help of the civic authorities in all circumstances, and that in those emergency cases, the municipality should not be obliged to pay for the services of that force. In reality under the law as it is at present, you oblige the country, and the municipality, to pay twice for the same service. If the permanent force is not sufficient, then let the government increase the number. The fact is that the existing law makes no discrimination whether it is the permanent force or the active militia which is to be called out to quell riots, and the municipality is bound to pay in every case, even when the permanent force is called out.

I say that whether the permanent force or the ordinary militia is called out, the municipality should not pay for their services. I hold that it is unjust, because very often the municipality is too poor in reality to pay for such services. Suppose that a disturbance takes place in the remote Northwest within the jurisdiction of a small municipality composed of a few ratepayers, is it just that the municipality should be obliged to pay for the services of the militia, if a strike, for instance, occurs in that district? The fact is that in many cases the municipality would be absolutely unable to pay for the services of the militia. I say it is a dangerous condition, and why? Because, if you continue to compel the municipality to pay for the service of the militia under such circumstances in many cases they will refuse or neglect to call out the militia in the proper time and the results will be disastrous, not only to the interests of the municipality, but also to the interest of the country. We are all as patriotic citizens desirous of making this country a peaceful one on account of the immigration which we are seeking from all parts of the world. We induce immigrants to come here, and we must show them that we are living in peace, and that we have all the means necessary to maintain law and order. I think I could cite many examples to prove that my assertions are well founded. Take the case of the Buckingham riot. If the militia had been called out at the proper time, we would not have to regret the deplorable results of that disturbance. There would have been no bloodshed. My remarks apply also to Hamilton and the different places where the services of the militia have been called for. There is only one objection which I think may be raised, but I do not consider it to be a serious one; and that is that if the municipalities are not obliged to pay for the services of the militia or the permanent force, they may be requisitioned for without sufficient causes. The fact that it may occur accidentally, as an exception, is not sufficient reason for rejecting something which is fair and just as a general rule. It has been said very often, that the abuse of a good law or of a sound principle is not sufficient to reject the law or to condemn the principle. It matters very little whether the government may spend ten or twelve thousand dollars a year without sufficient cause. The loss of the money by the government is a small matter compared with the inconveniences resulting from the neglect or the refusal to call out the militia at the proper moment. In any event the government is well protected by the statutes with regard to calling out the militia. The government has not much to fear in regard to having the services of the militia called for without sufficient cause. Sections 80 and 81 of the statute state what is necessary to obtain the services of militia in emergency cases. Section 82 reads as follows :—

82. The civic authorities, by whom such requisition may be made, are : (a) if the place where such riot or disturbance occurs or is anticipated is municipally organized, the mayor or warden or other head or acting head of the municipality, together with two justices of the peace, or in the event of such mayor, warden or other head or acting head refusing or being unable to act, the county or district court judge or one of the county or district court judges having jurisdiction in such place, acting alone, or if there is no such judge then any judge of a superior court who has jurisdiction there.

I have a right to say that there is enough in this clause to guarantee that the services of the militia will not be called out without sufficient cause. I have prepared a Bill to strike out two clauses in the Militia Act which compel the municipality to pay in such cases ; but before presenting that measure to the House I thought proper to ascertain the views of hon. members on the subject.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Before we hear from the government, I think it might be well that there should be a little expression of independent sentiment with respect to this matter. I always like to agree with the hon. gentleman from Mille Iles, but I regret to say that on the present occasion I do not find myself able to do so. In the first place, with respect to the calling out of the militia, I think that it is a step that should be taken only when it is absolutely necessary. In all ordinary cases at any rate, the protection of the people's lives and property should be in the hands of the civil authorities. I think it is not desirable that the militia should be called out except when absolutely necessary. There is one unfortunate circumstance which generally accompanies the calling out of the militia and that is the inflicting of serious wounds and sometimes death upon some of those who are disturbing the peace, and I think it is a great deal better that the policeman's baton should be used than rifles and bayonets. The hon. gentleman's idea is that the government should in all cases pay the expense connected with the calling out of the militia; that the municipality in which the disturbance has occurred should pay nothing. That I think would be a very dangerous principle to lay down. This country is now in its fortieth year as a confederation, and we have had the existing law on the statute-book during that time. We had it for sometime before confederation in the several provinces; and that fact alone should make us a little careful about undertaking to change the present practice. I feel that the effect of providing that the municipality in no case should pay for the militia in cases of strike might be very different from what the hon. gentleman supposes. As it is now, the civil authorities in the municipality, the town council or the city council or the county council, whatever body governs the municipality, will try and prevent riots from occurring, just because they feel that if they call upon the militia the municipality will be assessed for the expense incurred; and I think it most desirable that these local difficulties should be disposed of, as I said before, by the civil authorities, and that the militia should not be called out.

If parliament provides that in every case the government shall pay for the militia, the effect will be that the municipalities will not make the earnest efforts which they should make to prevent disturbances and to quell riots when they arise. They will trust to the government footing the bill, and the result will be that many more disturbances will occur, and the country will be victimized to a very consideraable extent. I think that that is a very undesirable condition of things to bring about. The hon. gentleman from Mille Iles told us that we had now a considerable permanent force and that the permanent force would be called out, not the militia. It is true that the permanent force to-day is more numerous than it has been in the past, but there are not as many members of the permanent force available for service throughout the country as there were three or four years ago. It will be remembered that some months ago Canada took over the duty of garrisoning Halifax and Esquimalt ; and I think the garrison of Halifax is supposed to be about 1,500, and of Esquimalt, about 500. I do not know that there are these numbers at those places at presesnt, but that is the strength which those garrisons are supposed to have. So that at St. John's in the province of Quebec there are not as many members of the permanent force as there were two years ago. Outside of St. John's, taking the province of Quebec, there are a few members of the permanent force at Quebec, but not as many as there were a few years ago. So that in the whole province of Quebec you have simply two small detachments of the permanent force. Clearly, in the case of Buckingham you could not very well have had a department of the permanent force brought all the way from either St. John's or Quebec in time, and that would have been necessary if the militia had not been called out. The same thing is true of Ontario. There are very few members of the permanent force at the present time stationed in Ontario, and, consequently, very few members of that force are available, to be used as the hon. gentleman supposes they would be so. So that in most cases the militia would have to be called out. The hon. gentleman says it is going to cost the country very little; but if you call out 200 militia men it involves interference with their usual duties and it involves a very considerable expenditure for transportation and maintenance and all that. Then the hon. gentleman said that these small municipalities and remote districts would not be able to pay for the militia. But, as a rule, serious strikes do not take place in small, remote localities, because there are not many men employed in small and remote municipalities, and you have not the material for strikes. I think that the case of Hamilton is an illustration of the sort of danger that we would be subject to. As far as we can gather from the reports in the newspapers, the sympathies of the chief civil officer of Hamilton were altogether with the strikers ; and if the mayor of Hamilton and some of his assistants had done their duty at the beginning, that strike would never have attained the dimensions that it did. The government will, I have no doubt, deal with the subject in a satisfactory way, but as one member of the House I think it would be much to be regretted that the course suggested by the hon. gentleman should be adopted.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I desire to offer a few remarks in addition to what has been said by the hon. gentleman from Halifax. I largely endorse the views he has expressed upon this question. I think that if the country was called upon to assume the responsibility and the expense of paying the militia, and supplying the militia every time they were asked to put down a riot or a strike, it would take a very large force to meet the demands that would be made. In municipalities, mayors and municipal officers are largely dependent upon the popular vote for the positions they occupy, and sometimes they are called upon to endanger very seriously their positions, owing to the fact that they have perhaps to displease a very large percentage of electors by taking a stand for a principle, or a question of what is right and what should be done under stress of circumstances. In that view, municipal officers would to a great extent refuse to act at all. They would virtually say to themselves 'I must quarrel with a certain section of the electors if I interfere in this strike, and rather than place myself in that position, I will allow the government to call out the militia and quell the disturbance.' That would be virtually the course taken if the government were to supply the militia in every case where it was required. I quite agree with the hon. member from Halifax, that the law which has been in existence since confederation has worked very well. I should like to see the principle carried out, that in every single case where a municipality requires the services of the militia to supress a riot they should be called upon to pay the expense. There should be no exception made to that rule, because if you make an exception in one case you open the way for political influences and other influences to be exercised with the government of the day, and the result will be that after a while the proposition that has been made by the hon. gentleman from Montreal might just as well be the general principle upon which the militia would be supplied. I think the law should be rigidly enforced where a strike takes place in any city and rioting ensues, and if the civil authority cannot suppress the riot or keep peace and order within the limits of the force that they have, and they have to appeal to the government for the militia to maintain the laws, the city should pay the expenses. Another view of the case is that it would be entirely unfair to a rural district to provide this expensive method of putting down riots in cities and towns, and make the rural districts pay their share of the expense. Rural districts do not require service of this kind. I have never known a rural municipality that required the service of the militia to suppress a riot. It is only in the cities or towns it occurs.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—In the county of Ottawa.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—In that case there may have been one. That is an exception to the rule. As a rule it is not the custom for rural sections to call out the militia ; then why should rural districts be called upon to pay for the suppression of riots in cities ?

If the suggestion propounded by my hon. friend from Mille Iles were carried out, the expenses would come out of the consolidated revenue fund of this Dominion, to which every farmer and every man in the rural districts contribute a share, as well as those in the cities and towns. I do not think in that case it would be right. The law as it stands is a good law. The government should be urged in every case to rigidly enforce the law, and if they do so, I think they will serve the best interests of the country, and we will be able to maintain in our cities and towns order of the kind that we should maintain under all circumstances. The militia have done good service whenever they have been called out. No riot has taken place that they have not been able to suppress. We all regret riots and strikes. We should not have them, and I earnestly hope the day is not far distant when we will have a law upon the statute-book that will largely put a stop to all those things and that our people will respect each other, both labourers and employers, so that we will not require to have the militia called out to settle disputes between them.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—I had no intention of speaking on this subject, but the arguments advanced by the two hon. members who have just spoken are so very foolish in my opinion that I think they should not be allowed to pass. Why, hon. gentlemen possessed of the intellect and the intelligence that those two hon. members are known to possess, should wander into such a labryinth as they have done, and not extricate themselves from it, is very singular to me. Why should the municipality pay this expense ? Is the municipality the cause of it ? Has it anything to do with it ? Not at all. It was part of a system, a struggle between capital and labour, which invades the whole extent of the country and with which the whole extent of the country is concerned. I think it was a very wise and judicious act on the part of the hon. gentleman from Mille Iles to bring up this question. I think it is a hardship of the worst kind, and a most invidious discrimination that the municipalities should pay for those services. What had the municipality of Buckingham to do with that strike ? Nothing whatever, only the strike took place in the village and simply because the battle ground was in that region the municipality is called upon to pay the whole expense of the militia. That is unfair. The permanent force should be employed. The militia have their prejudices and feelings and may either overdo their duty or not do it sufficiently. On the contrary, the permanent force being under orders, one of them is equal to ten militia men if not more. Another point is this : the only great objection to calling out the permanent force is the expense. I know that in all the recent instances where the militia have been called out, the opinion has been expressed very generally that they should have been called out sooner. If you are going to apply a remedy the sooner that remedy is applied the better. Now, I contend that the hon. gentleman who introduced this Bill did what was very fair, proper and just. It is an act of extreme injustice to make a municipality pay for a riot which it had no possible means of stopping. It is a question which concerns the whole country and the country should bear the whole expense of it and bear it cheerfully. If you are going to consider the parish politics of discriminating between the benefits a small place derives and the benefits which the country derives relatively from the suppression of a riot, there would not be any law properly carried out. Therefore, in my opinion, a very strong reason for this measure being brought in has been furnished, and I hope the hon. gentleman may succeed in carrying it.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The hon. member from Kingston has expressed more forcibly than I can the views I hold in regard to the question before the House. I am in sympathy with his remarks, and I would wish to add my expression of surprise at the attitude taken by the hon. gentleman from South Wellington and Halifax in regard to this matter. Their views in regard to it are somewhat narrow. They do not seem to seize the entire import of the question. A municipality is responsible when it is the cause of a riot, and should be held responsible, but not so when the riot is caused by people over whom the municipality has no control. I do not see why the ratepayers of that municipality should be called upon to pay the expenses of suppressing a riot caused by strangers imported into the place. The national government is responsible for the general peace of the country, whether on the banks of the St. Lawrence or along the frontier, whether it is a band of marauders that attacks our flag on the frontier, or our peace in our own country. The principle is the same. Where the municipal authority is at fault, then let the municipality stand the burden of the expense. I remember well when the hon. member from Mille Iles brought up the question two years ago. It was with reference to a strike which took place outside of the city of Montreal on property belonging to the Dominion government under the control of the Harbour Commissioners, over whom the city of Montreal had no jurisdiction. There was a riot there that lasted two or three days. How long did the militia stop there? They remained eight or ten days if not two weeks, when their presence was not required. Why it is a picnic for a large number of militiamen to go out on those occasions. I heard the hon. gentleman make the remark that they were taken from their daily avocations. They were only too anxious to patrol the wharf when there was no riot to be suppressed, and yet for all this the city of Montreal was called upon to pay. The hon. member from Mille Iles, who was acquainted with the situation, came before this hon. House and tried to impress upon the government that a clause should be inserted in the Bill whereby the militia would be paid by the government when called out to suppress a riot or disturbance taking place on government property. That was a very legitimate demand, and on that point I am with him entirely. The government of this country has no right in law or in equity to force a municipality to pay for services which are not required by that municipality.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—The hon. gentleman was not present when I mentioned his name, and said that the amendment I moved would probably have carried had the hon. gentleman from Victoria not stated to the House that the Minister of Militia had expressed the intention of amending the law during the following session.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The hon. gentleman is perfectly correct in his statement of the facts. When the discussion was going on before the House, I had occasion to see the Minister of Militia and talk the matter over with him, and I impressed upon him the necessity of providing for these occasions at least. He then stated that he would see to it that an amendment would be made to the Act at the following session. We have never heard anything of it since. Dealing with the matter as submitted by the hon. gentleman from Mille Iles, I am with him on nearly every point. The government should pay for preserving the peace on government works, whether that government be provincial or federal. The hon. member from Halifax did not seize the point made by the hon. gentleman from Mille Iles when he said that a riot in a village or hamlet could not be a very serious affair.

The hon. gentleman ought to know that in the development of Canada great railway works are going on which pass through hamlets and villages, where hundreds and thousands of men are at work. These men are birds of passage, but they may happen to be in a little hamlet of a few families and create a riot which the municipality cannot suppress. They have perhaps a couple of thousand hard men to deal with. The government is appealed to send the militia. Is it fair to say that that municipality, with probably a couple of thousand dollars a year revenue, that they must pay ten or fifteen thousand dollars for the expenses of the militia ? It is not fair on the face of it. You could not exact it. Then why not admit part of the hon. gentleman's demands and say yes, under these circumstances the government should pay, rather than to say it should never be done under any circumstances. In the construction of the Cornwall canal we have had some disturbance of the peace. I think on some occasions a threat was made that the militia would be called out. On that canal there are four or five small municipalities with very limited revenues and because some hundreds of working men created a disturbance, if the militia had been called out, they would have been saddled with the expense. It is not fair, just or equitable ; the suppression of the riot was not for the benefit of the municipality but for the benefit of the government in the construction of that public work. There can be no two opinions ; that part of the demand of the hon. member from Mille Iles is perfectly justified under the condition of things existing to-day in Canada. Now as to enlarging the principle and saying that under all circumstances the government shall pay for the expense of militia used in suppressing riots or disturbances, I make an exception that the government should not be made to pay if it is the fault of the administration of the municipality.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—Who is to judge the default ?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The courts of the land are there to judge, and if necessary the matter could be laid before any commission which this government might appoint. On that one point, I would disagree with my hon. friend from Mille Iles, but where it can be proved that the municipality does not benefit, but loses large sums of money, loses in its property, and in its name through a riot for which it is not responsible, and of which it has not been the cause, and the militia are called out, the government should pay the expense. That is the only limit I would make in his demand. I do not see any difference between repressing a rebellion within our own provinces and facing an invasion by an enemy. Under the circumstances, if the hon. member sees his way to push this question to the front and keep it there until the government takes action, he will find me with him for the best part of it anyway.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is no objection to the address going, and the papers referred to will be brought down. I desire however to dissent from the dictum laid down by the hon. gentlemen from Mille Iles, Kingston and Montreal, that the government ought in such cases to pay the expenses. The hon. senator, in his motion, refers particularly to the papers and correspondence having reference to the calling out of the militia and to the intervention of the government in the late strikes and riots in Hamilton and Buckingham. Under our constitution the preservation of the peace rests properly with the provincial authorities, ergo with the municipal authorities organized under provincial law. Any other conclusion would be a serious interference with civil rights, which I think, the municipalities themselves would be the first to rebel against. Take the two cases we have under notice, Hamilton and Buckingham. What was it in those places? One body of the tax-payers against another body of tax-payers. In Hamilton it was the employees on the street railway, householders, tax-payers and citizens of Hamilton who had a grievance against those employing them. It arose entirely from that. It could have been quelled in the first instance, as some hon. gentlemen stated, had it not been for the supineness of the authorities, probably an election coming on, the mayor or municipal authorities hesitated about preserving the peace and allowed the strike to develop into a riot. At Buckingham it was the same ; one body of citizens wanted either shorter hours or more pay. They wanted their employers to grant certain concessions. Had the municipal authorities at Buckingham remonstrated with those men in the first instance and said, you have a right to withdraw from the employment and to bring reasonable pressure on the McLarens, but you have no right to arm yourselves and attack them, a riot might have been avoided. It was perfectly well known that they were acquiring arms for the purpose of attacking their employers. It is monstrous to say that in a case of that kind the people of Canada should be called on to pay the expenses of a domestic row between the citizens of the locality. There might possibly be in the case put by the hon. gentleman from Victoria, where it was entirely on government property, or where the parties employed, as in the illustration he gave, were navvies, not citiezns of the place. In such a case I admit there might possibly be good reasons why the government should pay the expense of the militia, but in the cases mentioned in the motion before the House, it would be a monstrous proposition to ask the people of Canada to pay for the consequence of the indifference and supineness of the authorities of those two places, who simply for popular reasons hesitated about checking their own people from resorting to arms. The papers will be brought down in due time.

The motion was agreed to.

LABOUR STRIKES—MOTION DROPPED.

The Order of the Day being called :

By the Honourable Mr. DAVID :

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid upon the table of the Senate :

1. List of all labour troubles or strikes in the Dominion within the last five years.
2. The reasons or causes of each of such strikes, their duration and the number of men affected.
3. Cases where the Department of Labour intervened, and the result of such intervention and what happened or how the troubles or strikes ended when the department did not intervene.
4. Whether the militia was called out on the occasion of these labour troubles or strikes, and how much it did cost in each case.
5. Copies of all papers, resolutions and correspondence in connection with these labour troubles or strikes and the settlement of difficulties between labour and capital by means of an arbitration board.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—In view of what I have heard, that there is to be a Bill before the House of Commons relating to the same matter, I think it might be better to ask that the Order of the Day be dropped.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—All the papers have been brought down already, so the order may as well be discharged.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—Unless some hon. members wish to discuss the question, I have no special reason to let the motion stand, and in view of the Bill which is to come before the House, I do not think it is necessary to bring on the discussion now.

The motion was dropped.

CONTRACTS FOR SLEEPERS FOR NATIONAL TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired :

1. Have Messrs. Gendron & Desmarais, of Hull, and Mr. J. Hearn, of Quebec, obtained collectively, or any of them for the others, or either of them for himself, the contract for furnishing sleepers upon the Transcontinental Railway ?
2. To whom has the contract been awarded ?
3. For what quantity of sleepers, and at what price?
4. Has a money deposit, as a guarantee for the execution of the said contract, been made ?
5. For what amount, for what period, at what date, and to whom was this deposit remitted ?
6. On what date did 'The Canada Gazette' publish the official notice asking for tenders for furnishing the sleepers in question ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The answers are as follow :

1. Thomas Desmarais, of Hull, sent in two tenders for railway ties, viz.:—

One for 210,000, at 50 cents for 1st class, 46 cents for 2nd class, each. (This tender was assigned to John G. Hearn, of Quebec.)

Another tender for 335,000 ties, at 50 cents for 1st class, and 46 cents for 2nd class. (This tender was afterwards withdrawn ; the reason assigned, could not fill the contract ; no security deposit accompanied this tender.)

2. A contract was awarded to John G. Hearn, of Quebec.

3. 210,000 ties, at 50 cents for 1st class, 46 cents for 2nd class, each ; 335,000 ties, at 57 cents for 1st class, 44 cents for 2nd class, each.

4. Yes.

5. Accepted cheque for $10,332 deposit on contract for 210,000 ties, July 30, 1906. Accepted cheque for $18,224 deposit on contract for 335,000 ties, September 20, 1906.

The above security deposits were handed by J. G. Hearn to the Commissioners of the Transcontinental Railway.

RAILWAY CONSTRUCTION AT QUEBEC.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired :

Who has the right to build and who is virtually causing to be built :

1. That section of railway which, leaving the northern extremity of the Quebec bridge, runs, in a direction parallel to the River St. Lawrence, towards Champlain wharf, in the city of Quebec ?

2. That other section of railway which, leaving the northern extremity of the Quebec bridge, runs, in a direction at right angles to the River St. Lawrence, towards the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway ?

Under authority of what law is the building of each of these sections taking place ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The answers are :

1. The Quebec Bridge and Railway Company.

2. (a) The Canadian Northern Quebec Railway Company, under the chartered powers conferred upon the Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia Railway, are building a line of railway from where the central line of the location of the said railway crosses the southerly limit of the main highway leading from Cap Rouge to St. Louis road, Quebec, to the boundary line between the counties of Portneuf and Quebec. (b) The Transcontinental Railway Commission have under contract the line of railway from the Quebec bridge westerly to La Tuque, and the construction work is under progress in the vicinity of Cap Rouge. (c) The authority for building each of these sections is as follows :—The Quebec Bridge and Railway Company, under statutes 50-51 Vic., c. 98 ; 54-55 Vic., c. 107 ; 60-61 Vic., c. 69 ; 63-64 Vic., c. 115 ; 3 Edw. VII., c. 177 ; 3 Edw. VII., c. 54. The Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia Railway Company, 3 Edw. VII., c. 178. The Transcontinental Railway Commission, under the National Transcontinental Railway Act of 1903 and amendments thereto.

SPECIAL PASSENGER TRAINS ON INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired :

On what conditions, and at what price per mile run or time occupied, do the authorities of the Intercolonal Railway furnish a special passenger train upon their line ?

Has a superintendent, or any officer whatsoever of the Intercolonial Railway, the right, on his own authority, to run a special passenger train gratuitously ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The tariff for special passenger train is one dollar per mile, with no less charge than $15. Passengers are to hold regular transportation in addition to the above. No superintendent or any officer whatsoever of the Intercolonial Railway has the right, on his own authority, to run a special train gratuitously.

THE COURT MARTIAL OF TELESPHORE ROY.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY moved :

That an order of this House do issue for the production before this House of all papers, orders, rules, charges, reports of inquiries, evidence, and judgment rendered, by any council of war or court-martial whatsoever, concerning a soldier of the ordnance corps by the name of Télesphore Roy, at Quebec, accused and found guilty of any offence whatsoever, and sentenced on that account to cells and hard labour ; together with all documents relating to this matter, before and after the charge and the judgment of the military court; the names of the complainant, of the officers who sat on the court-martial, of the defender of the accused, of those who confirmed the judgment; and a copy of the record upon which were based both the judgment of the court-martial and the confirmation by superior authority of the judgment rendered.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have not had an opportunity of consulting anybody about this. If the report can be brought down, I shall be very glad to bring it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think it should be produced in justice to the department. There is a paper published in Quebec which some time ago gave the details of a very sad case which tells against the Militia Department. I will translate the article, and move for the return in justice to the Department. Here is what the paper said :

The new Deputy Minister of Militia is a young, able man most anxious it is said to fulfil the duties of his position.

We draw his attention to a case which calls for some explanations.

Some time ago an employee of the military stores obtained his annual leave of absence, the end of which coincided with the end of his time of service as a soldier.

Before the expiration of his leave of absence he went one day to his quarters where he met one of his principal superior officers. He was asked by him to re-engage at the expiration of his time of service, but he peremptorily refused without, however, giving any reason for his refusal. But being pressed by his superior the private yielded to his solicitations and told of the complaints that he had against one of his immediate superiors. It was his misfortune. The following day he was arrested, locked in the cells, where he remained eighteen days before appearing before the military court. As that happened in the last days of November one will easily realize how little heat was to be found in the stone compartment where the prisoner was detained. And though sick at the time, his cell was never heated, nor did he receive any medical assistance.

One would believe that these horrors occurred in Russia and not in Canada, and we certainly would not have given any credit to the story if it had been told to us by the prisoner, but we hold it from a distinguished superior officer, whose name we cannot divulge.

There are, no doubt, in our militia, officers who abuse of their authority. The one to whom we allude is not at his first fault.

How could you expect that our French Canadian population could be drawn into the militia with such facts bursting under their eyes? It is greatly time that Ottawa should look into the matter.

That was published in Quebec and distributed amongst the people. I thought, in justice to the Militia Department, we should be in a position to know whether those accusations are well founded or not, and I want to give the department an opportunity to defend themselves.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not know what the rule is with reference to making public the evidence given before a court martial and the result. However, the motion in the meantime can go and I will see that the matter to which the hon. gentleman has called the attention of the House is brought before the Minister of Militia, because the case requires further inquiry. Certainly, if the statements made in the article which has been read to the House are true, somebody is very much to blame for improper and tyrannical treatment of an innocent man.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If there be any practice in the Militia Department such as is indicated by the hon. Secretary of State, by which there is a suppression from the public of evidence taken at a court martial, and particularly in a case where such a gross act of injustice has been perpetrated as has just been disclosed in the article read by my hon. friend, such practice should be not only discontinued but denounced in the very strongest language. If there is any such tyranny practised as is indicated in the article which has just been read, then I say the duty of the government is plain, is manifest that all practices of refusing publicity of evidence should be disregarded and full justice should be done in the matter.

It seems to me that court martials are a relic of the days of military tyranny, and it is impossible to conceive that there can be in this age a loyal adherence to any military body where the man himself, the private, the man who has not the influence of the officer, is not fully assured of having ample justice done him in a case which may come before his superior officers. I cast no reflection whatever upon military officers, but we know that many of the military officials have not been in the habit of meting out that justice to the men which they would receive from a civil tribunal, and there is no manifest reason whatever why the men belonging to the military bodies of the Dominion, or any other country should not be assured of the same justice being meted out to them at the hands of a court martial as at the hands of a civil tribunal. I hope my hon. friend will not hesitate for one moment in this case to see that a thorough investigation takes place, and if such abuses as has been indicated by my hon. friend exist, that the guilty party shall be brought to justice.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—I have had a great deal of experience in these matters, having commanded a cavalry regiment for 20 years, and I should like to say to my hon. friend that he is entirely wrong as to the arbitrary powers of a court martial, whether it is an officer or a man. If it is a man, he is tried by officers; if it is an officer he has to be tried by his superior officers, and the finding of that court martial has to be confirmed by the general officer commanding the district, whatever he may be. We have seen it in England, in the navy and in the army. We have seen them reverse the decisions of the court martial; or rather, they would not affirm them. My hon. friend is wrong in his conclusions. I do not find any fault with the hon. gentleman who has brought this motion before us. It is right that the case should be investigated, but the hon. gentleman fom Calgary assumes that these statements are correct, and then he leads us to suppose that the discipline of the army could be carried on without a court martial. I leave it to my hon. friend, the member from Stadacona who makes this motion, to say how impossible it would be to run a regiment and to carry on the command in a corps if the superior officers had not some power to act. If you come to a criminal offence, then the officer simply hands over the offender to the civil authorities and lets them deal with it. Am I correct ?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Yes.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—I cannot see why there should be an attack on the militia law in regard to court martials. They are very necessary. If my hon. friend had had the same experience as I have had, he would know that it is impossible to carry on a command without them, and no commanding officer who is really a good officer ever permits an arbitrary sentence to be carried out. From my own experience in the militia, they have erred on the side of being lenient to the offenders, recognizing the fact that although they may be soldiers enlisted for three years under the British North America Act, which is embraced with the King's regulations of England, that under these regulations all over the world an allowance is made for volunteers. If you are not going to have volunteers, say so, or if you are not going to have discipline, say so. If you turn them out and say there is no power to punish them and they can do as they like, then you will get away from the idea of having the force under control. I am not going to say whether what the hon. gentleman has read to the House is right or wrong. He does not say it is so. He merely reads it to the House. If that newspaper report is right, then there has been a flagrant wrong. I do not know what the regulations are, but I cannot see how the man could be put in the guardroom and held there for eighteen days without trial. Under the regulations he must have a trial in so many hours. I think we should look at this matter in a moderate way and not inflame the public and not injure the militia of Canada by publishing these statements. When a man is charged with an offence he has a right to have counsel appear for him. It is quite true that the public are not admitted, because it is a private inquiry. It is hard enough now where you draft young boys, recruits, not knowing what is imposed upon them, and they do not know that the discipline will prevent them from doing as they please on occasions. I once tried a man. He deserted from one regiment and went into another. I could not get him back from the commandant. I looked up the regulations and I found he was a deserter. I sent to the other line and had him brought out by force, and I frightened the life out of the other officers. I said : 'Now gentlemen, we do not allow blackguards in the 8th Princess Louise Hussars, and I struck his name off the service roll. That was against the Queen's regulations, but I took upon myself to do it. I stripped him of his coat and trousers and everything he had that was the property of the Crown, and put him in the bush. That was drastic treatment, but it was sufficient to show the regiment that discipline must be maintained, and that the commanding officer did not desire to have punishment for punishment's sake. The hon. gentleman from Calgary, on thinking the matter over, will see that to throw any difficulty in the way of the Militia Department, I do not care which side of politics they are—the Militia Department were very good in the Conservative regime and certainly are very good under the present regime—would be very unfortunate. It would be extremely unwise for this Senate to affirm the principle that a man cannot be punished by court martial and that military trials should be eradicated from the Militia Act, because if you do that you strike at the fundamental principles of the soldiers life. As to whether this man has been unduly punished or not, it is quite proper to discuss the question, and if those who undertook to punish him exceeded their duty, they should themselves be punished.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (De Lanaudiere)—I do not know what the hon. gentleman from Rothesay thinks of court martials generally, but I should like to have his opinion of the court martialling of Dreyfus.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—That is in another country.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—They have done away with the court martial in France. I did not say a word on the merits of the case at all, I do not know sufficiently what they are. I just put before this House an accusation brought before the public by a Quebec paper. I am asking for all the correspondence in relation to that case so that we may see what really happened at the time. I will now say a word of court martials, or of the putting of a man under arrest. I always understood that the newer divisions of higher commands was made to decentralize the administration of our militia so that everything could be done in the different districts. I will relate to this House what took place some three or four weeks ago. A young student in Laval University was attending a voluntary military course in Quebec. On entering the course he became subject to the military law. One day he failed to do his duty. I think as an officer of the day he failed to come at the proper hour. He was put under arrest. Every one knows that when a man is put under arrest by his commanding officer he cannot afterwards be released from his arrest except by superior authority.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—Quite right.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—He was put under arrest and the case was reported to the District Officer Commanding of the district, who did not choose to act on the merits of the case. He reported to the high command at Montreal.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—That was wrong.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—And the high command reported to Ottawa. An arrest cannot last more than 7 days. Well the 7 days were passing by, so that they were obliged to renew the whole thing, and that young man was all the time under arrest, could not do anything at all, was obliged to report every two or three hours at his quarters. Finally he got tired and sent in his resignation. He said: 'I will get out of the militia; I do not want to remain there.' Finally the report came back from Ottawa. There was something missing. They wanted additional information. At Quebec they answered 'It is useless to give the information, the chap has gone.'

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—He was punished by that time.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—So the thing fell through. I think all those punishments should be administered in the proper way. If a man is guilty he should be punished; there is no doubt about that; and if he is not guilty there is no use keeping him fifteen days under arrest to ascertain whether he is guilty or not.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—If the facts of this case, as stated, are correct, it is a discipline that is not in accordance with the spirit of the age, because such a proceeding was never intended. My hon. friend knows you cannot arrest a sergeant. You could in olden days.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—But an officer could be put under arrest.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—He must be reported to the orderly room. I cannot believe that the facts related in this matter are correct. There must be some mistake about it. If these statements are correct, it is not the fault of the Militia Department, it cannot be the fault of the general, and certainly it is not the fault of the Minister of Militia. It is probable that some District Officer Commanding down there has exceeded his duty and done something absolutely wrong.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGT—I would say to the hon. leader of the opposition and the hon. gentleman who made this motion that I rather think the analogy, if there is any analogy, between the civil and military proceedings, would lie as respects a similar application made for a case tried before the ordinary civil courts. I speak under correction, but I do not at this moment remember any motion having been made in parliament in any case, for the proceedings the records or the evidence taken in an ordinary court of justice? Does my hon. friend recollect any such motion ever having been made?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I do not recollect any such motion having been made.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I do not think it has been made. I agree with my hon. friend that this motion should only be granted conditionally.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I am satisfied.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—We cannot, without consideration, establish a precedent in these matters which might be detrimental to the general service, although I fully agree that both in this House and in the other House, if any instance of oppression or any instance of wrong-doing on the part of either civil or military authorities, comes to the knowledge of any members of the House, they are perfectly entitled in either House to speak of it and to call the attention of the government to it. I do not mean to dispute my hon. friend, but he will observe that as a general rule the proceedings of court martials have some analogy to the proceedings of an ordinary civil court of record, and I think it would be found to be convenient that we should preserve the same rule in dealing with the one as in dealing with the other. I speak subject to correction. The matter is one of some importance, and it will be inquired into.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I will accept the suggestion of the hon. minister and let the motion pass, and let the department judge of the whole matter. If it is to their advantage to do it they will do it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I would say in answer to the interrogatory of the right hon. gentleman—because he has put it as a question—that there is scarcely any analogy between the two cases here referred to. In the case of the evidence taken at a court martial, unless the government willingly divulge it, of course it is impossible to secure a copy of it; but in the case of a civil investigation before the courts the evidence is accessible to every man, woman and child who may make an application for a copy of it, or an application to peruse the proceedings. Therefore, I say that if there is such a practice as that indicated by my hon. friend the Secretary of State it is clearly unjust to the man, because it establishes a kind of star chamber proceeding by which it is utterly impossible for the public to determine whether justice has been done. If the proceedings are not to see the light of publicity, it is impossible to determine whether those officers are administering justice as fairly as a civil court would administer it. The statement I make is not intended to throw discredit on the court martial, except to say that there is a tendency to do injustice on account of the seclusion and privacy which they enjoy. My remarks were calculated to lay down the principle that any soldier joining the militia in this Dominion should be at least assured of having as full justice and equity dealt out to him with respect to any contravention of discipline as any individual contravening the civil law.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—He has all that. He has an action at law if he is wrongfully punished. There was a case at Jamaica where they signalled the captain of a man-of-war, some sixty years ago, ordering him to go into action. He would not go into action. He was tried by court martial for his refusal to obey when they signalled him and his answer was 'My ship was not fit to fight, as she was in no condition, and I acted in the interests of the British nation and all the men on board the ship in declining to go into action.' He was tried by court martial. The case is a very well known one. He was fined five thousand pounds. He appealed against it, and won in the law courts, because they had no right to impose a penalty as he was doing what he thought was right. And so it is now. No officer is without the right of appeal to the civil courts if he is unjustly punished in any respect.

The motion was agreed to.

LOCATION OF GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON inquired:

Whether the location of the Grand Trunk Pacific or National Transcontinental Railway through the Yellow Head Pass, in the Rocky mountains, has been approved by the Railway Commission, or the government, or both, and if so, will the terminus of the National Transcontinental Railway on the Pacific ocean be established at or near Prince Rupert?

He said: Hon. gentlemen will remember that when the National Transcontinental Railway Bill was before parliament in 1903, in both Houses the assurance was given that the route of that railway was to be through the Peace River country, the Pine River pass, or the Peace River pass, and by such outlet through the Rocky Mountains to Port Simpson or some place in that vicinity on the Pacific Ocean. It will also be remembered that the distance given during the discussion in both branches of parliament in 1903, and the distance mentioned in the other branch of parliament in 1904, of the Mountain section of the National Transcontinental Railway was to be 480 miles. The modified contract came before this branch of parliament in 1904, and my hon. friend the Secretary of State gave a very different distance in regard to the mountain section. He informed parliament that the distance through the mountains would be 766 miles, an increase of nearly 60 per cent on the length of the road through the mountains as given the previous year in both branches of parliament, and as given in the Commons in the year 1904? I endeavoured then to get some information and some explanation of this extraordinary discrepancy between the length of the mountain section of that railway as given in the House of Commons and given in this House the same year, as my hon. friend will, I am sure, remember. I have taken the pains to revive my own recollection on the subject by reference to the Hansard of 1904. He explained that in consequence of some very important deviations that were necessary to be made about the head of the Skeena river, and through the necessity of following the route of that river, it was found the length of the mountain section of the road would be very largely increased. I have in my hands a document issued recently by the Interior Department, in which is indicated a route marked upon a plan or a map showing that the Grand Trunk Pacific enters the mountains through the Yellow Head pass and then pursues a northwesterly course through the province until it is made to reach the Pacific ocean in the vicinity of Port Simpson, or the place that is now given the name of Prince Rupert, and a glance at the map will convince any person that this distance will be about the distance given by the hon. Secretary of State when he addressed the House on this question in 1904—somewhere between 750 and 775 miles. I may say that it would be impossible when you come to examine the profile carefully to make the railway 766 miles long in the mountains, if you went through the Peace River pass. That seems to be an utter impossibility. But the route indicated on this map from the Interior Department, through the Yellow Head Pass and terminating at Port Simpson, would be quite consistent with the longer distance given by my hon. friend the Secretary of State in 1904. Therefore it would seem, although my hon. friend did not appear to be aware of it, that it was in contemplation at that time to use the Yellowhead pass. The subject becomes one of vast importance, because all the calculations that were made during a very lengthy discussion in both branches of parliament in 1903 and again in 1904 were based on a length of the mountain section of 480 miles. The hon. gentleman must remember very well that the increase of the mountain section by over fifty per cent means an enormous increase in the obligations to be assumed by the government of Canada, and it is for the purpose of throwing light upon this subject, which stands in a very peculiar position at this moment, that I ask this question of my hon. friend. I do not want the government to disclose any private information as to the exact spot located for the terminus on the Pacific ocean. There might be reasons why it would not be convenient for them, but there is no reason why parliament should not be informed whether the original intention is being still carried out with regard to the terminus at or near Port Simpson or Prince Rupert. That is my object in asking the question of which I have given notice, and I may say that I also want it for the purpose of our being able to weigh more clearly questions arising in connection with this National Transcontinental Railway. If it be correct now that Yellow Head pass is the route that is selected for the National Transcontinental Railway, all the plausible arguments that were addressed to this House and to this country about the great advantages that were to arise from opening up the Peace River country were simply valueless. However, I have just disclosed the reason for asking the question, and I leave it to my hon. friend to give us whatever information the government is willing to vouchsafe at this juncture. The publication I have in my hand is : 'The last best West ; Canada in the Twentieth Century.' It is issued under the direction of the Hon. Frank Oliver, Minister of the Interior, Ottawa, Canada.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I shall endeavour to obtain some local information from gentlemen who should be familiar with it. During our debate on the National Transcontinental Railway Bill a great deal of the argument must have been hypothetical, because we had not full information. It was predicated on the assumption that the two passes, to which my hon. friend has referred, were feasible and likely to be adopted as enabling the railway to be built through the Peace River country. Now it is found, on an examination by the engineers, that the Yellow Head Pass route is preferable, and that is the route, as I understand, that has been adopted. I am speaking subject to correction. The answer handed me by the officials to my hon. friend's question reads in this way :

(a) Yes, by the government, by order in council, dated 24th November, 1906.
(b) The route map shows the line of the National Transcontinental Railway, approved, to Prince Rupert on the Pacific coast.

REVISED STATUTES BILL.

COMMONS AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN.

The Order of the Day being called :

Consideration of the amendments made by the House of Commons to (Bill B) An Act respecting the Revised Statutes, 1906, and to provide for the French version thereof.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I desire now to call the attention of the Senate to the amendments made to this Bill, which passed through this House, but was amended slightly in the other chamber. The first amendment to which I desire to call attention is in section 3 of the Bill. That clause reads as follows :—

The revised statutes of Canada, 1906, being as contained in the roll mentioned in section 1 of the Act 3 Edward VII., chapter 61, are hereby confirmed and declared to have and to have had, on, from and after the first day of January, 1907, &c.

Those lines have been struck out and the figures '30' inserted before 'the first day of January.' At the time the Bill passed, it contemplated bringing the Act into force the first day of January, but that has been found impossible in consequence of the index not having been ready, and therefore it is proposed now, as amended in the House of Commons, to bring the Act into operation on the 31st of January, and so the change is made.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Will the French version be then ready?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, no ; not for some months. It cannot possibly be ready in the natural order of things until the final revise is made. It is quite impossible to make any progress with the French version, because the changes made simply meant throwing aside the translation which had been prepared two or three days before. The revision of the statutes involves so many changes and alterations that it is hard to say when the final will be reached ; therefore it was hopeless to make any translation until it had been made up in the shape of a roll and passed out of the hands of the reviser.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Can my hon. friend say how many copies of the English version will be ready for distribution by the end of January?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think there will be three thousand copies.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Is the index to the English version now ready?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No ; they are endeavouring to get it ready by the 31st.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It seems to me my hon. friend is taking a very short time. A week from to-morrow will be the end of January.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I move that the House concur in the amendments made in the House of Commons to clause 3 of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—What is the purport of the change erasing these words 'as contained in the roll mentioned'. And the erasure in clause 10 to have superseded the French version of the roll mentioned in section 1 of the Act 3 Edward VII.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The only explanation I can give is that they must have been regarded as surplusage—nothing else. I see no particular advantage in their being there or not being there. We are making the revised statutes as they exist to-day the law of the land, so that the reference to the roll seems quite unnecessary. I move concurrance in that amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Then in section 10 there is a verbal change, the words 'translators to revise' being struck out, and the words 'persons to prepare,' be inserted. Then the word 'translator' is struck out, and then the word 'they,' referring to the persons to prepare. The word 'ratification' is struck out, and the word 'version' substituted for it. It is purely verbal. There is a change in the order of the sections. What was section 17 before, is now made a subsection of 15. The words struck out there are 'An Act respecting the revised statutes, Edward VII, chapter 61, and it now reads in this way. 'The last mentioned Act and the Act amending chapter 36 are hereby repealed. What was section 15 before is now section 16. Then the figures 30 are added before the 'first,' bringing it into operation on the 31st of January.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I see that the amendment proposes to amend one of the titles.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes. The title is 'An Act respecting the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906.' The words 'and to provide for the French version thereof' are struck out. I move that those amendments be concurred in.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The amendment says 'After legislation insert corrected.' That is dividing the sub-head of that section. If you take clause 16 and make it 16 (2) where will you put your sub-head.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—What was clause 14 we make 16. Clause 16 becomes 14 and 16 is now 15, and then comes in clause 16 with a subsection 2 which was formerly section 17.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I move in amendment that these amendments be not concurred in now, but that they be concurred in this day six months.

The amendment was declared lost.

The motion for concurrence in the amendments was carried on a division.

The Bill was then passed with the title as amended.

TELEGRAPHIC COMMUNICATION WITH PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Before the House adjourns, I wish to ask my hon. friend a question in regard to what we discussed yesterday as to what knowledge he has with reference to the repairing of the cable or re-establishing recommunication with Prince Edward Island ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The House meets at 2 o'clock on Wednesdays, and there is no meeting of the cabinet on that day. They have short meetings on every other week day. Therefore, unfortunately, I was unable to see any of my colleagues this morning. I, however, telephoned to Mr. Fisher, who was acting Minister of Public Works, but I was unable to reach him. I think I can assure my hon. friend that the government feels the importance of prompt action and are taking all necessary steps. I do not think they are likely to deal very much with the Anglo-American Company. I fancy they have lost confidence in that concern.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Perhaps to-morrow we will have an answer.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Perhaps.

The Senate adjourned until 3 o'clock to-morrow.

MUTUAL RESERVE LIFE INSURANCE INVESTIGATION.

INQUIRY POSTPONED.

Notice of motion being called :—

In the evidence given by Mr. Eldridge in the Mutual Reserve Life investigation, recently held in New York, he sated that it had cost the company $24,000 to get the legislation through the Senate and Commons of Canada in 1904. I shall move that the company be required to furnish the names and detailed statements of the amounts paid, if any, to senators or members of parliament in Canada, or to the respective firms to which they belong, in connection with the said legislation, and copies of all cheques issued and receipts given therefor.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I have been requested to allow this motion to stand for a few days, and I have no objection to do so.

Hon. Mr GIBSON—Before the hon. gentleman's request is granted, some explanation is due to the honour of members of this House whom he charges, I think unfortunately. At all events he requests the government to furnish the names and detailed statements of the amounts paid, if any, to Senators or members of parliament in Canada or to the respective firms to which they belong, in connection with the said legislation, and copies of all cheques issued and receipts given therefor. The hon. gentleman from Wellington states that in Mr. Eldridge's evidence in the Mutual Reserve Life investigation, recently held in New York, it is alleged that the company expended twenty-four thousand dollars to get legislation through the Senate and parliament of Canada in 1904. I do not know what my hon. friend is quoting from, but I have read the evidence taken by the Legislative Insurance Investigation Committee, volume 5, 1905, as the evidence of what Mr. Eldridge did say. It is the official record of the investigation that took place in Albany, and I know my hon. friend from Wellington——

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I rise to a question of order. If the motion is allowed to stand, the matter will come up again for discussion.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—But I object to the notice remaining on the order paper in its present shape. It is a reflection on members of both Houses as having received a consideration for their services in regard to an investigation that took place in this building.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—And I am sure my hon. friend, when he considers the whole question, will take the evidence from the books instead of from hearsay, or from the printed records, which we have every reason to believe are authenticated by the government of the state of New York, the official testimony taken before the Legislative Investigation Committee of the state of New York, by authority of a joint resolution of the legislature, &c., at a session held July 10, 1905, on a resolution of which the following is a copy :—

Resolved that a joint committee be appointed consisting of three members of the Senate and five members of the assembly, which committee shall after the adjournment, proceed to investigate and examine into the business and affairs of life insurance companies doing business in the state of New York, with reference to the investments of said companies, the relation of the officers thereof to such investments, the relation of such officers of such companies to subsidiary corporations, the government and control of such companies, the contractual relations of said companies to their policy-holders, the cost of life insurance, the expenses of said companies, and any other features of the life insurance business deemed by the committee to be proper for the purpose of drafting and reporting to the next session of the legislature such a revision of the laws regulating and relating to the life insurance.

Now this is what I am to quote from, and then I have no objection to my hon. friend proceeding to lay a charge against any one he pleases in connection with the extraordinary expenditures of that company. But he goes further than that, and asks this House to declare itself, so to speak, as verily believing certain members of this House and of the House of Commons were paid for their services in connection with the investigation which took place.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I deny making any such charges whatever. I want to exonorate the members of this House and of the House of Commons from the charge of having received money. That is my object ; it is not to condemn them. The statement is made that a certain amount of money was spent for the purpose of securing legislation in this parliament. I want to show that no member of the Senate or the House of Commons received a bribe. I want to know if this discussion is in order?

Hon. Mr. TESSIER—Is there any question before the House ?

The SPEAKER—There has been no question put before the chair, but the hon. gentleman from Wellington has moved that this motion stand adjourned until another day.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It has not been put from the chair.

The SPEAKER—It is moved by the Hon. Mr. McMullen, seconded by the Hon. Mr. McDonald (Cape Breton), that this motion be postponed until Thursday of next week.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is unusual to undertake to discuss a question which the mover desires to have postponed ; but I wish to say this to the hon. gentleman from Wellington, that inasmuch as this notice of his seems to reflect upon the honour of the members of this House, it is his duty if, as he says, he wishes to exonerate the members of the Senate, to proceed at the earliest possible day; and I am sorry to find that he proposes to put the matter off another week, leaving this notice to remain on the paper.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—My reason for doing so is simply this : I am promised information with regard to the matter which has not reached me yet. It may be here tomorrow or the following day, and I have been requested to allow the matter to stand.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—It is for that very purpose that I rose as I did, in all kindness to the hon. gentleman from North Wellington, to give him time to reflect on the unfortunate language he uses in his motion.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I want to know if my motion is to be discussed now ?

Hon. Mr. WILSON—The hon. gentleman from St. Catharines has a perfect right to express his views why this motion should not be delayed and, therefore, has a right to speak.

The SPEAKER—The discussion should be limited to the demand for adjournment.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I am not going to traverse the field of all the investigation in the city of Albany in regard to this or any other question, but if my hon. friend's desire was to do as he has stated in his remarks, he has been most unfortunate in the language he has used with regard to the honour and dignity of parliament. He proposes to move that the company be required to furnish the names and detailed statements of the amount paid, if any, to senators or members of the House of Commons in Canada or to the respective firms to which they belong in connection with the said legislation, and copies of all cheques issued and receipts given therefor. Now as my hon. friend has been waiting for certain documents before proceeding with this resolution, I was simply in all kindness trying to give him a start with the facts of the case as they are under my hand.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is out of order.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I am not out of order. The hon. gentleman is withdrawing this statement, and asking the House to let him withdraw it. When the House gives him the privilege, surely he has.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I have made no such request.

The SPEAKER—The motion is not to withdraw, but to adjourn the motion.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—He asks to withdraw it, because he has not got certain documents ; but at the same time he starts out with a certain declaration that, according to the evidence given by Mr. Eldridge in a recent investigation, it cost the insurance company $24,000 to get legislation through the parliament of Canada.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I said nothing of the kind. The hon. gentleman must not put in my mouth language that I did not use.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I am reading the document which is in print before every member of this House. I only want to read to the House the names of the gentlemen who composed the committee which investigated the affairs of the Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association. The committee started with a small number, but was increased from time to time during the investigation, because the importance of the matter demanded it. I am not here and never have been here for the purpose of defending the Mutual Reserve or any other company that does business in a dishonourable way in Canada ; but I have the right, as a member of this House, to see that the honour of the Senate is unsullied before the public.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I rise to a point of order. The question is the postponement of this motion. The Speaker has said that the remarks must be confined to that question, and I want to know if the hon. gentleman is in order ?

The SPEAKER—I am afraid the hon. gentleman from St. Catharines is travelling somewhat afar from the question.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I want to——

Some hon. GENTLEMEN—Order, order.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I object to the adjournment, and the Speaker ruled I was in order in doing so. I am speaking of that now and I am showing the reason why there should not be an adjournment of this motion. I say the honour and dignity of this House demand that the question shall be settled now and for ever. If the hon. gentleman can name any member of that committee, of which he was a member, or name any hon. senator as deserving of having such language applied to him, let him say who it is that have been paid in connection with that affair. The statement is entirely at variance with the practice of the state legislature of New York and commissioners in the city of Albany. This matter should not have been delayed for one year, and it is the duty of my hon. friend, who has the honour of this House as much at heart as any one, to name any member of the Senate who has received compensation in connection with the investigation which took place before that committee. I took my share in the investigation. Certainly it was not a pleasant duty, but so far as my judgment goes I do not believe there is a single gentleman for or against the committee who is dishonourable enough to accept one dollar at the hands of any corporation or private individual.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I was intimately associated with this investigation for nearly two years. I got abuse but I did not get dollars. I was called 'the chairman of a discreditable committee,' but before this country to-day, and before the policy-holders of the civilized world, that committee stands with credit instead of discredit to its name, because owing to the investigation of that committee, the evidence of which was suppressed by the newspapers of this country, the government and legislature of New York State learned that their Superintendent of Insurance was paid from $20,000 to $40,000 for changing reports on behalf of the Mutual Reserve Life Association. The matter was brought to the attention of the legislature through our investigation. An investigation was ordered by the legislature and the government of the state. If we failed largely in persuading this honourable House to believe the facts which were brought out by that committee in regard to the administration of that company, it was largely due to that man Eldridge.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I appeal to the hon. gentleman from Victoria to confine his remarks to the subject before the House. He is now going into the history of the whole matter, which is out of order.

The SPEAKER—I would request the hon. gentleman to limit his remarks to the motion of the hon. gentleman from Wellington, to adjourn the matter for a week.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—That is exactly what I am trying to do. To come immediately to the point, the motion of the hon. senator from Wellington is perfectly in order, and the hon. senator from Lincoln misinterprets his motive and misunderstands his action in the matter. As I read this motion it does not reflect on the Senate or the Commons. To my mind it is an attempt on his part to take away the odium that rests today on the parliament of Canada owing to an investigation held in New York and owing to the statements which I believe to be false, there made by the same Eldridge. The hon. gentleman from Wellington is doing a service to this parliament to disprove the statement made by Eldridge that $24,000 had been paid to corrupt members of parliament, and for sufficient influence to obtain the judgment he secured in regard to that investigation.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Eldridge does not say so in his evidence.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I had the honour of speaking to the chairman of that investigation in New York thirteen or fourteen months ago, when the present Governor Hughes was conducting the investigation, and the question was put to Eldridge, and the amount he mentioned was not $24,000, but $15,000.

Hon. Mr. TESSIER—Did he say that in your presence ?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—No, I am giving the version which I got from the chairman at the trial which took place a year ago in New York. In the examination of the vice-president of that company the evidence came out that a greater amount had been paid. When did he tell the truth? Was it before the investigation, or the trial in court ? The result of the trial was that one officer of the company was sent to the penitentiary, and I expect the vice-president, Mr. Eldridge, will be sent there also, because it was the smaller officer that was sent when the greater officers were the culprits. Under the circumstances, the hon. gentleman from Wellington has done his duty in this matter. He has not charged that money was paid, but he is asking in this House, in consequence of the statement made by Mr. Eldridge that $24,000 was paid to secure legislation in this parliament that the information be got from the company as to where that $24,000 went. I believe that Mr. Eldridge did not tell the truth. Under the circumstances, I fail to see why the hon. gentleman from Lincoln should object so strenuously to the notice of motion given by the hon. senator.

The SPEAKER—The hon. member from Lincoln does not object to the motion but to the adjournment of it.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The hon. gentleman from Wellington has asked as a favour for himself and other senators to have the motion adjourned awaiting further information. I have some information in regard to the matter myself, and am prepared to go on with the discussion now. I think also that the hon. senator from Wellington has enough information to proceed with the debate if the House insists upon it.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—The charge preferred by my hon. friend against the hon. senator from Lincoln is entirely erroneous. What he objects to is giving publicity to unfounded charges reflecting upon members of parliament. He should proceed with the investigation of those charges as rapidly as possible, so that there will be no reflection on members of this House. I, therefore, agree with the hon. member from Lincoln that this motion ought not to stand adjourned. It would be unfair to the members of this House. When an hon. gentleman insinuates charges against any member or members of this body, he should either proceed with the investigation at once or withdraw the charges. If you read the hon. gentleman's notice carefully you will see that it contains an insinuation.

If parties here are guilty of receiving money, why does he not proceed and show it? Why should he delay this matter? I agree heartily with the views expressed by the hon. gentleman from Lincoln, that the motion should not be postponed until to-morrow or any other time, but should be proceeded with to-day. I feel that it is unfair to us, and unjust that this should be delayed at all, spread on the order paper day in and day out, published in the press and go abroad that there is an insinuation from a man in New York that this legislature had been bribed and induced to take money to pass legislation in the interest of the Mutual Reserve. I do not know whether my hon. friend believes that Eldridge tells the truth or not. I have no great confidence in Eldridge, and I would not feel disposed to place upon the order paper any statement of his which reflected upon this House, which stated that something had been done which should not have been done.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—This a matter of more than ordinary importance. It is a matter of privilege for every member of this House, and a special privilege for every member of the committee who sat on that investigation, and for my part if it were stated by Mr. Eldridge that a sum of $24,000 had been expended to obtain legislation in this country, I think it would be but proper to ask for an account of that sum, because it would look to me as being an exhorbitant sum. But I fail to see that the hon. member for Wellington is justified in drafting his motion as he did. He commences by stating that Mr. Eldridge had charged that it had cost the company $24,000 to get their legislation through the Commons and the Senate of Canada in 1904. I say that if this statement is correct—I have just glanced at Eldridge's statement and I do not see anything of the kind, but I have only read it cursorily and I may not have seen the portion where the statement was made. I saw a statement about $15,000, not $24,000, and have seen the statement connected with the further explanation that it was paid to a legal firm and witnesses, and matters of that kind—but even if that statement is correct, I fail to see that the hon. gentleman from Wellington is justified, whether it be $15,000 or $24,000 that has been spent to put legislation through the Senate and Commons of Canada, in asking that the names and statements of the amounts paid to members of Parliament of Canada——

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If any.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—But it contains an inference. The way he has framed it, there is an inference in the first statement that the money must have gone, or is likely to have gone to members of parliament. I say it is unfair to members of this House and an infringement upon the dignity of members of this House, and it becomes a question of privilege. For my part I am desirous the moment a question of this sort has been put on the order paper, that it shall be inquired into, and I shall vote that the motion be carried out, that a detailed statement be obtained ; but I think the hon. gentleman is in duty bound to use his best endeavours to bring the matter before us as soon as possible. I think we should expedite the matter. It seems to me unreasonable to ask that a matter of privilege of this kind should be postponed for eight days.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is not usual for parliament to take note of idle reports. If we did we would have committees of inquiry constantly at work. No senator and no member of parliament has a right to put a notice of this kind on the paper unless he takes the responsibility of its truth. We constantly hear gentlemen in the House of Commons making charges, and the question is at once put, 'Are you prepared to take the responsibilty of making officially the statement that those charges are true ? If you are, you can have a committee ; if not, you have no right to make the insinuation.' I think my hon. friend would take the wisest course by allowing the proposition to drop, and he may, after more mature consideration, perhaps, place a notice on the order paper when he is prepared to inform the Senate that he has inquired into the facts and he is satisfied there is some foundation for the statement.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—If it is the desire of the House to drop the motion and smother it in that way, I shall raise no objection.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—No, no.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I hope to be in a position to satisfy the House that my statement is correct, that a very large sum was mentioned. I understood it was $24,000. I saw it stated in print in some paper. I am satisfied of that. I have asked for the evidence, but I have not yet received it ; I believe it will be sent to me. If the House considers this motion is out of place and wish it dropped, all right.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—No, no.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I regret to be obliged to say that I cannot agree with the Hon. Secretary of State. This notice which the hon. gentleman from Wellington has placed on the order paper, although we know there is really no substance behind it so far as this House is concerned, is calculated to leave the impression upon the minds of people outside of this House that there was something improper in connection with this New York Mutual Reserve business when it was before this House. If the hon. gentleman dropped the matter now, the suspicion in the minds of the people outside the Senate would be strengthened.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The Secretary of State says ' Oh,' but that is a fact. The feeling of suspicion would be deepened, and we owe it to ourselves to insist that this inquiry shall take place at the earliest possible moment. The hon. gentleman has not taken the usual parliamentary method of proceeding, but having taken the line that he has, it was his duty as a member of this House to have proceeded at the earliest possible moment and not to have kept this imputation hanging over the heads of members of both Houses week after week.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think it would be most unfortunate for this House, if in consequence of the expressions of opinion that have been given, my hon. friend from Wellington should be compelled to drop the motion at this stage, and as he says he is not now ready, why not say Tuesday next ? If he says Tuesday next, I think that would be a reasonable arrangement. To-morrow would not be a day that we could devote much time to it, and as we are not meeting on Monday, let him say Tuesday, and then deal with it.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I am willing.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—It is practically a matter of privilege. My hon. friend from Wellington states that just as soon as he receives certain information he is prepared to proceed, and it is not desirable to postpone this motion for any long period. He may be in possession of the information at any time, perhaps to-morrow, and I think the postponement should be as short as possible, so that just as soon as he receives the information the matter may be dealt with.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière)—I think it should be continued from day to day, and if we are to have an investigation, surely some one is responsible. As it stands at present nobody would be responsible. This is idle talk. I understand that Eldridge is now in jail.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Not yet.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière)—He was going to be. I submit that this matter should be placed in such a position that somebody would be responsible. Surely the Senate would not make the inquiry unless somebody would take the responsibility.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I have urged that this matter be proceeded with forthwith, and, with all due deference to the hon. Secretary of State and the other gentlemen who have spoken, I still urge that this motion should be proceeded with.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman has no right to speak again.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I made a motion, and can speak in reply.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—It seems to me the hon. gentleman from Wellington ought to be treated with the same courtesy as any of us would expect to receive. He has framed the motion in a very unfortunate way, but he states that these charges have been made. I infer from his remarks that he does not believe the statements which he refers to in his motion. He may have entered upon a chivalric course unnecessarily, but I think he should not be disposed of summarily. I should be inclined to allow his motion to stand till Tuesday with the understanding that it should then be proceeded with.

The motion was allowed to stand until Wednesday, January 30.

CIRCULATION OF PUBLIC BILLS.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière) moved :

That in the opinion of the Senate, it is desirable that copies of all public Bills introduced in parliament be sent to the judges of the superior courts throughout Canada.

He said : In making this motion I may say that I have been asked by some of the judges of the land to move in this matter, and to ask if it would not be possible for the government to send them copies of public Bills. Bills of a private nature need not necessarily be sent to them, but they should receive all the public Bills, and would then be in a position to study the legislation as it goes on. They would be able to get familiar with it, perhaps follow the debates in both Houses of parliament and, when called upon, they would be able to apply the laws which they would have studied closely. It is suggested by the hon. gentleman from Killarney that the judges might offer suggestions. I do not think that we should raise that matter in this House. It is very likely that some judges might offer suggestions on public legislation before the Bills were passed, and as Bills are being introduced into either Houses of parliament, especially in the Senate. Copies could be sent from the distribution bureau, or in some other way that we might deem proper, so that the judges can follow the legislation as it is being passed. A large number of Bills are sanctioned on a particular day ; the next day the judges may be called upon to apply this very law, and they have had no opportunity of becoming acquainted with it. I would ask the hon. Secretary of State if he could see any way of meeting the views of the country by a provision of this sort ?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I do not think this House should pass a motion of this kind. We should simply call the attention of the Printing Committee to it. It is their duty to attend to it, and they will no doubt be ready to act on the suggestion. I think it is a very useful suggestion, but it is not necessary for any motion to be made in regard to it. My hon. friend should change the wording of his motion a little, so that we should be assured that all the judges of the Supreme Courts of the different provinces would be included. It speaks of the Superior Court, and there being no court known by that name in most of provinces, it might be held that it only applied to one province. Let it be understood that it applied also to the higher judges of all the provinces.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman from Marshfield misapprehends the position. All courts higher than the County Courts are known by the general name of Superior Courts : and further, I do not think the hon. gentleman from de Lanaudière has pursued an objectionable course? When the Printing Committee are informed that the Senate have by resolution expressed a desire of this kind, the Printing Committee are much more likely to do the thing which is sought to have done than if there is no expression of opinion from this House, but simply a desire expressed by an individual member.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I understood that last session the Printing Committee reduced the list very considerably. The distribution had been practically abused. From time to time application had been made by libraries and other public bodies for copies of the Bills and of the addresses that were moved for and brought down, and the Printing Committee, last session I think it was, felt that the list had to be reduced, and probably in the reduction they cut off the judges. But it is a matter entirely in their discretion. The government do not control it.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—I might point out to my hon. friend that there would be a great difficulty in the way. It is quite easy to send the judges the Bills that come before parliament, but to select a lot of Bills, who is to decide whether a Bill is a public or private one? I think the hon. Secretary of State is quite right when he says the list is constantly swelling and the Joint Committee on printing feel that they must cut it down. It is possible some one has been cut off, but that can be remedied if an application is made.

Hon. Mr. KERR—It appears to me from what has fallen, it is desirable we should express some opinion on this subject, whether it is to be a formal motion or an expression of opinion. The hon. mover of the resolution might withdraw it or not, having obtained that expression of opinion, I think it is desirable that the Senate should, in view of what is talked of as to economy and cutting down the list, express some opinion on the subject, that those who probably should be informed of what legislation will come before them, should have the Bill sent to them. There are no public officers who have a better opportunity of valuing proposed legislation in relation to existing laws than the judges of the land, and it is extremely important they should have the proposed legislation before them. If that is the generally accepted view of the Senate, then the Printing Committee should be informed of it. I do not see any objection to passing the resolution; but if there is a general view expressed in the Senate by hon. members that it is desirable, the Printing Committee would act on that expression of opinion, whether it is in the form of a motion or not.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—Does the mover of the resolution intend to submit these proposed measures to the judges with the object of having them decide whether this parliament has jurisdiction, or whether the jurisdiction rests with the Ontario government? We have a dispute here almost every day whether a Bill before parliament really comes within the jurisdiction of the Dominion, or whether there are provincial rights involved, and the question could be submitted to the Supreme Court judges for a decision in such a case. Why not? We could also ask their opinion whether parliament had jurisdiction in regard to the measures that were coming up.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I entirely agree with the hon. member as to the propriety of having public Bills sent to the Superior Court judges, but I agree also with the suggestion made by the hon. gentleman from Marshfield, that it should not be done by motion, that it should be done by an expression of this honourable House to the proper authorities to see that it is done. The judges are entrusted with the carrying out of the law, and they should have an opportunity afforded them of ascertaining the changes that are proposed in the law. It is important, therefore, that they be made aware of the public Bills from the time they are introduced, in order that they may be acquainted with the history, so to speak, of the legislation at each stage as the measures progress. I would suggest that the hon. gentleman withdraw his motion, and be satisfied with the expression of opinion by this House.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière)—I will not withdraw it. The Senate may defeat it if they think proper.

The motion was agreed to.

INVESTIGATION OF ACCIDENT AND GUARANTEE COMPANIES IN CANADA.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY inquired of the government :

If they intend to order an investigation of the Accident, Sickness and Guarantee Companies doing business in Canada.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is not the present intention of the government to make any investigation or inquiry into those companies.

VALUE OF NORTHWEST LANDS.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS moved :

That a select committee composed of the Honourable Messrs. Talbot, Lougheed, Douglas, DeVeber, Landry, Tessier, Wilson, McMullen, Young, Ferguson, Ross (Moosejaw), McGregor, Power, Robertson, Watson, Bernier, Kirchhoffer, Ellis, Thompson, Perley, Riley, Bostock, Domville, and the mover, be appointed to inquire and report from time to time as to the value of that part of the Dominion lying north of the Saskatchewan watershed, east of the Rocky mountains and west of the Hudson's bay ; comprising the north parts of the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan and the Mackenzie territory, its extent of navigable waters, rivers, lakes and sea coast.

He said : I might say in connection with this matter, that I made the same motion in the latter part of last session. At that time the hon. leader of the House thought it was rather late in the session to take up an investigation of this kind, and that we might not be able to make any progress with it before prorogation. But he promised me if I left it over until this session, that he would be able to consider it favourably and that the motion would go through. I want to say in connection with this matter that I consider it one of the most important subjects that we can bring before this House. We know all about the wheat lands of the provinces of Manitoba, Alberta and Saskatchewan, but we know very little, I am sorry to say, about what we have in the country lying to the north of the Saskatchewan river. I have lived in that country some 27 years, and while I have travelled over a good deal of it, I am getting new information every day as to the resources of the northern country. It is like the case of the farmer who has lived on a farm for a number of years, and does not know what is on the back end of his lot. That is about the position the people are in with reference to the hinterlands in those two provinces. We are on the front of the lot and we know what we have on the front, but as a matter of fact we know very little about what we have on the rear end of the lot. A few years ago, a committee was appointed by this House for the purpose of making an investigation similar to the one which I have in view at the present time. That was known as the Schultz committee. I have gone very carefully over the reports of that committee, and I find there was a lot of very valuable information collected at that time.

I might say also, that I know when the report was issued it did a lot of good in this country. I was informed not later than yesterday by a member of the House of Commons that his first interest in the Northwest Territories was awakened by reading the committee's report of the investigation into the resources of that country. But at the time that committee conducted its investigation the northern regions of the Northwest Territories were practically unknown. What is known now as the Saskatchewan River Valley is traversed by the Canadian Northern Railway, and will be traversed by the Grand Trunk Pacific and also branch lines of the Canadian Pacific Railway in the near future, and perhaps by the Great Northern; but at the time the committee took evidence, the Saskatchewan Valley was practically unknown. I was living there at the time, and the people thought the land would produce nothing ; you could not get any one to invest a dollar there. Since then the country has been opened up and developed, and its productiveness is recognized. It is admitted to be one of the best portions of the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta. Now we want to take a step further on and find out what we have in the northern part of that territory. At the time the Schultz committee was making an investigation, they got a great deal of valuable information, but we are in a position to-day to elicit much more valuable information about the resources of that country which were unknown at the time the committee sat, because the opening up of the Yukon had the effect of leading a lot of adventurous spirits into that north land who went cruising about that country trying to find a route overland from Edmonton into the Yukon. Some of these men never reached the Yukon, and have lived for 5 or 6 years in that northern section. They discovered wonderful resources in that northern territory, as I know from information I have received from them and from others. What we want for the development of that country is capital. We may have coal, gold, silver, and unlimited resources of that kind, but unless you have capital to develop it, the natural wealth of the country will be of no use. My object is to try and publish to the world, as far as we can do so, information about our resources in minerals, timber and everything else in that northern country. There are large tracts of timber in that region, not only for the production of lumber but for pulp wood, which is getting to be a scarce commodity in the United States and in the eastern parts of our own country. If it becomes known that we have forests of pulp timber there, the eyes of the investing public will be turned in that direction. We have the timber and we have the water-powers to manufacture it into pulp. From information furnished me, we have any amount of sulphur in that region to furnish a necessary article in the manufacture of pulp. All these facts will come out if we have an investigation. It may be urged that such an investigation will cost a great deal, but it will not. The officials of the geological survey possess very valuable knowledge about that country. I have read their reports carefully, but the information of value is covered up with a lot of other matters more of interest to scientists than to commerce.

In other words there is a grain of wheat in a bushel of chaff and the average man does not read the reports. If we can get men like the gentlemen who appear before the Agricultural Committee of the House of Commons to come and say what they know of the resources of that country, the cost will be confined to the reporting and publishing. We can also get the evidence of gentlemen who are here or will be here during the course of the session. We will get the information boiled down into a pamphlet of say two hundred pages. These gentlemen who have been in the northern country, have any number of photographic views which they can furnish, and which I should like to have published in the report and have circulated. The cost, I am sure, would be a bagatelle compared with the results which may be expected from the circulation of the report. It will give the population of other nations information as to what we have in the hinterland of those two provinces, and the Mackenzie Territory. It may be urged against this resolution, that it might not have the desired effect; that perhaps it would be better for the government to appoint an exploring party or two parties to go out and investigate the resources of that country. As I said last year, that is a step in the right direction.

The Ontario government, I understand, at one time pursued a similar course, with the result that they discovered great wealth in northern Ontario. What is the small amount it cost the Ontario government to make that investigation compared with the opening up of the Cobalt region in which there are companies operating to-day that have been capitalized at about a billion dollars. The resources are there to pay for the outlay. The proper course to pursue later on, I should say, would be to send out two parties, because the country is too large for one party —with a practical man at the head of each, a well known man who, when he makes an investigation and signs a report, will command the confidence of the public; but the investigation by this committee would not interfere in any way with such an exploration. We can get, by means of this committee, valuable information at very little cost concerning that northern country.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière)—I would ask the hon. gentleman from Saskatchewan, if he has no objection, to enlarge the scope of his investigation. He wants to inquire about the country lying between the western shore of Hudson bay and as far west as the Rocky mountains. But what about the east side of Hudson bay? The Dominion government has a large tract of land known by the name of the Ungava District, north of the province of Quebec, of which much less is known than of the territory north of the Saskatchewan. There are mountains of information about the territory west of Hudson bay, but little is known of the territory east of Hudson bay. Last session we had some discussion in this House, and the hon. member from Belleville denied that there was any timber belt in Ungava. Only a few days ago, in conversation with Lord Strathcona who spent a part of his life in Ungava—30 years, I understand—he stated to me that there were very valuable areas of timber in that region, some of it being cut by United States concerns. I believe an investigation should be made on both sides of the Hudson bay, and if there are any other parts of the Dominion which require exploration I shall be glad to see them included also.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is no doubt desirable that we should get as much information as we reasonably can about the outlying portions of the Dominion. I do not feel, as the hon. gentleman does, that it is very urgent, because we have room enough at present to work in. The region which has been explored is quite ample for gentlemen to display their industry and enterprise in; still I agree with him that it is desirable that the government should obtain information with respect to the regions lying outside of those which have been surveyed and organized. I think the hon. gentleman intimated in his closing observations that there is a better way of getting the information than by means of a committee of this House. The better way is not to have every Tom, Dick and Harry who happens to have heard or to know something about the country come and testify and let his evidence go to the public, but that gentlemen who are qualified to speak with authority shall give evidence which can be circulated. As a matter of fact, we have had two or three committees of this character in the Senate in the past. We have had the committee to which the hon. gentleman has referred that is the committee to inquire into the resources of the great Mackenzie river basin. We had some years later a committee which was moved for and obtained by our late lamented colleague, Colonel Boulton, and one or two other committees; but I wish to speak of those two committees I have mentioned in a special manner. The Mackenzie River Basin Committee held a great many sittings, and there was a good deal of evidence or so called evidence published. That committee cost about $12,000 and absorbed the time of a great many members of the Senate during the greater portion of a session, and the hon. gentleman from Saskatchewan has stated that he met some one in the west whose interest in that part of the country had arisen from reading the report of that committee. I think it is the first time I have heard of any good that the report of that committee did; and probably that gentleman would have become interested in the western country even though he had never seen that report. Then Colonel Boulton's committee was selected for the purpose of finding the most advantageous route to the Yukon. That committee held several meetings, and reported in favour of what has since been recognized as the worst possible route. Some unfortunates, who, perhaps, were influenced by the report of the committee, adopted that route. Some of them succeeded in getting through to the Pacific coast alive, but others perished on the way. A parliamentary committee—at least a committee of this House—is about the most expensive and least satisfactory means of getting information. The proper thing is that the government shall send officers into those regions, officers who have special qualifications, and publish their reports. The hon. gentleman spoke of the reports of those officers as containing one grain of wheat in a bushel of chaff. That comparison would be much more properly used in the case of the report of the Mackenzie River Basin Committee. As to the route of the Transcontinental Railway in the hinterland of the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, most valuable information has been given to the public, the result of the surveys made there by Dr. Ami and others, and at the present time, I understand, that the Department of the Interior is about giving to the public the report of Dr. Ami and other explorers in the Peace River country. The Peace River country had already been explored to some extent. A careful examination of that country was made by the Department of the Interior; and the Minister, I understand, proposes to submit the information acquired in that way to the public within a few weeks. Peace River country is one of the most important districts that would be affected by the motion of the hon. gentleman. The better way would be for this House to express a desire that the Department of the Interior should cause explorations of a similar character to be made of the northern portion of Saskatchewan and also of the district of Keewatin and of the district of Ungava. I do not know any reason why the district of Keewatin, which adjoins the province of Manitoba, and which in all probability contains a great deal of mineral wealth, should not be included in the investigation. I do not see why information should not be gathered in respect to that district as well as to the northern portions of Alberta and Saskatchewan. I move an amendment to the motion of the hon. gentleman.

That all the words in the motion after 'that' to the end of the question be stricken out, and the following words substituted therefor :—

In the opinion of the Senate, it is desirable that the government shall at the earliest practical date take steps to secure reliable and accurate information as to those portions of the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan and the districts of Keewatin and Ungava as to which such information is not now in their possession.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In the latter part of last session the hon. Senator from Prince Albert brought this proposition before the Senate. I reasoned with him and said that as the end of the session was approaching, it was a very undesirable time, that no progress could be made, but in the interval between last session and this session he might correspond with gentlemen who might be able to give him information. I then brought the matter before the government, and was authorized to acquiesce in the proposition made by the hon. gentleman, provided the expense should not exceed a specific sum. In discussing the financial part of it with the hon. senator, he stated to me that the witnesses he would call were available, not any of them being further away than Winnipeg, and several would be very much nearer Ottawa. I see no reasonable objection to the appointment of the committee. Information of that kind is always valuable. Greater publicity can be given to the advantages and resources of the northern portions of the region to which he refers, and should be of the highest importance. The hon. senator stipulated and I thought it was exceedingly reasonable—that the whole cost was not to exceed $1,000.

Hon. Mr. POWER—How many witnesses could he get for $1,000 ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not think it is quite fair for my hon. friend to be so critical. The explanation given by the hon. gentleman from Prince Albert was, I thought, reasonable. He named a number of gentlemen whose evidence would be exceedingly valuable. I do not hesitate to say such evidence would be exceedingly useful if distributed. It is rather unusual, when a senator has received the approval, as I understood he did at the time, of a very considerable number of gentlemen here, and the subject was thought to be of sufficient importance to obtain the approval of the government, to oppose the appointment of a committee.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I did not understand the hon. gentleman from Saskatchewan to say that he was moving with the concurrence of the government.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Over and over again, I have stated it in this House.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman may have said so in private conversation.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I stated openly last session, before the end of the session, that if the hon. gentleman would let the committee drop then, I would not object to the formation of a committee at the coming session.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—With the explanation made by the mover of this resolution, there should not be any objection to granting a committee. He has suggested that a great deal of information can be secured of a different character from the information now before the public with regard to that portion of the territory north of the Saskatchewan. The motion is for the purpose of compiling and editing a pamphlet on that particular section of the Dominion. That being the case, there surely cannot be any objection to the committee. I should like to vote for the motion of the hon. senator from Halifax as well. I trust the government will do exactly as has been suggested in the amendment, but at the same time I do not think that the amendment is appropriate to the motion of my hon. friend from Saskatchewan. I fully agree with the hon. member from Halifax on the character of the evidence elicited by the Schultz committee. It may contain some valuable information, but I do not think the results of that committee would warrant the appointment of such another committee. Many of those who were examined before that committee had been Hudson Bay officials and natives of the country, and I would rather take the opinion given by an expert civil engineer or land surveyor who had been in that country than all the evidence that could be secured from natives and men living there for a number of years, because a great many of them had been educated to believe that the northern part of Canada is only fit for a fur reserve. I had some experience of one of those committees 23 years ago, when a committee was appointed for the purpose of securing information with regard to the navigation of Hudson bay. That committee cost a large amount of money. A great many people were brought here, who gave their evidence, and I venture to say that, so far as the navigation of Hudson bay is concerned, the information placed before the country through that committee was of very little service indeed. Since then, the government have sent vessels there and made a practical investigation as to the navigation of the bay. The hon. gentleman from Saskatchewan, with the members he has selected, might be able to go through the Geological Survey reports and information received from surveyors and forest rangers and compile a pamphlet which would certainly give the public reliable and condensed information with regard to the country north of the Saskatchewan, and I am in favour of the committee being granted. I would not approve of it, if it was intended to take the range that was taken by the Schultz committee, but with the explanations given by the mover, I am certainly in favour of it, and I trust that the government will take cognizance of the amendment moved by the hon. senator from Halifax and try to get all the information they can from the officials connected with the Interior Department, and publish it to the country as soon as possible.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Of one thing there can be no doubt, and that is that we are hardly acquainted in the slightest degree with the enormous resources of the unexplored regions of this Dominion. We have barely scratched the surface, and yet we have found such places as the well known Cobalt camp, the Klondike, and other sections where there are enormous resources of which we never dreamed. Therefore for my part I am very much disposed to concur with my hon. friend who has just addressed the House, in thinking that the Department of the Interior may very well profit by the suggestions that have been thrown out by himself and others, and cause investigations to be made throughout this vast region; but I also think that in view of what has been stated, it would be hardly fair to turn down my hon. friend who moved this motion and who certainly did withdraw it last session at the instigation of the leader of the House. I presume that the object of the hon. senator from Halifax is chiefly to call the attention of the Department of the Interior to the desirability of making an investigation at the earliest convenient moment of these regions, a most laudable and desirable object, and one which I can assure him I will not fail at the earliest moment to bring to the attention of my esteemed colleague, the Minister of the Interior.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—In seconding the amendment of the hon. member from Halifax I was not aware that the government had committed itself to an investigation of this kind, for I must say that it is by far the most expensive and unsatisfactory means of getting information that I know of. You will have to send long distances and pay enormous expenses to bring people here to examine them, and you will have to keep them while here giving the information that they only possess. It seems to me that if it is only for the purpose of getting at and condensing the voluminous information that is already in the Department of the Interior, an order of the House would secure that result, if the department was requested to condense the information of the various regions of the Dominion of Canada as well as the part of Canada which my hon. friend from Prince Albert is so much interested in. I do not blame him for looking after his own part of the country, but the hinterland of Quebec has been mentioned, as well as the hinterland of Ontario and Ungava, which is unexplored, and those provinces are worthy of discussion at the hands of the Dominion government, and deserve more consideration in the future than they have had in the past. My own impression is that if proper officers were sent out with guides, who have the exploring instinct and know the country well, that better results would follow. I am informed by gentleman who have resided long years in that northern part of the great west, that if you were to ask a half-breed about the size of a lake he would say 'Yes; big lake.' If you ask him the same question with regard to timber, he would say : 'Yes, big timber,' and it might not be any bigger than a few inches. His idea of size is altogether at variance with our ideas. Such information as that is not worth being paid for, but if reputable and responsible officers of the government were to be sent out for the purpose of collecting information, I think the object my hon. friend has in view could be attained. In addition to that, I think we could get information of the other sections of the country which we as members of the Senate and citizens of this Dominion are all mutually interested in. Quebec has a large hinterland, and so has the province from which I come. Besides that, British Columbia has resources that very few men who have lived in that province know anything about ; and if a precedent is established and one committee is appointed, and information sought with respect to a particular part of the country, there is no reason why the members from the other provinces should not have a committee granted to them and the same privileges accorded to them. I have no objection to the hon. gentleman's motion, but I was rather astonished when it was placed on the order paper. On the 27th of November it appeared for the first time on our record, and it had been moved for the day before, and now at this late hour, when we are all in hopes that the session will close by the end of April, very little can be done, and I am sure if it is only to cost a thousand dollars, the information we will receive for the thousand dollars will be very meagre indeed. Then again, if it is to sift the grain from the chaff, and the committee are to deal with that question, they could condense the report, but a clerk in the department or a surveyor could condense the various reports the government have in their possession now. I will admit that many of the reports are voluminous, but they are very necessary. If it is only a pamphlet of condensed information that is desired for the purpose of advising the people of the old land and the conditions of that vast territory where my hon. friend comes from, I think that comes well within the Department of the Interior, who have done much in bringing to the notice, not only of the Dominion of Canada, but of the whole world the resources of our great inheritance. I think that the money could be better spent by the government themselves. I am opposed to people being brought down here promiscuously, perhaps—well I would not like to say—to have a good time, I should like, however in the representation on the committee that more consideration should have been given to some of the other members from the west. I notice that when our Striking Committee reported, complaint was made as to how one-sided the committees were. Well, if my hon. friend, on the present occasion, is giving evidence of what he would do on the Striking Committee, we can foresee the result. He only asks for twelve from the west, and he has let out Hon. Senators Roy and Perley. He should have taken them all in. He has two from New Brunswick, two from Quebec, two from Prince Edward Island, and two from Ontario, two from Nova Scotia, two from Manitoba, two from British Columbia, three from Saskatchewan, and three from Alberta. I have no objection to the personnel of the committee. They are all able and eminent men, quite qualified to obtain the information sought for, but it seems to me that there are officers in the employ of the government to-day in the Department of the Interior, and perhaps in other departments, for instance in the Geological Department, who could give us more information upon examination in the course of a day or two, than we could secure by bringing fifty men from the west ; and the information which they have to give is what they have gathered from experience and from personal knowledge of the country. I am not going to stand out against the action of the government. If they have committed themselves to the expenditure of a thousand dollars, we will get a report which will be worth a thousand dollars. I think perhaps the sum is too small, and if the committee is to be of any service, and the information to be of any value to the country, it should not be confined to a thousand dollars. If it is to cost any more, I think the most economical method of obtaining information which we all so much desire, would be the appointment by the government of officers for that purpose.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Middlesex)—If I may be permitted at this early stage of my career in this House, to intrude for a few moments, I should like to make some observations with reference to the proposal of the hon. senator from Prince Albert. I think we are indebeted to the hon. gentleman for having brought this matter before us, because it is of the utmost importance that we should acquaint ourselves, as has already been stated, with the resources of our Dominion, and we should do that at the earliest possible moment. Some years ago, I think in 1900, the government of Ontario felt that our knowledge in regard to the hinterland of Ontario was insufficient, and we accordingly appointed, not a commission, but an exploring party, consisting of about ninety persons, divided into companies or battalions of nine or ten each. Each company consisted of a geologist, a skilled surveyor, an agriculturist, and a forester and the hinterland of Ontario was subidvided by the chief officer of the Crown Lands Department amongst these different exploring parties. They started out early in the season and remained as long in the autumn as circumstances and the weather would permit, and made a report as to the resources of our own province. That report was a surprise to all of us. Ontario has been settled nearly a hundred years, and we had no idea of the value that the northern district was to us in its reserves, either in timber, land or minerals. The explorers reported, to our great surprise, an agricultural belt commonly called the clay belt, three hundred miles long and about 150 miles wide, said to contain at least 16,000,000 acres of excellent agricultural land. When the report was laid before us, the duty then was pressed upon the government of doing something to open up that district. As a result, we projected what is called the Temiscaming and Northern Ontario Railroad, a railway which I am happy to know, will connect Ontario with the Grand Trunk Pacific road, and which will cost the province probably between eleven and twelve million dollars before it is completed. This exploring party cost the province about seventy-five thousand dollars. The treasury of Ontario has received as the result of these explorations already about a million and a half of money, so that the result so far as Ontario was concerned was an admirable one, and I hope that millions more than the sum already received will yet pour into the treasury of the province. I am told that a company has already offered the province from fifteen to twenty million dollars for a portion of the country which was opened up as a result of that exploration. In every respect the efforts that were made to open up New Ontario have been very satisfactory, and have given to the people of Ontario a much larger view of the wealth of the province and its future possibilities than they had ever entertained before. With regard to the motion of my hon. friend from Prince Albert, I entirely sympathize with it. I do not know that the committee should be allowed to incur a very large expenditure. Its work might be tentative. I remember very well the committee of which the Hon. Mr. Schultz was chairman, and I do think, although it may not have realized the expectation of the promoter, that the report of that committee has been exceedingly useful. We had in the Peace River district made known to us by Mr. Schultz a wealth of timber and farm lands and other resources up to that time entirely unsuspected. If I may be permitted to suggest to my hon. friend from Prince Albert, I would say that while the committee might be allowed to proceed to work at once, it should not be allowed to incur very heavy expense; that its work should be rather to prepare the way for that government commission suggested by my hon. friend from Halifax. The two things should go together; perhaps the committee first to prepare information for exploration, and the exploration afterwards as being the only conclusive and satisfactory information which this House would like to have in regard to the resources of that country. Experts travelling over the land, geologists and botanists, foresters, and surveyors should be members of that committee or of those exploring parties, and should bring to us information on which we could rely. Being on the spot in the different portions of the country as they travelled to and fro, they could take the evidence of old settlers. They could bring information before the country at much less expense than could be done by bringing witnesses here, and, it would be just as conclusive as if taken before our committee. The committee might be the means of examining such witnesses as are at hand, and in that way open the door for the examinations which the explorers might make at a later date, but I think the government having, through the Secretary of State, indicated its intention, or practically its intention, to make these explorations, should take the impression from this House that we think it is very desirable that these explorations should be made. The National Transcontinental Railway is the only railway the western districts needs at this moment. When we reach Edmonton or the foot hills of the Rockies, there is no reason why a railway should not be projected up the Peace river valley. How far it should go is a matter for future consideration, but it is hard to tell how far Anglo-Saxon enterprise might desire to extend, if the resources would warrant such extension, and it should be our duty to see that the remotest part of this country is explored in order that capitalists from abroad and settlers and emigrants from the old land might have a variety of choice, as to where they should go, and thus give us the benefit of their enterprise and capital. As to the other branches of the question, I am not sufficiently informed to express an opinion. We do not know what the resources of Ungava are, but we ought to find out as soon as possible. It may be that the geological formation there would indicate a wealth of silver or of gold equal to Cobalt, or perhaps equal to the gold fields of the west and of California. We know that on the east side of Hudson bay the mineral indications are not very inviting, but we only know it in a general way. In fact we were told—you will find it in the earliest geological reports of Logan and Bell—that it was not believed there was mineral of any value in the hinterlands of Ontario. We find now gold deposits in the neighbourhood of Kenora, and Lake Manitou that exceed all expectations. In fact we were told by early geologists that it would be useless for us to explore for gold, and that no gold would be found, and after the Cobalt district had been tramped over by lumbermen and others for years, it was only through the construction of the Temiskaming and Ontario Northern Railway that the minerals were discovered and the enormous wealth of the country disclosed to us. So let us make the further investigation. I have a suspicion that it is possible there may be coal deposits at the back of the height of land on the Moose river in the Hudson bay district. Geologists have found lignite deposits, and if the explorations of this party should go so far as to make inquiries into the unexplored areas of the different provinces well and good, but let us by all means—I am speaking here for the Dominion—explore the districts beyond the boundary of these various provinces and turn what is a matter of doubt into a matter of greater certainty than any information we have just now could warrant us in believing. If it could be possible for the Senate, in view of the amendment moved by the hon. gentleman from Halifax, to entertain the committee I should be pleased. If by adopting the appointment of a committee we would relieve the government of any exploration, then I would prefer having the reports of experts. If we could have both, so much the better, the one preliminary to the other, but let it not be understood, so far as I am concerned, that if we grant this committee, that the government will be in the slightest degree relieved from the duty of making a report by skilled experts and geologists of the highest standing, foresters, botanists, surveyors and others, on whose evidence we can rely and who bring to the duties to which they are assigned that experience which is conclusive in a matter of so much importance.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I agree with the hon. gentleman from Halifax in the somewhat uncomplimentary remarks he made about the results of the committee that was selected by this House in, I think, the year 1898 with regard to obtaining information about a route from Edmonton to the Yukon. That investigation was instituted on an impulse, and without any very regular plan, and I frankly admit that the result of that investigation was not very satisfactory, but I do not at all agree with my hon. friend in the remarks he has made with reference to the report of the Schultz committee of this House in 1888. I had not the pleasure of knowing the late Senator Schultz, but I have always regarded the work of the committee as a monument to his industry and to his skill, and I look upon that blue-book as one of the most important I can lay my hands on in regard to the resources of our northern country. I have to refer to it occasionally, and I find it a perfect mass of information, and when the hon. gentleman from Middlesex gave us this history of the discovery of this clay belt in the northern part of Ontario and gave the credit of that discovery to the band of surveyors that were sent out by the Ontario government, I was struck by the fact that in a map, attached to the report of the Schultz committee in 1888, you will find this clay belt perfectly indicated. The information was issued through Dr. Bell, of the Geological Survey, and the map in which this identical clay belt was very clearly indicated by the colouring will be found in that report. In other respects I have found information contained in that report, as I have already said to be highly valuable. My hon. friend from Halifax indicated that we could get all the information through the reports of the geological and other surveys and experts sent out by the government. I have had a good deal of experience in trying to elicit information for myself through reports of geologists and in ways of that kind, and I must say that there is often very little in these reports in the way of information as to the real value of the country. I have wandered over pages when I would find a river or lake referred to, and I would puzzle my head to ascertain what river or lake they were talking about. The name had perhaps been mentioned two or three pages previously, and in broken paragraphs you would find a river referred to, and you would have to dig and delve in order to obtain its name and location. When you get the experts before the committee, and they are kept to the point, and make their answers, it is easy to obtain the information in such a way that it will be of value to those who are seeking for it. I therefore favour the appointment of this committee. I expressed myself so last year, and I am still of the same opinion. But I agree with my hon. friend the Secretary of State, that some limit should be placed on the expenditure. There is no necessity for bringing every body that you can think of whose name and address you can obtain in that northern country. We can bring experts residing here who have traversed these regions and get the information in that way and have it recorded and put in the form that will be of easy reference, and members of this House and of the House of Commons, and all others who are seeking for information in regard to that country will know in the future where to get it in a condensed form and in a manner that will be useful to them and to the people that they represent. Agreeing with my hon. friend the Secretary of State that a limit should be placed on the expenditure, I might suggest to him that I really think a thousand dollars is too small an estimate, I know, from a little experience, that it will not take very long to expend a thousand dollars in typewriting and stenographers and printing and it might happen that absolutely nothing would be left to defray the expense of bringing witnesses. If we grant a committee at all, while agreeing with the hon. Secretary of State that the expenditure should not be unlimited or that it should be large, I think it would be a pity that it should be limited to so small an amount as a thousand dollars.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—For my part I felt some hesitation, but after the explanations which have been given, and the assurance that the expenditure would not be excessive, I was glad to see that the government favoured the appointment of this commission, and I am satisfied that if it works on the line suggested by the hon. gentleman from Middlesex, it will render valuable service to the Dominion. I would ask the hon. gentleman from Prince Albert if he would not be disposed to accept the suggestion of the hon. gentleman from De Lanaudière by adding after the word 'west' the word 'east' and at the end of his motion add the following words, 'and Ungava territory?'

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Yes, I might say to my hon. friends that I should be very happy to add that to the motion.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—And Keewatin also?

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I presume the government will allow a thousand dollars extra for these additions ?

Hon. Mr. DOUGLAS—I should like to add a few words to what is being said, and express my hearty support to some effort being made, and that immediately, to get increased information for the benefit of the public. It was my lot last summer to meet a gentleman from the United States, a man of education and a member of the National Geographical Society, who had gone west at the close of his college session to explore something of our land in the Mackenzie River basin, and who had abandoned the enterprise for the reason that he found that to go down the Mackenzie river was going to take him over five months; that the expenses of his tour were more than he had provided for before leaving home, and he was returning to make further provision for the exploration. In listening to many of the hon. gentlemen who have taken part in this discussion, it seems to me that we take altogether too narrow and small a view of this whole question. This member of the National Geographical Society stated to me: 'The Canadian people have in that northern land a veritable empire of which little or nothing is known.' If we are to know our own boundaries, and if we are to furnish reliable information to men of education in Europe; if we are to induce people to throw in their lot with the Dominion of Canada, we must be able to present information that is reliable and which will appeal to the intelligence of these people. I wish to emphasize the point that the expenditure of a thousand dollars in this connection is altogether too small, and I believe that the government of Canada in undertaking an enterprise of this kind are not only willing—I believe they are willing or would be willing—to send experts to obtain such information as we have indicated, but that for these purposes they would be willing to spend a very considerable sum. I would not, therefore, in connection with this resolution, or the appointment of this committee, limit the sum to one thousand dollars, of even ten or twenty thousand dollars, but leave it to the government to determine. I think we cannot emphasize the importance of proceeding at an early date to obtain every possible informatilon to set before the public, not only to encourage immigration, but to induce capital to come to this country. Men of capital will not consider the question until the government of Canada is prepared to lay before them reliable information that would lead them to act. I hope this honourable House will take a broader view of things and will look upon its importance. We are only living on the fringe of our great heritage. We have only settled on the banks of the streams and the lakes of our beloved Canada. We know comparatively nothing of the great land that has been given to us, and I sincerely hope that we will be able to furnish such information as men of capital and men of intelligence are desiring, that they may consider the question of investing capital in developing the country.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—I desire to say just two words on the subject. I think this is the most admirable debate that has taken place before the Senate in my day. It will show the public at large that the members of the Senate are not merely lookers on, but are really taking into consideration the vast resources of Canada. I quite agree with the remarks of the hon. gentleman from Middlesex. I hope the hon. leader of this House will permit the committee to proceed with the investigation, and, as my hon. friend from Middlesex predicts, it will perhaps be productive of considerable good, and at any rate it cannot do very much harm.

Hon. Mr. POWER—After the statement made by the two members of the government, I could not very well persist in the amendment I have moved, and with the consent of the seconder and permission of the House I ask leave to withdraw it.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—I entirely endorse the appointment of this committee. I do not rise for the purpose of discussing it, but to relate a little incident that came to my knowledge during last summer. We are entirely ignorant of the wealth of our own country, and I think we are negligent in not finding out the extent of the wealth of our northern country. Last summer a friend of mine, who lives in Boston, took a trip up the Labrador coast to the mouth of the Hudson strait, and while he was up there an American mineral expert came down from the centre of Ungava. He had been two hundred miles into the centre of Ungava, and he reached the coast with several barrels of specimens of minerals. He had those barrels very closely fastened up, and my American friend could not get any information whatever about their contents from him. He would say nothing about it. All he could find out was that he had been sent there by a company, or companies, in the United States to investigate this region, to find out what it was and the minerals it contained, and he was returning to them with his barrels of specimens. We did not know there were minerals in Ungava, but here were foreign companies sending an expert into the centre of that country to find out what was there, and probably the result of his investigation would be that companies would be formed in the United States to take up our mineral lands.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I suppose it cost more than $1,000.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—It very likely did.

The amendment was withdrawn.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—The information which we will get through the work of this committee will surprise perhaps some hon. gentlemen who are opposed to it now. I am quite aware that the report of the Schultz committee was not received favourably, but I want to say in regard to that committee, that while there was a large amount of money wasted, it did an enormous amount of good. One of my hon. friends to-day said that I had met only one gentleman who had been persuaded from the reading of that report, to go west. I might tell him I have met dozens, but I alluded to one gentleman who is now a member of the House of Commons. The report of the Schultz committee did a great deal of good. But I want this committee to run on different lines. We have now sources of information that they did not know of at the time of the Schultz committee. There are gentleman to-day visiting the city of Ottawa who possess a wonderful amount of knowledge of that country which they are willing to give us and which will cost nothing. As to whether $1,000 will be adequate to publish the report and the views accompanying it, I am not prepared to say. I propose to bring only one witness from the city of Winnipeg; that is the only evidence that will cost anything. Objection is taken to the evidence which can be furnished by the officers of the department, because we are told we can get that information from the reports of the Geological Survey. I am afraid we conld not get it that way. We can get it better by bringing the witnesses before the committee. It is well known that a member of the Geological Survey gave evidence before the Agricultural Committee of the House of Commons. I was there and took part in the investigation. To use a common expression, he gave a black eye to the Peace river country. We asked at that time that the Department of the Interior should send a party to explore that region, and see which of the conflicting reports made by the Macoun family was right. Nothing has been done on that recommendation up to the present time. I quite agree with the hon. member from Halifax, and the Hon. Mr. Ross, that the proper means of getting all the information we want is to send properly equipped parties to explore the country, but in order to get that started you must have a reason for doing so. This committee will cost a small amount of money, and it will show the necessity of taking the step which the hon. member from Middlesex, the Hon. Mr. Ross suggests. The committee will be in a position to show the country and the government the necessity of making explorations. Some people think we have large ideas in the west. One hon. gentleman, who sits opposite me, alluded to the fact that the Indians of our country have very vivid imaginations. I do not want him to look upon me as one of the aborigines, but I want to tell my hon. friend that the Indians in our country, as well as the white people, have very large ideas. They are progressive, and it would be all right if the hon. gentlemen would take a leaf out of their book. I am very glad the committee is to be appointed. I think you will find before we are through, it will justify the time and money expended upon it. I should like to add the name of the Hon. Geo. W. Ross to the committee.

The motion was so amended and adopted.

THE ROCKY MOUNTAIN SECTION OF THE GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC.

A QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Before the Orders of the Day are reached I wish to call the attention of the House to a question of privilege. It is with reference to the summary report of my remarks yesterday in this House regarding the location of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway. I do not do this for the purpose of impeaching either the ability or the impartiality of our press reporter. I feel bound to say from the experience I have had that our summary reports to the newspapers by the gentleman who now performs that service are better than they ever were before in my experience. At the same time it does not follow that he will not sometimes make a mistake. I am reading now from the newspaper report, and this is exactly as it appears in the summary prepared and filed in Mr. Souter's office. I am reported as saying with reference to the discrepancy between the length of the mountain section as described in the speeches in the House of Commons in 1904 of the members of the government, and the length indicated by my hon. friend the Secretary of State, that my statement was that the figures that had always been given by the government to parliament and to the country up to my hon. friend's remarks in this House had been 480 miles for the length of the mountain section, sometimes extending to 500 miles, while my hon. friend in his speech on the second reading of the Bill in this House gave the distance as 766 miles. Now, this is a part of the report of my remarks to which I object: 'Afterwards, when the contract was going through, provision was made for 766 miles of mountain section.'

Now, that is exactly the reverse of what I said. I did not say that provision was made for 766 miles. If that had been openly done it would have made the matter all right. The objection I took was to the course of the government in giving the shorter distance throughout, and then giving the longer distance just at the close of the discussion in this House, and, as the Secretary of State did, attributed the lengthening of the distance to some difficulty in getting round the Skeena river. My hon. friend is reported correctly as saying yesterday that the government had limited information at the time. We were told, however, they had 'mountains of information,' but my hon. friend says now they had no surveys of the Peace River pass. I will read what my hon. friend said in 1904 with regard to that. He said:

> Last year, from the examination I made then, I was under the impression that the Rocky Mountain section—I think I gave the figures to the House—was less than 500 miles; but the more recent surveys show that it is longer, because it is not a direct line, but is rather circuitous. If it is to go to Port Simpson, it must go by the Skeena river, a tortuous course to get through the mountains, that is, to get the best grades. The grade they hope to get is surprisingly low.

This does not agree with what my hon. friend said yesterday. He continues:

> I was quite astonished at the statements of the engineers; it was a grade that none of us could have anticipated. Of course it was known that through the Pine river or the Peace River Pass a feasible route for a railway could be got. Sir Sandford Fleming reported twenty-five years ago that it offered a cheaper and easier route than the one selected by the Canadian Pacific Railway; but as exploratory surveys have gone on it has been found that after they get through the pass a number of routes are available.

My hon. friend was surprised at the easy route, yet he tells us now that they did not have surveys or information. However, that was not my object in rising. I rose to point out the error in the press report, in which I am made to say that the contract was modified, or words to that effect, in this House, and that the change was made in the contract. No such change was made; the Peace River route was still adhered to. The only point was, my hon. friend had pointed out that it was somewhat longer than was indicated in the first place. I had doubts about it at the time. I did not see how 766 miles of mountain section could be found in the Peace River route. They did not find it there, but they have found it elsewhere.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (M) An Act to amend the Railway Act, 1903.—(Hon. Mr. Davis.)

TELEGRAPHIC COMMUNICATION WITH PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Before the Orders of the Day are called I wish to ask the hon. Secretary of State my daily question.

I hope this will be my last time of asking.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am happy to inform the hon. gentleman that the government have decided to erect a Marconi wireless station at Pictou.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—When will it be ready ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—At the earliest possible time. It does not take long to construct one. All despatch of course will be used.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (10) An Act respecting a patent of the George E. Smith Lumber Company.—(Hon. Mr. Mitchell.)

Bill (9) An Act respecting a patent of Edgar Webster Summers and Hadley Herbert Summers.—(Hon. Mr. Coffee.)

Bill (8) An Act respecting patents of William A. Damen.—(Hon. Mr. Lougheed.)

PETROLEUM BOUNTY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the second reading of Bill (G) An Act to amend the Petroleum Bounty Act, 1904. He said : The object of this Bill is to enable the government to see to it that those lessors of oil wells who have stipulated for rent in the shape of a certain percentage of oil produced by the wells, shall receive the bounty now granted to producers of oil. It was always the intention of the government that these people should so receive it, but under the construction of the Act, although the majority of the companies who deal with these lessors have adopted the equitable construction of granting to the various lessors the bounty in proportion to the oil which was reserved by them, certain others have, and I believe strictly, legally speaking they were entitled to, refuse to pay, have refused. Now this is a bounty of the state, and I propose in this Bill to amend the Act by enabling the government in the regulations which it passes for the distribution of the bounty, to give the farmers the bounty on that portion of the oil which they receive by way of rent. My hon. friends will see that no question will arise where a moneyed rent is reserved, but where a percentage of the oil has been reserved, there we think that the lessor is entitled in equity and justice to receive the bounty on his oil, that is to say on the percentages of the oil which he reserves by way of rent. The Bill will go into committee in a couple of days, and if any hon. gentlemen desire further explanations they can probably be given with more convenience in committee.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at Three p.m.

THE SENATE.

OTTAWA, Friday, January 25, 1907.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (N) An Act to amalgamate the Jordan Light, Heat, and Power Company, and the Ontario Development Company, Limited, into one corporation, under the name of the Jordan Erie Power Company.—(Hon. Mr. Gibson.)

ST. JOSEPH TRANSPORTATION COMPANY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. TESSIER, (in the absence of Hon. Mr. Choquette), moved the second reading of Bill (J) An Act to incorporate the St. Joseph Transportation Company.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—This Bill is not printed in French.

The SPEAKER—Does the hon. gentleman object to the second reading ?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—As we are far advanced in the session, we should proceed regularly. I will not object to this motion, but I give notice that in future I will object to measures being proceeded with if they are not printed in French. We should do away with that mode of proceeding.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (I) An Act to incorporate the Canadian Musical and Dramatic Association, Limited.—(Hon. Mr. Casgrain, de Lanaudière.)

Bill (K) An Act to incorporate the Stratford and St. Joseph Radial Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Choquette.)

Bill (L) An Act respecting the Trader's Fire Insurance Company.—(Hon. Mr. McSweeney.)

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, 29th January, at Eight o'clock in the evening.

THE SENATE.

OTTAWA, Tuesday, January 29, 1907.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Eight o'clock p.m.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

GUARANTEE POLICIES CARRIED BY THE DOMINION.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN inquired of the government :

What was the number of guarantee policies carried by the Dominion of Canada Guarantee and Accident Insurance Company, for the year ending December 31, 1906, what was the guaranteed, and what was the amount of premiums paid the said company during the year ending December 31, 1906, for officers in the employ of the government of Canada?

Also, what amount was paid the London Guarantee and Accident Company for guaranteeing of employees or officials of the Intercolonial Railway, what was the total amount guaranteed for, and what was the total amount of premiums paid for the year ending December 31, 1906 ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—On application to the Superintendent of Insurance, he sent me this answer : 'The report of the business done by the Dominion of Canada Guarantee and Accident Company for the year ending December 31, 1906, has not yet been received by the Insurance Department, and is not called for till the 1st March, 1907.' However, since that time I have received from two departments information on the subject. The first is from the Department of Customs, and reads as follows : 'The premiums paid through the Department of of Customs to the Dominion of Canada Guarantee and Accident Insurance Company, for the year 1906, in respect of customs officers guaranteed by the company, were $1,910.10—the amount of such guarantees at 31st December, 1906, being $549,000 in respect of 476 customs officers.'

In reply to the second question, the total amount guaranteed was $136,000 ; amount paid the London Guarantee Company, year ending 31st December, 1906, $320.27.

THE QUEBEC TERMINAL AND RAILWAY COMPANY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE inquired :

1. Who have been, and are at present, the shareholders of 'The Quebec Terminal and Railway Company,' incorporated by 1 Edward VII., chapter 81 ?
2. What is the capital subscribed and paid up by the said shareholders ?
3. What works have been carried out by the company up to this date, and what has been the cost of them ?
4. Who is at present the president of the company, and who are the directors of it ?
5. Has the charter of the company been sold or transferred, and if so, to what company ? When, and in virtue of what contract, or Act of parliament ? For what price, and in what manner has that price been paid ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The answer to the hon. gentleman's questions is as follows :

1. The Quebec Terminal and Railway Company incorporated by 1 Edward VII., chapter 81, has not been organized.
2. Answered by number one.
3. Answered by number one.
4. Answered by number one.
5. The charter of the company has never been sold nor transferred to any other company.

EXPERIMENTAL FARM, PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON moved :

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that His Excellency may cause to be laid on the table of this House copies of all reports received by the government or any member thereof, relating to the establishment of an experimental farm branch in Prince Edward Island, and any order in council made regarding the same ; also a statement showing what tract of land, if any, has been purchased for the purposes of the said farm, where it is located, the number of acres accrued, and the price paid for the same, and the name of the vendor.

The motion was agreed to.

THE INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY COLLISION AT HADLOW.

MOTION WITHDRAWN.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY moved :

That an order of this House do issue for the production of a copy of the inquiry held on the subject of a collision which happened at Hadlow, on the 13th October, 1906, on the line of the Intercolonial Railway, between two trains of the Intercolonial Railway, which collision caused the death of a fireman named Veuilleux, and also for a copy of a petition presented by the despatchers of the Intercolonial Railway to the authorities of that railway at, or a short time before or after the collision in question.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The answer sent me from the department reads as follows : The case has not yet been disposed of by the department, the claimants having stated that, unless favourable consideration is given, proceedings will be taken against the Crown. Under the circumstances it is not considered to be advisable to grant the return asked.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I suppose it is in the public interest ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Where matters are in course of settlement between the Crown and parties, it is not desirable that the public should be taken into the confidence of either party and the proceedings made public. It does not tend to hasten a settlement in a thing of that sort.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Could the hon. gentleman tell us if he expects a prompt settlement of the question, or will it take a year or two ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I know nothing whatever of the case or its merits. I am simply reading the reply furnished by the department.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I will try it again before the close of the session. I ask permission to withdraw the motion.

The motion was withdrawn.

THE LATE SENATOR DOBSON.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to draw attention to one of those melancholy events that have so frequently occurred in this Chamber. Since we parted on Friday last, the angel of death has summoned away one of our members in the person of the late Senator Dobson. Those who were present towards the end of last session, will remember that Senator Dobson showed signs of breaking up, so that death, a day or two ago, was not unexpected. Apart from that he had reached an age beyond which very few of us are permitted to live. The late Senator Dobson was a man of kind and gentle disposition, and while loyal and true to those with whom he was associated politically was always fair, open and candid in any discussion he had, either in committee or in this House where the great issues that divided the two political parties were brought up. He was a man who was very much beloved in his own home, and in the town of Lindsay where he was repeatedly elevated to positions of trust and honour by his fellow townsmen. His loss will be very deeply regretted by the members of his family, and I desire on behalf of the Senate to convey to them our sympathy and sorrow.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I feel sure that the Chamber will not only concur with, but deeply appreciate the sentiments which have been so aptly expressed by the leader of the House with reference to the death of our late colleague, Senator Dobson. It is always a matter of profound regret in calling the attention of the House to the death of any of our colleagues. Though the sorrow which death invariably brings may be lessened by the age and infirmity of the departed, yet the loss of one who, up to a very short time ago, was actively engaged in the performance of like duties with ourselves, is inexpressively sad. The late Senator Dobson was for some fifteen years a member of this Chamber, and, during that time, was invariably present in his place and always manifested a deep interest in the duties of his office. His public career was peculiarly free from that rancour which is engendered very frequently by political strife. Quietly and courteously he took his way amongst his fellow members, enjoying the respect, esteem and confidence of both sides of politics. In this age, when the lines of division between the friendships of men follow very closely the political differences between them, it is a matter of very great gratification to find so worthy a tribute paid to a man as has been paid to the late Senator Dobson, who enjoyed the confidence, respect and esteem of both parties. Those recalling the uniform courtesy and kindness with which the late senator went to and fro amongst his colleagues in the Senate for the last fifteen years, will agree, I am sure, that in the few remarks that I have made I am but voicing the feelings of this House in the expression of the sentiments which I have thus poorly expressed.

THE LYON DIVORCE CASE.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I move that the petition presented by hon. Senator Davis on the 23rd of January, for a Bill of divorce, of Victor Harold Lyon of the city of Ottawa, in the province of Ontario, be now read.

The SPEAKER—Be rather agreed to as read.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—That the petition be now read. It was presented on the 23rd January, and it has not yet been read.

The SPEAKER—I might draw the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that the petition was read and received.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—If that is so, it is all right, but I understand it was not received.

The SPEAKER—The question that arises is whether it should be concurred in by the Senate, or referred to one of the standing committees.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—I understood it had not been received. If it has been received that is all that is required.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I might point out that, under rule 133, the petition would have to go before the Select Committee on Divorce. I am not aware whether or not that committee has reported on the petition.

The SPEAKER—It is not a petition for divorce, but it is a petition for leave to present a petition, and the question arises as to the propriety of having the Senate concur in the petition, or whether we should refer it to that committee under rule 133.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I suppose it is because the time has expired ?

The SPEAKER—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It might be pointed out that it could not go before the committee except by the action of the House in sending it there ; that is, under the ordinary procedure the petition could not come before the committee, not having been presented.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—I think the petition has not gone to the Committee on Divorce at all. If it had been received, it would have gone before the Committee on Divorce.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I ask for the Speaker's ruling. A petition was presented for leave to present a petition for divorce. My understanding of our revised rules is that it was decided that all matters of any kind relating to divorce were to be dealt with exclusively by the Divorce Committee, and therefore, a petition for leave to present a petition for divorce should be referred to the Divorce Committee to consider. I ask for the Speaker's ruling on this matter, so that the Divorce Committee, if I am right, will be justified by the Speaker's ruling in taking up the petition and acting on it. I think that is the proper way to deal with it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The rule reads :

> All petitions for divorce, and all matters arising out of petitions for a Bill of divorce, shall be referred to the Standing Committee on Divorce.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Yes, but you will notice that there is no petition yet for divorce.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—But it is a matter arising——

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Not out of the petition, because there is no petition.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think it should be relegated under the rule for petitions in general.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The members of the committee will bear me out in saying that it was the intention of those who revised the rules that all matters, of any kind, relating to divorce would be relegated to the Divorce Committee.

The SPEAKER—When the petition was read at the table, I was in hopes that the hon. gentleman having the petition in hand, would move that it be received by the Senate, and if the point of order had been raised that the Senate could not agree to the petition before it was reported upon by the Committee on Divorce, I intended, inasmuch as the rule is not clear, to leave it to the Senate to decide the point. Do I understand that I have to deal with the motion of the hon. gentleman, that the petition be now concurred in ?

Hon. Mr. WILSON—That it be now received. It was merely presented by the hon. gentleman from Prince Albert, and it was presented as petitions generally are, but it has not yet been received, and I move that it be now received.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think this is not the regular way to deal with a petition of this kind. We are taken by surprise. We have not had time to study the question at all. I think we should get a notice of motion that he intends to bring it up to-morrow and move that the petition be concurred in by this House. It should be brought before the House by way of a motion.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Might I suggest to my hon. friend who has charge of this petition, that inasmuch as the Standing Orders Committee will probably meet to-morrow and recommend to the House the extension of the time for the reception of petitions, it should stand until to-morrow, and if the time is extended, then in due course it will go before the select committee on divorce.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—If my hon. friend will permit me to explain, the Standing Orders Committee have nothing to do with petitions for divorce, under rule 133 of our revised rules.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—If I thought the Standing Orders Committee had nothing to do with petitions for a Bill of divorce, I should not have made this motion. I think now the only way to deal with it is by a motion of this kind.

The motion was agreed to on a division.

TELEGRAPHIC COMMUNICATION WITH PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to ask the hon. leader of the government in this House, if he has any information as to whether this Marconi tower, so called, at Pictou, has been erected, and if telegraphic communication has been restored between Prince Edward Island and the mainland ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have not heard any more about it since the last answer I gave my hon. friend. The department have taken charge of it, and have undertaken to have it carried out as early as possible. I do not know how long it will take. I could not tell the hon. gentleman. The intention was not to lose any time.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Nearly a week has elapsed since my hon. friend said that the government had decided to erect the Marconi station, and I will have again to give my hon. friend notice now that I will ask this question from day to day until we know that this tower has been erected.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not know how I can give any further information. I brought the subject to the attention of the ministers, and I was assured by both the Minister of Inland Revenue and the Minister of Public Works that the installation of the Marconi system would be undertaken at once. That is the best that can be done. I do not know that I can get any more information than that.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I am not surprised that my hon. friend has not heard any more about it since the adjournment. That is generally the way with the department in dealing with these matters. However, I call my hon. friend's attention to it now, and I will ask him again to-morrow and perhaps he will have obtained more information by that time.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Might I ask whether the government has ever taken into consideration the propriety of buying out that cable monopoly and getting rid of it ? This is a question that has been agitating the country for ten or fifteen years, ever since Prince Edward Island has been in the confederation. An admirable speech was made on this subject by the hon. gentleman from Marshfield, in which he showed quite clearly that the company had violated the terms of its contract, and if so the government should take steps at once to put an end to it. If the company have any rights under contract, the better way would be to buy them out and do away with the monopoly, than to perpetuate a system which is not satisfactory to the island nor to the country. I might say that before confederation, in some of the maritime provinces and particularly in Nova Scotia, some railway companies had in their charters perpetual rights to import all articles free of duty necessary for the working of their roads. That was a source of constant annoyance and trouble to the Customs Department and to the government. During the time that I was in the customs, I know that it was constantly brought under my notice, and the notice of the government, the violation, the excessive violation I might term it, of the company in their importations. Negotiations were entered into for the purpose of buying them out. It was never carried out during the time of the late government. But the present government, I believe, to meet their demand, paid to my mind a somewhat excessive price for the privilege. Notwithstanding that, the bargain after all was a good one, in the interests of the country, doing away with a great deal of trouble and annoyance. Why could not the same policy be adopted in reference to the telegraphic monopoly that was given to this company prior to its entering into confederation? It would relieve the government of a great deal of trouble. It would give satisfaction to those who are upon the island, and the difficulties that arise year after year, in connection with the maintenance of that telegraphic service would be done away with. I throw out this suggestion, hoping my hon. friend will take it into consideration. I am inclined to think that those who represent the island would prefer having the monopoly bought up if it be necessary to buy it, and do away with the trouble which has existed in the past.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I might be permitted to say in reference to the remarks of the hon. gentleman from Belleville, that my observations addressed to the House three years ago on this question were to show that there was no monopoly, and I am delighted to find that the government has this year come to that conclusion. It has been announced in the House of Commons that the government has now taken that position. At the same time I do not dispute that the Anglo-American Company may have some interests for which it would be fair to compensate them. They contributed part of the rails and posts in connection with the railway service on the island. I am not going to take that ground, but I wish it clearly understood that we do not admit that they have any monopoly whatever, and whatever is paid for, the company has not any exclusive privilege.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—Although somebody, and somebody in authority may declare that there is no monopoly, still there is a monopoly and it is going on all the time. I think the statement was made last year on good authority that the government disputed the claim to a monopoly. I believe that was stated in the other House. The monopoly, however, has existed. The suggestion of the hon. gentleman from Belleville would not meet the present emergency, which is very great. When I had the honour of a seat in the lower House I called attention to the exactions of this company. I stated that it had failed to perform its duty to the public, and suggested to the Minister of Finance, who was horrified at the suggestion, that the government should repudiate the whole matter. The company was not then doing its duty to the country and it is not doing it at present, but I think the government was fairly criticised when they made an arrangement last year, as they did not insist on the company laying another cable across to the island. It cannot be done at this season of the year, but it should have been provided for. The business is constantly growing, and it would grow a great deal faster if telegraphic communication was uninterrupted. One cable would not have made so much difference in cost to the company.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What I stated was that I thought the case as laid before the House by the hon. gentleman from Marshfield, was a very strong one against the monopoly which the company claim to have. They act as though they had a monopoly at present and deny the right of any other parties to establish communication telegraphically with that island. I understand the hon. senator from Marshfield to say that while he denies they have a monopoly, the government has conceded that and deny that a monopoly exists. There is only one way of testing the claim of the company, either by the introduction of a Bill to settle the question, or by taking it to the courts of law to decide whether they have a monopoly or not, and if the courts decide that they have a monopoly, buy them out.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—After all, we are only playing upon words. I deny that they were by law conceded exclusive privileges, but all telegraph and telephone companies, when they go into a small place, from the fact that they are there first and have possession of the ground, must have a monopoly for all practical purposes, because you cannot get any one else to establish a rival service. But there was no exclusive privilege given to them, and furthermore, the parliament of Canada has given the right to three other telegraphic and telephonic companies to establish connection with the island. That shows that parliament never recognized any exclusive privilege on the part of the established company.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Some three years ago, the members from Prince Edward Island drew the attention of the government to the excessive charges that were being exacted, I think 25 cts. for every message crossing, in addition to the cost on the island, and it was suggested that the government should cut them down to a reasonable limit. At that time they were receiving a subsidy of nineteen hundred dollars. In consideration of that subsidy being increased to $5,000 they reduced the charges very considerably, I do not know how much, but from 25 cts. down to 10 cts.: I think that was about the reduction. It was a very large reduction. On that basis, a contract was made for 5 years, the government undertaking to pay a subsidy of $5,000 a year. While that contract is in force—and it has exactly three years yet to run—it will be impossible to take any action towards buying them out or laying a cable unless a pretty large sum is paid for that purpose. You would be entirely at their mercy. You could not force them in any way. A contract has been made, and while it lasts it cannot be cancelled in any way that I can see: therefore we thought that the best way of getting over it would be by installing a Marconi system.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That is the only thing to be done.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is the only thing we thought possible to do.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Give it to us as quickly as possible.

INTRODUCTION OF GOVERNMENT MEASURES IN THE SENATE.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Before the Orders of the Day are called, may I ask the hon. leader in this House what progress he has made with the government in inducing them to originate measures in this Chamber? We have entered upon the third month of the session, and with the exception of two short Bills, one dealing with the statutes, and one before us now, containing three lines, dealing with petroleum, no public business has been presented to this Chamber. My hon. friend will recall that the address that was delivered by the Governor General on the opening of parliament, promised many public measures, but few of these measures have been forthcoming, and were it not for the industry of the members in placing upon the order paper from day to day many matters of public interest, I am bound to say that this Senate certainly would have been idle, on account of the dearth of business. It seems to me that this has been more marked this session than in any previous session. We certainly have not observed such an absence of public business for consideration of the Senate during the time I have had the honour of a seat in this House, as during the present session. It seems to me my hon. friend should be more energetic in urging upon the government the necessity of originating many of its measures to this House.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I cannot accept the statement made by my hon. friend that we have had fewer Bills introduced this session than in former sessions. My experience has been exactly the other way. We have passed four Bills this session up to the present time, as you will have evidence of tomorrow. The House of Commons has accepted those, in one or two cases making some slight changes. The difficulty of inducing the members having their Bills launched in this Chamber is this—the head of a department taking an interest in a subject feels that it is safer in his hands for the first explanation than in anybody else's. Take for instance, the Land Bill, Mr. Oliver has with a great deal of time and attention and the aid of a number of assistants prepared a very voluminous measure. You can scarcely expect him to allow the policy of the department to be announced here, not directly through himself; and so with other measures. There are a number of Bills, as my hon. friend has observed, in the other Chamber. I should have been very glad to take charge of them, but there is that objection the heads of departments have to allowing the views on measures affecting materially subjects relating to their departments being launched by any but the heads of the departments themselves. I can certainly say that in former years the absence of government Bills in the Senate has been just as marked as on the present occasion, if not more so.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—There is one Bill which should come up here, that is the Bill for the Reformation of the Senate. We have not heard of it yet this year.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is being prepared.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Last year we heard the Minister of Trade and Commerce giving his views on the subject, and I thought they would be embodied in a Bill this year. Surely the government should press that measure.

The Senate adjourned until Three o'clock p.m., to-morrow.

THE SENATE.

OTTAWA, Wednesday, January 30, 1907.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

RUNNING OF SPECIAL PASSENGER TRAIN ON THE INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired :

During the night of the 26th-27th of December last, 1906, was a special passenger train run upon the Intercolonial Railway between St. Léonard Junction and Nicolet station ?

Who asked for this train, and upon whose authority was it granted ?

In the monthly report for the month of December, 1906, made by agents or by conductors, to what figure is the amount of money received in payment for the use of the train in question carried ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The answer sent me by the department is as follows :

1. No one asked for special train, the superintendent advises as follows :—On night of December 26, No. 153 arrived at St. Léonard Junction at 20.50 o'clock, and No. 146 at 19.39. The despatcher was instructed to allow the branch train to proceed to Nicolet with the passengers, and to return for connection with No. 153 ; as the latter train was late. By misunderstanding the despatcher held No. 146 until the arrival of No. 153 and then proceeded to Nicolet, and later ran a special trip without any authority it being a misunderstanding on his part.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. The returns for the month of December are not in.

MUTUAL RESERVE LIFE INVESTIGATION.

MOTION.

The Order of the Day being called :

In the evidence given by Mr. Eldridge in the Mutual Reserve Life investigation, recently held in New York, he stated that it had cost the company $20,977.66 to get the investigation through the Senate and Commons of Canada in 1904. I shall move that the company be required to furnish the names and detailed statements of the amounts paid, if any, to senators or members of parliament in Canada, or to the respective firms to which they belong, in connection with the said investigation, and copies of all cheques issued and receipts given therefor.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN said : I desire to offer a few remarks upon the notice that I have placed upon the order paper regarding the New York Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association. In the first place, permit me to say that I had no intention whatever in giving a notice that would reflect in any way upon any hon. senator or any member of parliament. My object was to ascertain the facts with regard to the moneys that were spent by the company on legislation in 1904, and to see whether there was anything improper in connection with that expenditure or not. A great many people in Canada are deeply interested in that company. In my own section there are some forty or fifty policy-holders who are in doubt whether to continue the effort to keep their policies alive or abandon them. The way the company has issued policies is very discreditable in many cases. Their agents offered all the inducements they could to parties to insure with them, assuring them that the company's rates were very much lower than the rates of other companies, and thus people have been induced to pay premiums for years. Eventually the rates were increased, so that when the policies matured, they were not worth anything like their face value. The company has adopted a system whereby, under their by-laws, they have a right to charge a policy-holder certain fees and make deductions in one way or another and cut down the values of policies so that when the policy-holders come to realize upon them, they do not get anything like what they anticipated. Great reductions take place. The business of the company in Canada shows that they have collected altogether from the Canadian people $5,664,467.54. The policy-holders have received in payments altogether $3,474,769.47, leaving to the credit of the business $2,189,698.07. Giving them credit for all expenses, rents, commissions to agents, doctors' fees, and everything connected with insurance, and allowing that all such charges have been legitimate and proper, the company has yet a balance in its hands of $1,054,081.53. There is in the hands of the Receiver General here about $260,000 and in the hands of the Toronto General Trusts, something in the neighbourhood of $66,000, which would leave $323,000 some odd hundred dollars to the credit of the company in this country. From year to year the policies are growing less, simply because the company from time to time have increased their rates, and this increase has been so great that many policy-holders have been obliged in the end to abandon their policies. In the face of these facts, if the policy-holders should continue surrendering their policies, the result will be that a time will come when there will not be a policy in Canada, and the company can draw upon the Receiver General for the $260,000, and from the Toronto General Trusts for the $66,000, and these sums will be taken out of the country with the rest of the money. I wrote two or three months ago to Mr. Fielding, Finance Minister, drawing his attention to the history of that company. Every one has heard how one of the executors of the company, their vice-president and legal adviser, has been recently tried in the Supreme Court of the United States for grand larceny and found guilty, and is now serving a two years sentence in Sing Sing prison. Mr. Eldridge, who was here in 1904 before the Senate committee that held the investigation, is also under indictment. The probabilities are that his trial will come off before long, and it is hard to say what may happen to him. Mr. Burnham, brother of the man that is now serving in Sing Sing prison, is also under indictment for improper transactions in connection with that company, and, no doubt, will be put on trial before long. That is the history of the officers. Hon. gentlemen will remember Mr. Eldridge was asked during the investigation here if he could state the salaries that were drawn by the different officers of the New York Mutual Reserve Life. He declined to do that. It could not be got out of him. Those who were present at the investigation know that he declined to answer that question. I am going to read from a report issued by Mr. Vanderpool, who is chief officer of the department of insurance in the state of New York. I wrote to him and he sent me this report. This is what he says with regard to the salaries paid to those men :

Fred'k A. Burnham, president, $39,000 a year.
John D. Eldridge, vice-president and actuary, $31,000 a year.
Geo. Burnham, Jr., second vice-president—that is the man who is now in Sing Sing prison—received $17,000 a year.

These are the salaries paid, and these are the chief officers of that institution. A great many hon. gentlemen who were present at the investigation will remember what took place. I am sorry to think that that investigation was opposed so bitterly by many members in this House and by many gentlemen in the other House. I do not say that they did it for a pecuniary consideration at all. I do not insinuate that, but the opposition that that committee was faced with was a great surprise to many people. The investigation was sufficient to open the eyes of the people of this country to the history of that institution.

The Secretary of State, when that committee was asked for, stated—and I do not at all blame him—that it could do no good, and could not accomplish anything ; but it did a lot of good. It let the people of this country know what kind of an institution that insurance company was. It opened their eyes to the fraud from beginning to end. The amount of insurance matured—I am quoting from the same author to whom I referred a moment ago—under the policies of the Mutual Reserve Life in three years, 1901, 1902 and 1903, was $9,023,747.12. That was the amount of policies that actually matured which they were called upon to redeem. How did they pay them ? In the first place they made deductions altogether on account of law liens and so on of $819,927.79 ; deductions on account of excess mortality, $338,-129 ; balance on premium interest, alleged misrepresentations made, &c., a deduction of $368,325.65. All these amounts were deducted. What was the result of this nine millions of life insurance ? They actually paid but $5,944,200 in cash in settlement of those policies. The balance was for disputes settled by compromises, and liens being charged and all that kind of thing, so that out of this nine million there was practically $4,079,546.97, of which the policyholders got nothing. These were the transactions of the company for the years I have mentioned. I believe that the company, when it started, did not do so upon a proper basis. Their rate for insurance was below what it really ought to have been. But people should have been made aware of the methods by which they intended to conduct the insurance, because, when Mr. Eldridge was here he said that in their system they insured a man for a year, the same as you would insure a barn against fire, and when the period ended that he had no further claim upon them. With regard to the expenses in connection with legislation here, I know that there were hints at the time that that investigation was proceeding. I have already stated that a very active part was taken by certain members of the House, some members of this House and some members of the other House. I am not going to say for a moment that when a law firm happens to have one of its members appointed to the Senate they should immediately cease to take any work from an insurance company that wants to come here and get legislation. One could hardly expect that. Law firms will do business. There is no doubt about that, and if we happen to have sitting in this House a member who has been in the habit of doing business for any institution for many years, it is natural to suppose that the firm will not close the door against them and say 'We cannot do any business with you, because a member of our firm has been appointed a senator or a member of the House of Commons.' I do not mean to insinuate that I would expect anything of that kind, but we do not want persons from the United States to entertain the impression that they can come here and, by spending money liberally, secure all the legislation that they may require. An attempt of that kind was made once in the province of Ontario, and it failed. I do not know that it has ever been tried since, and I hope it never will. With regard to the legal expenses to which my resolution refers, I find that in 1902 there were no legal expenses of the New York Mutual Reserve reported. They have to make a return to parliament every year, under oath, setting out the different items of their expenditure in Canada, and Canada appears in the reports by itself. They must put that at the end of their report. They show first their United States business, and then show their Canadian business. In 1902, in their report in regard to expenses, they show that they had spent no money in legal expenses. In 1903, at page 272 of the report, legal expenses are returned as being only $325.29. I have the report here and will lend it to any hon. member who desires to read it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If the hon. gentleman will permit me to interrupt him, the Deputy Governor is here desiring to assent to Bills and I therefore move that the House do now adjourn during pleasure.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS ASSENTED TO.

The Hon. Mr. Justice Girouard, acting as deputy to His Excellency the Governor General, being seated at the foot of the Throne.

The hon. the Speaker commanded the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod to proceed to the House of Commons and acquaint that House: 'It is the Deputy Governor's desire that they attend him immediately in this House.'

Who being come with their Speaker,

The following commission was read a length at the table by the clerk:

The Clerk of the Crown in Chancery read the titles of the Bills to be passed, as follows:

An Act respecting a certain treaty between Canada and Japan.

An Act to amend the Naturalization Act.

An Act to amend the Act respecting Commercial treaties affecting Canada.

An Act respecting the Revised Statutes, 1906.

To these Bills the royal assent was pronounced by the clerk of the Senate in the following words:

'In His Majesty's name, His Honour the Deputy Governor doth assent to these Bills.'

The Depuy Governor was pleased to retire, and

The House of Commons withdrew.

DEBATE RESUMED.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—When the Senate adjourned during pleasure, I was trying to find out a certain charge in connection with the business of the Mutual Reserve Life Insurance Company, in accordance with the resolution before the House. I pointed out that in 1903 the amount of legal expenses was $325.39; in 1904, as stated on page 279 of the report of the insurance department, the expenses were $20,977.66, and in 1905, as set out on page 305 of the insurance report, they amounted to $6,370.04. It is very clear from this that the expenses, the year the investigation took place were greatly in excess of the expenses of other years. I can easily understand it would be so, but the amount is very large. It is not altogether the amount I am finding fault with, I want to ascertain by the return I am calling for, whether any improper payments were made by that company in connection with the investigation, because the money belongs to the policy-holders, and if the company has improperly or imprudently sacrificed the interests of the policy-holders the public should know it. I may be asked how will you get a return from the company? I reply that the company is acting under a charter in Canada, and if they do not obey the commands of parliament they are liable to have their charter suspended or cancelled altogether. It is a pity they were ever permitted to do business in this country, but since they are incorporated and are doing business here, they can be compelled to obey the orders of parliament. It was a mistake to give them a new lease of life, as we did by the Act of 1904. Under that Act they have been enabled to squeeze their policy-holders, many of whom have suffered serious reductions in their policies or forced to pay an additional sum for all the years they have been running in order to bring them up to the line companies standards, as if they had been paying a responsible company. With regard to the money in the hands of the Receiver General here, it would be but right to call upon the company, to reinsure their policy-holders in some good solvent insurance company. Let them pay over the amount that they have in reserve to the credit of the Canadian policy-holders and enable them to get policies elsewhere. I hope that in the legislation with regard to life insurance which is to be submitted soon, the government will make provision that, in future, life insurance shall be conducted in such a way that no deductions, no paring down of the amount of a policy, and no dishonesty will be tolerated, so that when a company enters into a covenant with an individual to insure his life that covenant will be carried out. In the past, unfortunately, policy-holders have been largely in the hands of the insurance companies. The policies have contained such provisions as the company felt disposed to put in them. They have been able to say that the agent who takes the application is not the agent of the company but the agent of the applicant, and there are other provisions of a similar character. I hope that in the legislation we are to have there will be such a recast of the present system that policy-holders will be absolutely and entirely protected. I have known men in my own district who have virtually deprived themselves of the necessities of life in order to meet their payments to this very company. They have struggled for years to meet their payments and now at the end of twenty or twenty-five years they wake up to find that the whole institution from garret to cellar is rotten, that they cannot depend upon getting a matured policy if they continue to pay, and that they might as well sacrifice their money. The law of our country is wrong if it tolerates a condition of things like that, and I hope the proposed legislation will put an end to it. Let me give you an illustration of the manner in which this company has been doing business. I am reading from the report issued by Mr. Vanderpool, who is chief of the insurance department in New York. This is a paragraph in his report :

The last annual statement of the company filed with the Insurance Department and now appearing in its published annual report for the year 1904, produces a so-called surplus of unassigned funds amounting to $359,211.58. The examination just completed fixes this item at $38,492.68.

That is $300,000 less than what it is returned by the company and sworn to as being correct. All through this report there is evidence that the company has been making fraudulent representations. I want it to be clearly understood that I make no insinuation with regard to any member of parliament ; I simply want the company to be called upon to explain to parliament how that $20,977.66 had been expended. In one place Mr. Eldridge states the amount was $15,000, but in the return under my hand he swears—because these returns have to be sworn to—that the amount spent in litigation in Canada that year was $20,977.66 to get their legislation through the Senate and Commons of Canada in the session of 1904.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The motion is one which is opportune at the present moment, because the members of that committee lie under an imputation made by a gentleman named Eldridge. I find that in the evidence given before the Armstrong committee in New York, that he answered the questions as follows :—

Q. At that time your expenses (that is the Mutual Reserve Life of New York) were $1,625,000, and was the same amount apparently in 1904 when you write nineteen million dollars of business ?—A. Well, in 1904 we had a good many extra expenses, for instance the Canadian matter, and we had a good many expenses in England that were unusual.

Q. (By Mr. Hughes) What were your expenses in connection with the Canadian matter ?

(Meaning that investigation that was held by a committee of this honourable House in the year 1904.)

A. My recollection is that these expenses were about $15,000.

Q. (By Mr. Hughes), And that was expended for what purpose ?—A. Well, to a considerable extent for attorneys' fees and representations before the committee.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Go on.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Then the examination proceeds :

Q. Were there any expenses in any other able except attorneys' fees ?—A. Well, of course, I was in Canada in connection with the matter most of the time from the middle of April until the latter part of July, and we had parties from the home office here at different times in response to the committee.

That is all the evidence in reference to this matter given by Mr. Eldridge. There is a suggestion. The suggestion is that he paid $15,000 for attorneys' fees and representations before the committee. As far as his own expenses are concerned, I regret to say that this honourable House ordered them to be paid, when they declined to pay the expenses of our attorney and the expenses of our sole witness, or our principal witness. That is the case.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Does the hon. gentleman state that this House ordered Eldridge's own expenses to be paid ?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Yes, his expenses were paid.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think the hon. gentleman is mistaken.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I think it was $500 he received, if I am not mistaken. He got $5 a day for the time he was here. I do not know the amount, but he was paid expenses—all he claimed. I do not believe he was cut down. Under those circumstances I think it is about time to disregard Mr. Eldridge as a witness for or against an institution or any person. Eldridge is the same man who gave evidence that one J. B. Wells had spent, I think, some $20,000 in 1887 or 1888 to obtain legislation on behalf of the same company, and for which Mr. Wells, I think, was summoned to the bar of this House during that investigation. Now it has been proved that Mr. Eldridge did not tell the truth in regard to that matter. He told very little of the facts relating to the administration of that company during the entire time he was on the stand before our select committee. Scarcely one word of straight truth fell from that gentleman's lips. He coloured every statement, as he coloured his statement before the Armstrong committee. To the best of his recollection he spent $15,000 before that committee for attorneys' fees and for representations thereto, and when we turn up the official report sent into the department in Canada, what do we find? We find an amount exceeding $15,000 by nearly $6,000. It makes the legal expenses of that year total up $20,900, when the year previous the legal expenses only amounted to $350. The year before that they amounted to nothing, not a cent for expenses in 1902, and only $350 in 1903; and in 1904, when that company should have been exposed to the world, he comes here and he is allowed to spend $15,000 (according to the official report, $20,000) to cover the evil tracks of that company in this country. Is his report true in regard to the question of the $20,000 for that year? I do not think it is, because in last year's report the amount is placed between $6,000 and $7,000 for legal expenses. I have not the facts, but if we take the record of the company for the amount of legal expenses they have paid, we find there was no $6,000 or $7,000 extra needed in that year, and was part of the sum they expended in 1904, making the amount altogether $26,000 instead of $15,000. So that Eldridge did not tell the truth before the Armstrong committee in regard to that matter. Unfortunately I have been unable to secure the evidence extracted from him in the criminal trial of Mr. Burnham, the vice-president, about a month ago, to show this House that the District Attorney, Mr. Jerome, faced him with perjury in many an instance from his own evidence. While he was being examined before the Armstrong committee he was confronted with the evidence given before our committee, and District Attorney Jerome asked him when did he tell the truth. And that sanctimonious individual with the devotional role of the hands that had such an effect upon a large number of my hon. colleagues in this House, but who never deceived me, fainted almost in the box, was scarcely able to continue his evidence in that criminal trial, and that is the gentleman who has cast upon this honourable House the odium and the slur alluded to in the motion of my hon. friend from Wellington. I wish to repudiate that slur. On my own behalf, and on behalf of the committee I say he may have spent $15,000 or $25,000, or $30,000; but as far as I am concerned, and as far as the hon. members with whom I laboured in that investigation are concerned, I am positively able to state that not one cent of it was used for improper purposes. However, the impression left by his evidence is there. He would not tell the truth. He says 'I paid largely' to a considerable extent, for attorneys' fees and the balance for representation before the committee.' Hon. gentlemen can take what meaning they like out of it. I stand here as the ex-chairman of that committee to say that that gentleman had no business to make such a statement; if he had any grounds to make it, he should state the facts, but in face of his past record as an untruthful witness, as an unreliable officer of a company, as a man who gave this committee and this House to understand that he and his fellow officers of that company, who were in receipt of salaries amounting to $35,000 or $40,000—he would not give us the figures, were paid salaries that were paltry as compared with officers of other companies he stands discredited before the country. What do we find in the last trial, when he is forced to give the facts? My hon. friend from Wellington only mentioned two or three salaries, Fred. Burnham, $39,000. He is under indictment to-day; Mr. Eldridge, $31,000, and he gave us to understand—I am speaking for myself in regard to that—that he never received more than $15,000 as vice-president of that company, and the president's brother, not his son, also legal adviser, receiving $17,000, and the other petty officers, bringing the amount up to $111,000. Mr. Eldridge misled the committee; so much so that hon. members of that committee objected strenuously to my decision in the matter; but I held that it was a question of public policy, a matter in the public interest that the people in this country should know what salaries were paid to the men who were taking their premiums and putting them in their pockets. I could go along the whole line of evidence and point out to hon. members of the House how that same man Eldridge did all in his power to besmear and besmirch the character of our witnesses, and tried to make out that Mr. Wells, the vice-president at one time of that company when it was in its days of honesty and prosperity, had left, owing to wrong conduct on his part. That insinuation was false. It was admitted, I regret to say, by a large number of my colleagues on the floor of this House, Mr. Wells has since been avenged ; unfortunately not on the floor of the Senate. He has had no opportunity for that. But in the courts of New York his evidence has brought condemnation on the officers of that company who had been guilty of malversation of the funds, and whose evidence, no doubt, will also land Mr. Eldridge and Mr. Burnham in the same position as their fellow officer Mr. Burnham, Jr. I take this opportunity to vindicate the character of Mr. Wells. I take this opportunity to say that Mr. Wells is an honest man, and his words have been proved to be true. But, unfortunately opinions differ. Appreciations of character differ, and we do not all agree in sizing up a man. Some hon. members thought that all virtue, honesty and truth were deposited on the lips and in the heart of Mr. Eldridge. There was nothing vain or vain-glorious in his declaration, but everything was honest on his part. They can see their error today. They can realize now that the chairman of the committee, and the members who stood behind him, were right in their assumption that the company was not a proper one to do business in Canada ; that the company was one that was bleeding the widow and the orphan ; that the company was one which was paying its debts only at the rate of 40 or 50 cents on the dollar. We were not credited at that time. We were abused and obstructed in every possible way, and the spite and vengeance against that committee was carried to such an extent that our attorney has not yet been paid for his services, that Mr. Patterson is not yet paid for attendance as a witness and for the time that he spent as an actuary and expert, although he is one of the best in America, and his services were sought for by the District Attorney of New York, in exposing those officers of the insurance company who had been bleeding the public on both sides of the line, and bleeding the public in England and elsewhere, for their own benefit. I wish, now that I have said a good word about Mr. Wells, to add my tribute to the character of Mr. Patterson. Both those gentlemen are ex-Canadians. Both were born in this country and come from good families. The Wells family has produced men who have held high positions in this country—a speaker in Ontario and a minister in British Columbia—high positions in finance and commerce, and that man was treated, I was going to say, almost shamefully, anyhow he was not treated with that respect that is due to honour and integrity, though a Canadian, born not far from here, at the town of Vankleek Hill. Then we have that other insurance genius—because he was nothing else—a devoted one—who spent nights and days with our attorney in a small, close room during the hot summer days, preparing a case against that company. Mr. Patterson is also an ex-Canadian who is earning his living in the United States, and that witness has been punished most unfairly by this honourable House. He deserved all credit for the labour that he expended to obtain information for that committee, but instead was refused the small pittance that he asked. He was granted the paltry sum of $4 or $5 a day, which would be absorbed by his bill for board in the hotel. His scientific and professional expert services have not been paid for yet, all largely due to the influence of that same individual, Eldridge, vice-president of the company who tried to make out that Patterson was dismissed from the service of the Mutual Reserve owing to wrong conduct, when it is known in New York that he is a most acceptable actuary, that he is an expert without many superiors, even in the United States. I take this opportunity also to pay a tribute to him. I know it will not fill his pocket. He is not a rich man, and we of the Senate of Canada have deprived him of what he has honestly earned and we have had the injustice to do it. It is not yet too late to undo that injustice. It is not yet too late to undo the injustice done to our attorney, the only one we had against seven or eight legal firms from Montreal, Ottawa and Toronto and New York. We had only one to contend against all that intelligence, all that expert knowledge, all that legal talent, and we have refused to pay him his paltry fee of $20 or $25 a day for the time he was here. Whatever the per diem was in the investigation before the Armstrong committee in New York, Mr. Hughes received a retainer of $25,000, and his assistant received another $25,000, and another gentleman $10,000. Sixty thousand dollars was paid to the three gentlemen for legal fees at the one investigation, yet we refuse to pay Mr. Coster's small fee although he spent three months in Ottawa neglecting his local business. He was here not so much for the money that was in it, but rather to stand by one of our colleagues who is absent today. He was here to stand by a colleague who had confidence in him, the hon. gentleman who brought these charges against the Mutual Reserve Association in the spring of 1904, who from his seat in the Senate stated, 'If I cannot prove my charges against the Mutual Reserve Life, the fraudulent manipulations, the dishonest transactions by the company, I will forfeit my seat on the floor of this House.' These were the words of the hon. gentleman from Rothesay (Hon. Mr. Domville). He had confidence in Mr. Coster, who was his special attorney in St. John. He wanted him to be here so as to be assured that the investigation would be gone into thoroughly and probed to the bottom, and I have no doubt had Mr. Coster not been in the case, probably things would have proceeded in a more plain sailing fashion. At any rate these are the facts, and appreciating the facts at the time, I stood by the hon. gentleman from Rothesay, because when a man risks his head and his seat in the Senate and says 'I am going to resign from this honourable body if I cannot prove my charges,' I think it is nothing but fair for his honourable colleagues to give him assistance. Therefore I felt keenly—not for myself, because I was not personally interested—that many of his confreres on the floor of this House should make it so hard for him to prove his case. If they had had their way, we would not have been able to bring out the facts and lay the matter before the people of Canada. If he had not succeeded in doing so, the hon. gentleman from Rothesay would have had to resign his seat and return to private life. But, owing to the determination of a majority of that committee to ferret out the facts, to give the truth to the public, we were able to prove that the charges of the hon. gentleman from Rothesay were not only well founded, but were such as to demand not only the correction of the administration of that company, but were such as to justify investigation into other companies with the result of which you are aware. I had hoped that I was done with this question, but I shall not be done with it, as I said before, until complete justice is awarded to all concerned in it. I will not have done with it until the records of this House show in an emphatic manner that the committee did its work faithfully and honestly in the interests of the government, in the interests of the public, and in the interests of the insurance company itself. We have been taunted in the past—and that taunt still remains—that we were a useless committee, that we were a degraded committee, and that we were discredited. This aspersion has been wiped out by the experience of the past three years, and the records of this House must and will be confirmation of the fact that the committee did good, faithful and honest work.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—I am very sorry indeed to occupy the time of this House for one moment in discussing the motion which is now before the Senate. In doing so I will say most emphatically that I am not apologizing in any sense whatever for the doings of the Mutual Reserve Company in Canada or in the United States or any other place. I am not approving of the doings of that company in any respect, and in making a few remarks upon the subject I want it perfectly understood that I do not do so with any feeling whatever against my hon. friend who is the mover of the motion. The hon. gentleman who has just spoken has made a very considerable speech, not dealing at all with the subject which is before the House.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—But a motion dealing with individuals and with a question which was before this House some years ago, and which was before this House not in the best interests of the company involved, and not in the best interests of the people who were insured in that company in Canada.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—I am one of those who never appreciated the examination which the hon. gentleman has referred to. I do not think it was an examination, or at any rate a committee conducted at all in accord with the high dignity of the House from which it derived its powers, and I regret most exceedingly that my hon. friend has introduced this subject. I want to know what good will come out of it? Just exactly as much good as evolved from that committee: None whatever.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The officials complained of are in jail.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—That makes no difference. They are not in jail as a result of anything which was done here.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Yes, exactly.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—They are in jail as a result of investigations which took place in the United States with regard to insurance companies generally, and having nothing to do with this matter at all. In the first place I want to ask, in what way the company can be made to respond to the request which is made here? How can that be done? I imagine that the only way in which that can be accomplished would be by a joint resolution of both Houses. They could be asked for the information, and if they declined to give it, the government could refuse to renew their license. But the government cannot do away with their charter. Parliament perhaps can do that, but not the government. So that I think the matter has been ill considered. I am somewhat an old member of parliament. I have heard charges made on various occasions in the Commons of Canada. When these charges were made, they were individual charges against individual members, the member making the charge taking the responsibility for what he stated.

But here is a fishing investigation, a slur and an insult to every member of this House, nothing more or less. I regret it. I speak warmly, not because of any antipathy to my hon. friend who introduced the subject, but because I feel the insult that has been offered to every member of the Senate. What good can result from it? None at all; but, hon. gentlemen, the die is cast; we cannot recede. The unfortunate investigation has to go on. Can members of this honourable House accept the position and lie under that charge? It is unfortunate for the people of Canada, and unfortunate for this honourable body that such a charge should be made by one of our colleagues, involving as it does the honour of every member of the Senate. I regret it exceedingly. I understand further that there is nothing in the report that involves the necessity for this motion. Coming for one moment to the question of costs, every business man knows that investigations of this kind, in so far as attorney's fees are concerned, are very expensive. Eminent counsel were engaged from Toronto, Montreal and other places. My hon. friend himself has told us that the fee of one lawyer, Mr. Coster, should have been $3,000. He says seven eminent counsel were engaged on the other side. If these gentlemen were paid at the same rate, that would account for $21,000. Furthermore, an investigation of this kind is more expensive for foreigners than it would be for people residing in the country, and necessarily so. Coming as they did to a foreign country, they engaged more counsel and were put to greater expense. I regret for the honour of this House, and I say it feelingly, that such a motion was ever placed upon our order paper.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I desire to add one word somewhat on the lines which have been covered by the speech of the hon. gentleman from Rideau. I could understand the hon. member from South Wellington finding the figure of $20,000 rather high and evincing a desire to satisfy his curiosity as to the details of that sum, although he had the statement of Mr. Eldridge that this amount represented all expenses paid to counsel for attending before the committee and covered the expenses generally involved in that investigation. All we could have found fault with, if he had persued that course, was that the hon. member was too inquisitive, but I fail to see how the hon. gentleman could be justified in basing on the statement found in the evidence of Mr. Eldridge the inference which he draws from that statement, to wit, that some portion of that money must have been paid to members of parliament. It seems to me that there is no connection whatever between the two. The hon. gentleman is not justified, in the face of the case he has laid before this honourabel House today, in the inference he has drawn from Mr. Eldridge's statement. However, the hon. gentleman will have to bear the consequences of the motion he has deemed proper to place on the proceedings of this honourable House. Every member of the Senate is bound to support his motion and give him an opportunity of finding out whether any portion of that money was paid to a member of parliament and it will be the duty, ultimately, of this honourable House to pass judgment upon the result of the investigation and upon the propriety of making this motion. I therefore propose to support the motion before the House. I desire, however, to add one word further, and in doing so I have to be excused for speaking outside of the motion and following the hon. member from Wellington and possibly a little the hon. member from Victoria. The hon. member from Wellington has travelled outside of his motion for the purpose of giving a history of the Mutual Reserve Association and attacking the company. Let me explain briefly what took place in 1904. The Bill which was passed that session was passed not as the result of the investigation of the special committee, but as the work of the Committee on Banking and Commerce and of individual members of this House. That Bill, which became law, was for the purpose of coming to the relief of a large number of policyholders of that company and to the relief of some eight million dollars of policies which had lapsed during nine or ten years, and for the purpose of giving the policy-holders the right to ask that their policies be revived. It was for the purpose of placing that company which had been established on a wrong system on the straight and regular insurance system and compelling the company to deposit with the government from time to time a sufficient amount to guarantee the policyholders in that company which they had not done before. They were not allowed after the passing of that Act to do any more business on the assessment system. They were limited to the ordinary insurance business, and the policy-holders in that company, except those who chose to remain under the assessment system, were fully protected. They are non-participating policyholders. They are obliged to pay only the regular rates, the rates which they would have paid if insured in other companies, and it is the duty of the officials of the government to see that a deposit is at all times kept here in the hands of the government sufficient to fully guarantee the payment of policies when they mature, and to see that if the company should come to grief that there is enough money in the hands of the government to reinsure all those policy-holders with another company.

Therefore I say that this legislation was for the purpose of coming to the relief of the policy-holders of that company, and it did very great service to a large number of people in this country. It was not the company's Bill. The company came with a different Bill altogether, and some members of the Senate changed it in the direction I have mentioned. There was besides that measure the investigation to which the hon, member from Victoria has referred. I happened not at the outset, but subsequently and against my will, to be appointed to that committee. As a member of that committee I formed part of the opposition. That opposition did not try to prevent the investigation taking place, but did not try to keep it within proper limits, so that there would result no discredit to this honourable House from the action of that committee. These were the sole efforts of what is called the opposition on that committee. The result, when the investigation was through, was placed before this House for the judgment of the Senate. Instead of doing the good that has been mentioned, I claimed then, and I claim still, that that investigation was directed not so much against the company as against the policy-holders in that company, and if that effort had not been counteracted, the result would have been that all the parties insured in that company would have lost their policies, and would have lost considerably from that investigation.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Will the hon. gentleman now give his appreciation of the prosecution of the company by the New York authorities after that investigation ?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I am not defending the company at all.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—It looks like it.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—On the contrary ; in 1904, as the result of the investigation which has been made, I placed before this honourable House the conclusions as I thought they should be drawn from the evidence, and for my part I declared that a number of irregularities had been committed by the officials of that company. At the same time, I declared what I thought was in the interest of the policy-holders and I tried to protect only the policy-holders. My present statement is made only with this object, to protect the policy-holders of that company. The hon. member from Wellington has spoken in such a way that a number of the policy-holders in that company may be discouraged. They may be led to believe that they are not properly protected, and that they are exposed to lose their money if they do not continue to pay their premiums. It is not so. They are fully protected by the deposit made with the government and which the company is bound to continue with the government so long as there are policy-holders of the company in Canada. The result of that legislation is that the deposit is not for the benefit of all the policy-holders of the company but for the exclusive benefit of their Canadian policy-holders. The hon. gentleman from Victoria has taken this occasion to make a violent attack on Mr. Eldridge and to compliment Mr. Wells and Mr. Patterson. For my part, I have no desire to follow him on that ground at all. I am not here to defend Mr. Eldridge. I leave it to the judgment of this honourable House to judge of the propriety of any senator taking occasion, on a motion of this kind, to abuse foreigners and others who have no opportunity to defend themselves.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—This discussion has taken a very wide range and has deviated entirely from the question at issue. I desire to make a few remarks in reply to statements that have fallen from the hon. gentleman from Rideau and the hon. member from de Salaberry. I can see no reason why the hon. member from Wellington should be censured so severely as he has been. As a member of this House he has a right to put a notice of motion on the order paper, and it is the duty of the Speaker, if he considers it improper, to see that it is removed from the order paper. The question is, did he put a proper or an improper question on the order paper ? I do not concede that it was improper. We had sharp discussions here in 1904, and attacks made from every quarter, and I can understand the desire of my hon. friend from Victoria to defend himself when he and the committee of which he was chairman are attacked. In 1904 they were told that the investigation should be undertaken by the Committee on Banking and Commerce. We did not feel that that was the proper course to pursue. The Mutual Reserve Company had done something in this country for which it deserved to be reproved. I say without hesitation that that company's operations in Canada were nothing more nor less than a fraud upon many people who had insured with them.

My hon. friend from de Salaberry says he came to the rescue of the policy-holders and tried to protect them. I ask him to mention a single instance in which the Act of 1904 has benefited any policy-holder of the Mutual Reserve Company ? I have not found one ; on the contrary I have had them come to me asking me to advise them what course to pursue, and I have been obliged to tell them that I could not give them any advice. The Bill was introduced in this House, and became law, and I do not believe that there are half a dozen lawyers in the country to-day who can say if anything can be done under that Bill, as it was introduced by the hon. member from de Salaberry, which would help the policy-holders. Talk of protecting the policy-holders ! It is nothing but a deception to them. If the hon. gentleman can tell me who has benefited by that legislation, I should like to hear him mention it. That legislation cost the country a very large amount of money. Who was to blame ? The Mutual Reserve Company was to blame. They in their avariciousness absorbed companies in Canada and in the United States and wherever they could. On one occasion they agreed to pay $120,000 for the Provincial Provident Association. Did they pay it ? They made the bargain, and the trustees of the Provincial Provident Association went to New York to ratify the agreement. When we got there what did we find ? We found Mr. Eldridge, according to his own statement before our committee—that committee which has been so strenuously objected to—that if he had carried out the agreement made between the Provincial Provident Association and the Mutual Reserve, he would be behind the bars. If he had been, it would have been only a little in advance of what is likely to occur in consequence of his actions in connection with this Mutual Reserve Association. They agreed to pay $120,000 for the business of the Provincial Provident Association. They got the goods and then refused to pay. Would that indicate that they should be protected ? I should think not. If my hon. friend from de Salaberry had in view the protection of widows and orphans, he would, perhaps, have accomplished some good; but, on the contrary, the company were protected. They were put in a position to go on and transact business. Have they in any way protected those who had been insured in the company before that time ? No. We to-day do not stand in as good a position as we did before. With all the legislation we have had and with the amount of money paid on account of that legislation, we to-day are in a worse position, so far as the Mutual Reserve Insurance Company is concerned, then we were before the Act of 1904 was passed. How then can it be contended that that Act was beneficial to Canada ? Did the people of Canada benefit by the amount of money spent on that occasion ? I think not, and I am surprised to hear my hon. friend contending that the Act was advocated in the interest of the country. The hon. gentleman said he tried to prevent the committee from going to an extreme. He did, I must confess ; he tried to prevent the committee making that thorough investigation which otherwise they very likely would have done in the interest of the people. But we find to-day that no benefit has accrued to the people from the Act of 1904. It certainly has been no benefit to the people who were insured in the Provincial Provident Insurance, a charter which was stolen by the Mutual Reserve. I have yet to learn of one single advantage that accrued from that legislation, although it cost the country a large amount of money. Under the circumstances, I contend there is no ground for the charges which have been made against the hon. senator from Wellington. He has declared upon the floor of the House that in putting his notice on the order paper he had no intention of insinuating anything against any member of this House or suggesting that any member of parliament had received money illegally on account of that legislation. I say it is unfair to any hon. gentleman who has made a retraction, if there is any necessity for retraction, to charge him with doing something which he has not done. But my hon. friend from Rideau (Hon. Mr. Edwards), says that no good can possibly come from this inquiry ; that, on the contrary it is one of the worst possible things that could come before the House. I hold the opposite view. If the company has misrepresented what occurred in Canada and the statement quoted by my hon. friend from Wellington from the official documents from the State of New York is untrue, then it is the bounden duty of this House to take the matter into consideration and to show that no member of either House of parliament has received any consideration on account of his efforts to protect widows and orphans from being robbed by the Mutual Reserve Association of New York.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is just one observation which the hon. senator from St. Thomas made in which I concur. I think he is right in saying that this notice of motion should not have been allowed to go on our order paper.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I will have no words placed in my mouth that I did not use. I said that if it was an improper motion it was the duty of the Speaker to see that it did not appear on the order paper.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not wish to reflect on his honour the Speaker; but really looking at the matter now, I think it was his duty to see that that notice did not go on the order paper. But it was in order for any member of the House to have called attention to the notice and have it stricken off the order paper. The hon. gentleman from St. Thomas has said there was nothing improper in the notice given by the hon. senator from Wellington. What is the notice ? He says :

I shall move that the company be required to furnish the names and detailed statements of the amounts paid, if any, to senators and members of parliament in Canada, or to the respective firms to which they being, in connection with the said investigation and copies of all cheques issued and receipts given therefor.

Now, when an hon. member of this House puts a notice on the paper which so clearly implies that there had been bribery of members of the House, he should be prepared to substantiate the charge.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. POWER—But what has been the line taken by the hon. gentleman ? We thought, we naturally would think, that there would be some attempt, some semblance of an attempt, to show that there was reason why this inquiry should take place. But how was it ? Did the hon. gentleman devote himself to showing the necessity for this motion of his ? Not at all. He gave us a discourse on the manner in which the business of the New York Mutual Reserve Life Association had been conducted, but he never gave any reason, nor did he tell us anything to cause the slightest suspicion that any moneys had been improperly paid to any member of either House.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—The hon. member from Wellington puts it : 'Amounts paid, if any.'

Hon. Mr. POWER—'Don't nail his ears to the pump'—'If any' is a sort of saving clause. It is not perhaps the correct thing to refer to speeches of hon. gentlemen, but still it is the usual practice. The senator from Wellington made a speech of considerable length. He never dealt with the resolution at all. Then the hon. gentleman from Victoria made another speech of considerable length and he never dealt with the question. The hon. gentleman from St. Thomas made a speech, not a long speech, bnt he did not deal with the question before the House. The fact is the speeches of these hon. gentlemen reminded me very much of what a clergyman once said about the sermon of another clergyman that if the text had had the small-pox, the sermon never would have caught it. I may be allowed to repeat, this is the only evidence that either hon. gentleman has been able to produce to sustain the serious charge implied in the notice given. This is the examination of Mr. Eldridge before the Armstrong Commission at Albany :

Q. What were your expenses in connection with the Canadian matter ?

A. My recollection is that they were about $15,000.

Q. And that was expended for what purpose?

A. Well, to a considerable extent for attorneys fees and representations before the committee.

'Representation' does not mean moneys paid to senators or members.

Hon. Mr. TESSIER—What does it mean ?

Hon. Mr. WILSON—We would like to know the meaning of the word 'representation.'

Hon. Mr. POWER—You cannot construe the word 'representation' so as to make it mean 'moneys paid to members.' The examination proceeds :

Q. Were there any other expenses in any way except attorneys fees ?

A. Well, of course, I was in Canada in connection with the matter the most of the time from the middle of April until the latter part of July, and we had to have parties from the home office there at different times in response to the committee.

We all know that that was the case. We know that there were comparatively high officers of this company here from New York for many days, and that is a thing that must have cost a good deal of money.

Hon. Mr. TESSIER—Yes, big salaries.

Hon. Mr. POWER—So that nothing has been brought before this House to show that any money was improperly paid in connection with legislation—not a single word. The first statement made by the hon. gentleman from Wellington in his original notice, was that the company had expended $24,000. Well, the hon. gentleman took the figures, not for the investigation before the committee here, but the figures for the total expenditure of the company in Canada during the year 1904, and he assumed this money was all spent in connection with the investigation here. If hon. gentlemen will look at the blue-book containing the report of our superintendent of insurance for 1904, they will find at page 279 'miscellaneous expenditures during the year 1904' aggregated a little more than $25,000, of which a little more than $20,000 represents legal expenses. Hon. gentlemen must remember that the legal expenditures of the company were not confined to this investigation before the House. There were a number of important suits going on in Canada at the time, and a particularly important one was the Angers case, and large sums were necessarily paid to the counsel of the company in that case and in other cases. Then, hon. gentlemen talking about the amount paid for counsel, must remember that the Hon. Mr. Geoffrion, one of the ablest and busiest counsel in the province of Quebec, was here during a great portion of that session, and that the hon. gentleman who is now Minister of Justice, was retained also; and my own feeling is that considering all the circumstances of the case, the sum of $15,000 expended in connection with that case was a very moderate one. I do not think that it is necessary to make any reference to the line taken by some hon. gentlemen, but I wish to make this observation: A committee is supposed to be a judicial body, particularly a committee of this House. The chairman of the committee takes the place of a chief justice. I submit to hon. gentlemen that the chairman of this particular committee has never, as far as I am aware, from the day the committee was moved for, assumed the position of a chief justice. He has all through assumed the position of a prosecuting attorney. I do not care myself what is done with the motion, because I do not wish to differ from hon. gentlemen who say that the motion must pass, but I say that there has not been the slightest prima facie case made out to establish the charge implied in the notice. Under these circumstances, I think it is really our duty to completely ignore it.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I fully agree with the remark of the hon. gentleman from Halifax with regard to a lack of judicial spirit shown by the chairman of the committee and the gentleman who moved for the committee in 1904. There was nothing more calculated to turn the House against these gentlemen and their contention than that very spirit which was shown in their speeches, and we have had an illustration of that kind of speaking to-day in the remarks addressed to the House by the hon. gentleman from Victoria. I merely rise to say that that hon. gentleman has made a very serious charge against this House with regard to the payment of witnesses and payment for services in connection with that committee; his statement is that we refused to pay the witnesses on the side of the committee, while we allowed the same character of witness fees to be paid to Mr. Eldridge and his friends. I happen to know that this statement is altogether inaccurate. A strong statement was made to the House by the hon. gentleman with regard to our treatment of Mr. Coster. I remember that in the first instance he was paid a certain amount which had been considered as reasonable. An appeal was made to the House that the amount was not sufficient, and I remember moving in the House to appoint a committee to deal with it. The committee consisted of the hon. gentleman from De Salaberry and I think the hon. gentleman from Calgary, one or two other gentlemen and myself; we went into the matter very carefully, and we allowed what we considered was a very liberal remuneration for Mr. Coster. I may say further that the hon. gentleman from Rothesay expressed to me afterwards the opinion that Mr. Coster would be very well satisfied indeed, and he caused a telegram to be sent to him announcing the rate of remuneration to be allowed, and stated that he would be very well pleased indeed with our treatment of him in that regard. I deem it right to make this statement because an accusation has been made against the House as a whole with regard to that matter. I confess, although I must say that I do not exactly like the form of the motion made by my hon. friend from Wellington, that I do not know that it is going to do any harm. We should have a breeze of this kind, because there is sometimes a feeling among members of this House that legal men and their firms are appearing perhaps a little too much with legislation in the interest of corporations in this House. I have seen members of the House of Commons appear in support of or against measures in the Senate. I cannot say that I have any such complaint to make of any member of this House, but it has repeatedly come within my knowledge that members of the House of Commons have been appearing before Senate committees supporting private Bills, and I thought it should be put a stop to. The legislation of last year will pretty effectually deal with it. It is unfortunate that my hon. friend did not word his resolution in a more careful manner, so that no possible insinuation could be interpreted from it against any member of the House. Perhaps no harm can be done by ventilating the matter so that in future legal gentlemen of this House and the firms they represent will have a better understanding with regard to the feeling that prevails on this subject.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Will the hon. gentleman please state to the House wherein my statement was inaccurate?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The hon. gentleman stated that we had refused to pay the expenses of Mr. Patterson.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Which was a fact.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Which was inaccurate. We paid Mr. Patterson a reasonable witness fee, but the contention was set up on his behalf that he should be paid a larger amount as an expert, which we had no right to pay.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I should like—

Some hon. MEMBERS—Order.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I rise to a question of privilege.

Hon. Mr. POWER—What is it?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—My statement is challenged.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is not privilege.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I state that Mr. Patterson was not paid, and the hon. gentleman says that statement is inaccurate.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Order.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The order is to have a straight statement of facts. Either I am wrong or I am right. If I am wrong he is right, but I contend the documents and facts prove that I am right. Mr. Patterson has never been paid, and he is still writing for his money. Mr. Coster has not been paid and wants his money notwithstanding the statement we have from another party that Mr. Coster was satisfied. Those are the facts, and the hon. gentleman from Wellington has received letters from Mr. Patterson asking for payment of his bill. He received a paltry sum.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The hon. gentleman says he was not paid anything.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I did not say that he received nothing. The hon. gentleman from Marshfield had no right to make the remark before the House that my statement was not accurate. My statement was fully founded on facts, and as far as the statement of the hon. gentleman from Halifax is concerned, I can pass that over. All my rulings in the committee were maintained.

The SPEAKER—I call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that he has exhausted his right of reply.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—My decisions were all sustained by the House.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I have already stated to the House that I had no intention whatever of offering any insult or making any insinuation regarding the integrity or honour of any member of this House or of the Commons. I may possibly have framed my resolution in language that is susceptible of improvement. I regret that it is so. I thought when I put in the words 'if any' that I covered every imputation of any kind. Now in the first place, if you charge me with casting any aspersion upon members of this House and members of the other House, what will you impute to the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the country when he, in his official capacity, as Minister of Justice, introduces a Bill in the Commons covering this particular point, prohibiting interference of senators or members of parliament who are lawyers from appearing before committees on behalf of their clients? It has been prohibited, and is not now allowed. Will you say that Mr. Fitzpatrick, in introducing that law, is casting a reflection, a slur and an imputation on every lawyer in the Commons and in the Senate? You may just as well charge the Minister of Justice with that as charge me, because I submit a resolution to the House to ascertain if any irregularity did occur.

Now, with regard to this matter, it is well known that at the time of that investigation there were whisperings around the corridors of this House that a number of lawyers were taking a very active part in opposing it. I do not know, nor I would not for a moment attempt to insinuate, that they were doing it from any other cause than a feeling perhaps in their own heart that it was their duty to do it. I will admit that that may have been the case, and I am satisfied that the returns which I have asked for, when produced, will establish the facts. I earnestly hope that every man in this House and in the Commons will get a clean certificate, and it will appear that no wrong-doing has occurred. I have been amused at remarks which have dropped from some of the lawyers in this House. I was amazed, for instance, at the remark that dropped from my hon. friend from De Salaberry. He condemned the resolution. He criticised it severely, and before he took his seat he turned around and said, 'I am going to vote for it.' I cannot understand a man adopting a course of that kind. It is amazing that an hon. gentleman would place himself in such an awkward position as that. I am not a lawyer, and I would feel ashamed to place myself before the House in such a position as to criticise a resolution, and then say, 'notwithstanding it all I am going to vote for it.'

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Will my hon. friend be good enough to inform the Chamber how he proposes to enforce this resolution?

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I am not high up in parliamentary procedure, or in the methods by which such things are enforced. I do not know whether it can be enforced at all or not. My impression is that if the company do not comply with the demand of parliament that parliament could refuse to continue their charter. I may be mistaken, but I have been informed that they could do so. Surely the company is under the control of parliament in some shape or form. It certainly ought to be. If not, of course we cannot enforce it.

The motion was agreed to.

TELEGRAPHIC COMMUNICATION WITH PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to ask my daily question of the hon. Secretary of State, whether he has any information as to the progress made in the erection of the Marconi tower on Prince Edward Island?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have every reason to believe the work is progressing with all despatch, but I have had no opportunity of seeing any gentleman who would know anything about it. On Wednesday the House meets at two o'clock; so that there is no meeting of the cabinet on that day.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—To-morrow, perhaps, the hon. gentleman will have the information. Two hundred thousand people are deprived of telegraphic communication because of the stoppage of the service.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Are they not availing themselves of the means of communication to be had on the steamers?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—No, there is no communication.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (12) An Act to incorporate the Malone and Hopkins Point Railway Company—(Hon. Mr. Cloran.)

Bill (41) An Act respecting the Manitoba and Northwestern Railway Company of Canada—(Hon. Mr. Douglas.)

Bill (42) An Act to incorporate the Eastern Townships Railway Company—(Hon. Mr. Mitchell.)

Bill (43) An Act respecting the Dominion Central Railway Company—(Hon. Mr. Frost.)

Bill (44) An Act respecting the Canada Atlantic Railway Company—(Hon. Mr. Kerr.)

Bill (47) An Act respecting the London and St. Clair Railway Company—(Hon. Mr. Coffey.)

THE JORDAN-ERIE POWER COMPANY BILL.

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being called:

Second reading (Bill N) An Act to amalgamate the Jordan Light, Heat and Power Company and the Erie and Ontario Development Company, Limited, into one corporation under the name of 'The Jordan-Erie Power Company.'

Hon. Mr. POWER—In the absence of the hon. gentleman from Lincoln (Mr. Gibson) I move that this Order of the Day be discharged and placed on the Orders of the Day for to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—This Bill is printed in French. I do not know why we are not proceeding with it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—We are not proceeding with it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I do not see why.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—The hon. gentleman who has charge of the Bill is not present, and we want an explanation of this measure and I think the hon. gentleman from Halifax is perfectly right in moving the postponement of the second reading.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have never known that courtesy to be refused. I am not moving the second reading, I am asking that the order for the second reading be discharged, and that the Bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Quite right.

The motion was agreed to.

SECOND READING.

Bill (14) An Act respecting the Georgian Bay and Sea-board Railway Company—(Hon. Mr. McMullen.)

The Senate adjourned until three o'clock to-morrow.

THE SENATE.

OTTAWA, Thursday, January 31, 1907.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

A QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I rise for the purpose of raising a question of privilege. Yesterday a statement was made by an hon. gentleman in this House which, if true, reflected—in any case it reflected—upon the honour and dignity of this House. The statement was that this honourable House had refused to pay the witnesses that were subpœnaed and examined before the committee appointed to investigate the affairs of the Mutual Reserve Life Association two years ago; that while witnesses that were called in the interests of the Mutual Reserve Association were paid, they refused to pay those that were summoned on the other side. I have in my hand a list prepared by the accountant of the House, of all the witnesses of whom we have any record, that were examined before the committee and the amounts paid to each of them. The list reads as follows:

Mr. Bradshaw, actuary from Toronto, $42.50.
J. T. Patterson, $240.
J. D. Wells, $280.
E. Pendleton, $97.
Geo. D. Eldridge, $155.60.
J. M. Stevenson, $55.
R. B. Cameron, $32.80.
D. E. Cameron, $32.80.

And the counsel employed by the committee to present the case against the Mutual Reserve Life Association was paid $1,833.60.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I did not catch the import of the statement of the hon. member from Marshfield. Does he mean to say his statement is correct as made yesterday afternoon, or that my statement is not correct? His words were smothered in the noise.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My observations which led to the reading of these figures were, that the hon. gentleman had, yesterday, made a statement in this House that the House had refused to pay the expenses of some witnesses that were called in the interests of the committees against the Mutual Reserve Life Association, while we had paid a large amount to Mr. Eldridge, a witness called on the other side, and now I have submitted these figures.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—In reply, I beg to state that the figures given by the hon. gentleman from Marshfield were never seen by me, and do not contradict my statement that the principal witness and the attorney for that committee, engaged by order of the committee and sanctioned by the House are not yet paid. Payment has been refused There is $1,200 due to Mr. Coster, sanctioned by this committee and ordered by the House in the first instance. Mr. Patterson's fees are not paid, and why? Why is it the hon. gentleman rises on the floor of this House to give to the country a statement that these gentlemen have been paid, is more than I can understand. The facts are there, that neither Mr. Patterson nor Mr. Coster has been fully paid. They have been partly paid, but part of Mr. Coster's bill is not yet settled and none of Mr. Patterson's fees have been paid. So my statement stands.

THE MAGYARS CASE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY inquired :

What were the facts that induced the government to commute the sentence of one Magyars to imprisonment for life in the province of Saskatchewan after he had been convicted on the charge of wilful murder and sentenced to be hanged ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The facts that influence the prerogative of mercy are never made public. They are submitted on a recommendation from the Minister of Justice to the Privy Council and again submitted to His Excellency the Governor General. In England they are submitted to the Home Secretary and are not there either given to the public. The question was asked in the other House, and several gentlemen spoke on the subject. I may briefly quote the opinion of the Minister of Justice on the subject, although it arose on another case, but the opinion then expressed applies directly to the case submitted by the hon. gentleman to the House. I am quoting now from page 5183 of Vol. 3, 'Hansard' of 1906. Mr. Aylesworth said :

His Excellency the Governor General of May 22, 1906, approved a recommendation that the prisoner Brothier be released from further custody. Brothier was released accordingly, on May 29, 1906, having been sentenced on March 15, 1904, to imprisonment for five years and two years. In Great Britain, for the last sixty or seventy years, the administration of the prerogative of mercy has devolved upon the Secretary of State for the Home Department, who is considered as being directly and exclusively responsible for the same. In Canada His Excellency the Governor General is, by his instructions under the Royal Sign Manual, authorized and empowered, as he shall see occasion, when any crime or offence against the laws of the Dominion has been committed, to grant to any offender, convicted of any such crime or offence, a pardon, upon receiving, in capital cases, the advice in that behalf of the Privy Council for Canada and in other cases, the advice of one of his ministers. In cases other than capital cases, such advice has been in practice that of the Minister of Justice. In the present instance, the recommendation for the prisoner's release, was made by the Minister of Justice. In the view of His Excellency's advisers, it would be, as a general principle, unusual ; and inconvenient to lay before parliament the grounds on which that discretion proceeds which dictates leniency or severity on the part of the responsible adviser of the Crown ; the course of general practice in the past has been in accordance with this principle, and it is considered that in the present case, no special reason exists for departing from the general rule.

This was not a capital offence, but, as Mr. Aylesworth explained, in capital cases it comes before the Privy Council, and it is on the recommendation of the Privy Council to His Excellency that the commutation is granted.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I am somewhat disappointed with the answer, because this is a case of more than ordinary importance. The people of the Northwest are law-abiding, and believe in enforcing the laws of the country. In this case the criminal had a fair trial by a jury of his countrymen, before a good judge who endorsed the verdict of the jury and complimented them on the correctness of their verdict. The case was appealed to the full court at Regina, and they also endorsed the verdict. It was subsequently appealed to the government here, and they have seen fit to commute the sentence. It was a most aggravated case of murder. There was no cause for the man committing the crime. He was a labourer, and committed the crime on the most trifling offence. After a fair trial, he was sentenced to be hanged. I regret to say that the commutation of the sentence is a reflection on the government. In the Northwest there is strong feeling in the matter. Although I do not live within 150 miles of the place where the offence was committed, I have been written and spoken to by several people there who condemn the decision of the government in unmeasured terms. The feeling in that country in the minds of a large number is that the commutation was granted for political purposes.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Shame, Shame ! No truth in it ! False !

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I say that is the statement that has been made to me.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière)—Name ?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The remarks of the hon. gentleman from Wolseley show more clearly than anything that I can say the extreme inexpediency, to say the least of it, of reviewing such proceedings as those he has now requested an explanation of. I may also say, if there is one thing more than another on which the government of any country will exercise care and feel bound to act under a sense of the greatest responsibility, it is a question of either carrying out a sentence, or respiting a man condemned for capital crime.

I can tell the hon. gentleman, and I can tell the House and the public of Canada, and I speak from long experience in several governments, that no capital case ever comes before the Privy Council—and I am quite sure that the same was the case with our predecessors—which does not receive very careful consideration, more particularly from the Minister of Justice for the time being. But every hon. gentlemen will see that there may be matters submitted to the council which cannot, with any degree of propriety, be made public, but which nevertheless would influence their judgment considerably. I may also add, that it is well known—and therefore I may allude to it—that in no case where capital punishment is involved does the government act without communication with the judge who tried the case. I must say that I cannot conceive that any good purpose, particularly where the sentence has been commuted, can possibly be served in reviewing a decision arrived at by the Privy Council under a sense of their responsibility in either House of parliament.

CONTRACTS FOR SECTIONS OF THE NATIONAL TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON inquired of the government :

1. What portions, stated in sections and miles, of the eastern division of the National Transcontinental Railway have been placed under contract by the government up to the present time ?

2. What is the nature of the work embraced in the contract or contracts referred to ; are they for grading only, or does any of them include tracklaying or ballasting, or all three operations ?

3. What will be the cost per mile of grading, tracklaying and ballasting, stated separately or all three operations combined, on each section of the said eastern division embraced in the aforementioned contracts ?

4. What is the maximum grade of the sections of the said railway embraced in the contract referred to ?

And will at the same time ask similar questions regarding contracts let by the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company on the western division of the said National Transcontinental Railway.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The answer to question No. 1 is : Number one section of a hundred and fifty miles from the north abutment of Quebec bridge westerly, and a section of 244 miles from a point near Winnipeg easterly to the junction with the Thunder Bay branch of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway near Prince Albert crossing.

The answer to the second question is : grading, track laying, and ballasting.

The answer to the third question is : the estimated cost of grading, track laying and ballasting of the Quebec section is $39,492 per mile and for the 244 miles from Winnipeg easterly, $53,552 per mile.

The answer to the fourth question is : the maximum grade adverse to east bound traffic on both of those sections is ·4 per hundred feet, and adverse to west bound traffic ·6 per hundred feet.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Then in the latter part of the question I desire similar information regarding contracts let by the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway on the western division of the said National Transcontinental Railway ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We would not have that in the department. At all events it has not been sent to me.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The government will have it, because they have to approve of the contracts. My hon. friend has not it before him ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—We shall let it stand.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not know that we will have it. We would approve the plan, but we would have no control over anything more.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Yes, the government have to guarantee bonds of this road, and it must be approved of by them.

The SPEAKER—Then the question may stand.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The parts that are answered need not stand. It is only the last question.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The whole question had better stand.

LEGISLATION REGARDING LIFE INSURANCE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL inquired of the government :

When will the report of the Insurance Commission be laid before parliament, and whether it is the intention of the government to deal with the subject of life insurance by legislation during the present session ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The government have not yet received the report of the commission, and, at this period of the session, I doubt whether it will be possible to have any legislation based on it. The report has not been received and, therefore, has not been considered so far. It is expected in a short time. It has been expected from time to time, and I cannot speak positively on the subject.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—My reason for asking the question was, I saw it indicated in a telegram from Ottawa that there was not likely to be any legislation on the question this session. I think it is singularly unfortunate that such is the case, because as long as legislation dealing with the subject is delayed, as I presume the government intends to deal with it. It keeps the companies in a state, I may say, of disquietude. They scarcely know what to do, and people who are thinking of insurance are waiting to see what the legislation will be, and look forward to more restrictive legislation in regard to insurance companies. That is my only reason for asking the question. I think the government realizes the state the different companies are in at the present moment.

PAYMENT OF SESSIONAL INDEMNITY AND TRAVELLING EXPENSES TO SENATORS.

MOTION.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved :

That the clerk of the Senate be requested to lay upon the table, copies of all correspondence had between him as clerk of the Senate, and the Department of the Auditor General, and that of the Department of Justice, relating to the payment of sessional indemnity and travelling expenses to senators.

He said : This is a question which has created a great deal of discussion, and the opinions which exist upon the question are so varied, that I deem it well to look into the subject carefully and to consider the provisions of the Act under which these indemnities are paid. I have put my views in writing in order that I may be better able to explain to the House the reasons why I have placed this motion upon the Order paper.

I make no apology for having given notice of this motion ; at the same time I wish it distinctly understood that it is not made for the purpose of casting reflection upon any member of this Chamber or of the House of Commons, but solely for the purpose of bringing under the notice of the Senate the involved and unfair provision of the Act now upon the statute-book providing for payment of sessional indemnities to members of the Senate and to members of the House of Commons, and to call attention to what I consider an injustice which may result in regard to the attendance of members, not only in this Chamber, but also in the other branch of the legislature.

It will be remembered that when the amended Indemnity Act was before parliament last session, I called attention to its involved provisions, and pointed out its unintelligible character, which would lead to difficulties in interpreting it, and that it would not have the effect intended by the government or by parliament. The Commons, however, in its wisdom or jealousy of its powers, rejected some amendments made to the Bill by the Senate, which, if accepted, would have removed some of the anomalies which disfigured the Bill. This Bill is further evidence of the inconvenience and impropriety of rushing measures through this House a few hours before prorogation.

It will be remembered that the Bill was submitted to parliament a few hours before prorogation, and it was impossible for any member to analyse it properly and compare it with the Act which was then upon the statute-book, so as to enable him to arrive at a correct conclusion as to its real meaning. Let us analyse its provisions, and what do we find ?

Under the Act respecting the Senate and House of Commons, passed in 1905, increasing the sessional allowance to members to $2,500, it provided that a member would not be entitled to said allowance for less than 31 days' attendance ; meaning by that, it was supposed, 31 days actual attendance in his seat ; because a provision in the old law, which allowed certain days of adjournment to be counted as days of attendance, for the purpose of entitling a member to the full indemnity, was, in the amended Act, repealed. During the last session, however, under the plea that a clause in the old Act had inadvertently been omitted, which excused a sick member, under certain conditions, from the penalty imposed for non-attendance on sitting days, the Act of 1901 was amended so as to revive that clause ; but, in doing so, the provision above referred to, which allowed the days of adjournment to be reckoned as days of attendance for the purpose of making up the 31 days required to entitle a member to the full indemnity, was tacked on to the clause, thereby reviving it, but in a more far-reaching manner than it did in the old law, or was ever intended. In the old law, only the days of adjournment which occurred after a member had made his first appearance in the House, could be reckoned as days of attendance, whereas under the present law, as amended last year, all days of adjournment are allowed to be reckoned as days of attendance for the purpose of the indemnity, irrespective of the day a senator first attended a session of the House. Let me give you an example : A member at the opening of a session may be present for an hour or so, during which his duties would consist chiefly in admiring the comely and smartly gowned members of our fair sex, and perhaps escorting one of them, at the conclusion of that function, to the refreshment room of one of our hospitable Speakers. He might then depart and spend the balance of the time during which the session would last, attending to his own business, or in travelling through Europe or some foreign country. On his return he could claim the full indemnity of $2,500 less $15 per day for every day (except 15), on which he was absent when the House sat, and get paid for the same. To better illustrate what I mean, I will take the session of 1906, as it affected this House. That session opened on the 8th of March and ended on the 15th of July following, lasting therefore 128 days. During that time there were 67 actual sitting days and 61 days of adjournment. Now let us suppose that a member attended, as I have before pointed out, the day of the opening and then absented himself during the balance of the session. Under the present law, as interpreted by the Minister of Justice, those 61 days of adjournment would more than make up the 30 days required by that member to complete, with his one day's attendance at the opening, the 31 days attendance required to entitle him to the full indemnity of $2,500. But, as the House sat on 66 days which he was not present, $15 a day, for those absent days must be deducted, less the fifteen days of grace allowed by law to which he is entitled ; therefore, if 15 days grace be deducted from 66 days absence it will leave 51 days, which, multiplied by $15 amount to $765. Deducting the $765 from the $2,500 indemnity leaves $1,735 which that member would receive for his one day's attendance at the opening of the session. It is needless to add that the same rule would apply in the case of a member attending the House only on the day of prorogation, or on any other one day during the session.

The interpretation I have given to the Act, and the deductions to be drawn therefrom, will, I am convinced, be sustained by the correspondence between the clerk of the Senate and the Auditor General and the Minister of Justice upon this subject. Again, the interpretation given to the provision of the Act providing for the payment of a per diem allowance or actual travelling expenses, to a member when attending parliament, is equally unjust and unfair. The Auditor General and Minister of Justice have laid down the arbitrary principle that a senator claiming the per diem allowance of $15 a day for the time which it takes him to reach Ottawa, must live 400 miles in a direct line from the seat of government, not—bear in mind—the distance he may have to travel or the time it may take the senator to reach Ottawa. Let me give you two or three instances. Windsor to Ottawa, 474 miles. Sarnia to Ottawa, 425 miles. Not within the radius.

Let me give you one or two illustrations of how this works. You put one point of your compass upon Ottawa, and take a radius of 400 miles from the seat of government; you find that Windsor is beyond the radius and a senator coming from Windsor would be entitled to the $15 per diem. But Sarnia is within the radius, and though it takes a senator living at Sarnia as long to reach Ottawa as if he lived at Windsor, he can only get his actual expenses. The one would get $20, while the other would get $60. There are other cases stronger than that. Take the case of a senator living at Edmundston, N.B., and the case of an hon. gentleman living at Rimouski. It is further from Edmunston to Ottawa than from Rimouski to Ottawa as people have to travel, but Rimouski is outside of the radius, while Edmundston, by taking a straight line as the crow flies is within it, and yet the senator from Edmundston would have to travel further and be put to a great deal more expense than the senator who lives at Rimouski, and the senator who lives at Rimouski would receive $15 per diem, while the senator living at Edmundston would get actual expenses only. My hon. friend who lives at Andover, N.B., furnishes a still stronger case. He has to travel over 600 miles to reach Ottawa, but he comes within the radius of 400 miles, and is deprived therefore of the allowance which is given to men who have not to travel so far, but who happen to live beyond the radius. The government and the House surely never intended this to be the case; but by the arbitrary rule laid down by the Auditor General and the Minister of Justice, all senators who happen to live within the radius of 400 miles are deprived of the advantages given to others. Let me ask my hon. friend the Secretary of State whether he thinks a statute of that kind should be permitted to remain on the statute-book. It is unfair and unjust. I am not saying that $15 should be paid to everybody, or what should be paid. All I desire to see is that the law should be so amended as to place every member of parliament on an equal footing. My own opinion is that the actual travelling expenses should be allowed, and that no distinction should be drawn between one class of members and another. It may be argued that people living in the far west, or beyond the Rocky Mountains are put to a much greater expense than those living near the capital. That is quite true, but if provision is made that each member is to be paid his actual expenses, then if a member happened to be snowbound in the Rocky mountains, his expenses could be legitimately paid. I have given some little attention to this question, and I hope the government will place the different Acts in relation to this matter on the statute-books in the hands of an expert of the department and make the law so clear that the clerk of the Senate shall not meet the difficulties that have presented themselves to him in the past in deciding what should be paid to any member. I may mention two further illustrations. The clerk paid two of the members $15 a day each, taking the common-sense view of the law, but when he ascertained where they lived and found that they were within the radius, he had to ask them to refund the amount over-paid. One gentleman has unfortunately passed away since he received the payment. I do not think any one who would read the Act casually would say that the clerk did not take the ordinary common-sense view that should be taken of it, and not the arbitrary one entertained by the Minister of Justice and the Auditor General.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman from Belleville deserves the thanks of the House for having brought this matter up. It has been up on various occasions before, and has not been in a satisfactory condition for a good many years. It will be remembered that, a couple of years ago, the administration did undertake to deal with this matter, and that, as the law stood at the beginning of last session, every member, in order to draw the sessional indemnity, had to put in 30 or 31 days of actual attendance. I think the general feeling was that that was a proper thing; and hon. gentlemen will probably remember what a full attendance there was in the Senate during the early portion of last session. Unfortunately, in the Act as it stood last year, there was no provision for the case of a senator or a member of the other House who was at the capital but prevented by illness from attending the sittings of the House. It was felt that it was a very unfair thing that any member who had come to attend parliament and was prevented by illness from attending, should have the days of his absence through illness deducted. There had been a provision that time lost through illness should count, in the previous Act, but it was omitted by over-sight when the law was being amended. I rise partly for the purpose of explaining how this unfortunate change took place in the law. The government introduced, through the Minister of Justice, last session, a Bill for the purpose of meeting the case of members who were ill at the seat of government. When that Bill was in committee in the House of Commons three or four words were, I will not say surreptitiously, but very quietly inserted in the government measure, and were not noticed when the Bill came to this House. It came to us late in the session, and senators had only the Bill as it was introduced by the government and were not aware of the change which had been made in committee in the other House. This particular clause of the Bill as introduced by the minister in the other House contained this proviso :—

> Provided that each day during the session on which the member is in the place where the session is held but is by reason of his illness unable to attend such sitting as aforesaid, shall be reckoned as a day's attendance at such session.

Then these words were inserted after the word provided :—

> On which there has been no sitting of such House in consequence of its having adjourned over such day.

So that very slight change made an immense difference in the effect of the Act. I take it for granted, as the attention of the government has been called to the fact that the object of their legislation of last year has been defeated by the insertion of these few words, that they will during the present session introduce legislation to cure that defect. It is a monstrous thing—and this thing has actually happened that a gentleman who does not attend until perhaps three or four days before the close of the session, should be able to draw something like $2,000 for two or three days' attendance. Hon. gentlemen know there is at the present time a great deal said and written about 'graft,' and the public are very keen now to suspect public men of doing things that are not perfectly straight and right in connection with public funds. You can hardly imagine anything which would appeal more to that sentiment of the public than the fact that hon. members of this House and of the other House were taking $2,000 for two or three days attendance.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think there can be but one opinion with regard to the first and major part of the question that has been raised by the hon. gentleman from Belleville, and further commented on by the hon. member from Halifax—that is with reference to the amendment made in the Act of last year by the insertion of those few words which so completely change the meaning and scope of the Indemnity Act. There can be no question, the Act should be put back, with regard to those 30 days attendance, to where it was in order to bring about better attendance. But I do not agree with my hon. friend with regard to the other part of his remarks which has reference to the question whether members should be paid the actual expenses incurred by them in travelling, or whether they should, as is the case in this Act, be allowed a per diem allowance for the time spent in travelling. The hon. member from Belleville says the object of the law ought to be to put every member of this House in the same position. Unfortunately, that is something which no law that we could pass would do. Hon. gentlemen who live within 100 or 200 miles of the seat of government are in a very different position from those who live a long distance from the capital, such as the hon. gentlemen from British Columbia who are 2,000 miles west of Ottawa, and those who come from the maritime provinces 1,200 miles east of the capital. It is impossible, by any law, to put them on the same footing, and more particularly in the position in which we find them placed now when, by managing the adjournments at the weeks end, gentlemen living in the vicinity of Ottawa are able to devote two days of every week to their own business at home, while those from more distant provinces have to remain at the capital. While the law should preserve a reasonable equality between those two classes of members, we ought all to be ready to admit that those living at a distance should be treated in a different way from those living nearer the capital. The hon. member from Belleville seems to think that that will be effected by allowing all the members their actual travelling expenses ; but hon. gentlemen will see that that makes no allowance for the time consumed. Under the most favourable circumstances, a member from British Columbia would lose ten days coming to Ottawa and returning to his home, and the chances are that owing to difficulties in travelling, which are liable to occur, he might lose many more days. It does seem but right that where parliament cannot make up the disadvantage to a man living at a distance arising from severance from his business, which is not experienced by those who live near the capital, we should at least in our Indemnity Act make provision which would in the case of long delay in travelling, recompense, to some extent, those living at a distance, for their time and thus put them to that extent on an equality with those who live near the capital. For my part, I think the per diem allowance would be fair if it were properly applied. Members living at Ottawa would be entitled to nothing. Those living near the capital would be entitled to one day. It would be a simple matter if the per diem allowance were to apply to all, irrespective of distance. It would be reasonable and fair, much more reasonable and fair than the payment of expenses incurred.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—I have no idea of contributing materially to this debate. I feel the same sense of gratitude, which all of us appear to feel, to the hon. gentleman who introduced the subject. It is only another evidence of the activity of that hon. gentleman's intellect. Age cannot wither nor custom stale the brightness of the hon. gentleman's intellect, nor the benefits he confers when dealing with any important subject. In view of the great labour he has had, I think it would be a good thing if we knew the views of the government on this subject, and whether there would be some fruit following the discussion.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Carried.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before the motion is carried, I think the least the government can do is to say that the matter is of sufficient importance to warrant them in calling the attention of their colleagues to it. If we had the power to regulate these matters, we could easily place all members on the same footing. The matter is of grave importance, and one of those things that should be set at rest at a very early day. It has created already, and will create in the future, just such a feeling as that which has been indicated by the hon. member from Halifax, a wrong impression as to the position occupied by members of parliament, merely bringing this before the House without any information from the government of how they view it as well. I think it is not treating the House with that courtesy to which it is entitled.

I am not going to follow the hon. gentleman from Marshfield in the opinions he has expressed in reference to each member of the Senate being placed upon an equal footing. If a member living at a distance accepts the honourable position of senator he does not, I presume—at least I should hope not—accept it with any anticipation of the per diem allowance from the time he leaves home until he gets here. Under our system, the payment, if I may so term it, is considered as an indemnity for the time lost in the services that members render to the country. In other portions of the British empire it is different. In Australia, members are paid so much a month, like any other hired men, and if you put this House in that same position, we shall pay members from the time they leave their homes until they reach here ; but I take it for granted there is scarcely a member of this House that desires to place himself in that position. If those who live near the city of Ottawa can go home occasionally, it is not at the expense of the government. They pay their own expenses themselves, and if a member living within a day's journey of Ottawa goes away on Saturday, and comes back on Monday, he pays the expenses of his trip. The gentleman who is obliged to remain here and who cannot go home on account of the distance, pays his board bill and whatever expenses he is put to here. So that in that respect we stand in about the same position. The only difference is that the one lives a greater distance from the capital than the other. I do think the sooner this question of paying senators and paying members of the House of Commons is put upon a basis that will prevent this constant irritation, and references which are made to the payment of members of parliament who are very anxious to get here, and spend a great deal of money to accomplish it. With the exception of Nova Scotia, I have not heard of any difficulty in finding people in any province who are not quite ready on all occasions to accept a seat in the Senate. We have had one illustration in Nova Scotia, where a gentleman refused to accept the appointment, and, judging from the fact that the government are not able to fill the vacancies that have occurred, it is presumed that the people there are too independent or do not consider the position of sufficient importance, or the honour sufficiently great to induce them to accept. Whether that be the fact or not, I do not know ; but if this matter is not speedily dealt with, and dealt with in an intelligent manner, so as to prevent, I do not hesitate to say, the scandal which exists and is published to the world almost every day in the press—if it is not dealt with by the government, some other members of parliament should take it up.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have not seen the correspondence, and my attention has not been called to it, and I am quite unable to pass any opinion upon it. But in reference to the larger question, the government, although technically responsible, are really not responsible. This Bill was framed at the suggestion of 290 members of the two Houses of parliament, and the diverse views held in regard to it, made it altogether impossible for any gentleman to draft an intelligent measure.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Oh, Oh.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—My hon. friend says 'Oh ! Oh !' There are two hon. gentlemen within a few feet of each other who differ on a material point. It is all very well for one gentleman to speak from his standpoint and judgment, but another gentlemen takes an entirely different view of it. The government endeavoured, during the last two sessions, to meet the views of the Senate and House of Commons in this matter. They seem to have failed in doing so, because the matter is constantly dragged before the public. I think that is the unfortunate part of it. It would be better, if there were any discrepancies, to take what is offered and say nothing about it. If any change should be made, I would suggest that a sworn statement should be filed of the travelling expenses of every member. That is the only way to settle this matter. When it was proposed to adopt that course, there was a very determined opposition to it. They said, no, it is not fair that a man should be called upon to make a note of what he paid the porter, 25 cents here or 50 cents there ; that it would be very unreasonable to expect him to keep a notebook of his expenses, and then they said 'make it a fixed sum—ten or fifteen dollars, or whatever is agreed upon.' That was determined. It is absurd to say that a man coming from Montreal to Ottawa should receive fifteen dollars for his travelling expenses. It would be shocking to think of it, or to say that a member should receive fifteen dollars for coming from Smith's Falls.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I never advocated anything of the kind.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That would be the effect of it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Not at all.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The only way would be, if the House is not satisfied—and this is only one branch and probably I should not precipitate my own view—that a sworn statement should be rendered by every gentleman who expects his expenses to be paid.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—My hon. friend must know that is the law now. If you make a statement of your expenses, you must swear to it before you are paid.

Hon. Mr. COX—While this matter of indemnity is the subject of general discussion, I should like to offer a suggestion to the government. I think it would be a good thing to do as financial institutions or boards of directors do, where a certain amount is allowed for the total indemnity or annual fees and let that be divided into so much per diem to those who do attend. Then each person would be paid just for the number of days he attended, and those who were regular in their attendance, as are my hon. friends to my right and left, and my hon. friend opposite, would be paid the moneys which otherwise would go to members like myself who are not able to attend regularly. I think that would be quite equitable and fair to those who are able to devote from session to session a large proportion of their time to their duties here. Many of us are not able to do that, no matter whether we get five hundred dollars, or five dollars, or five cents. I am not able to do it. I could not be here at times, no matter how much I desired to be present, or how much I was getting for it. The suggestion I make would be fair and equitable, and would prevent all this trouble and criticism. I know that I have been criticised, and very properly criticised, for irregular attendance. It is not a question with me how much I get. The amount I receive has no influence upon me as to whether I come or go. I come whenever I can. If the demands upon my time continue to be such that I cannot attend more regularly in the future than I have in the past, I shall resign my position rather than come here irregularly and receive the allowance. I do not know anything about how the amount I receive is made up. The clerk sends me a statement which I subscribe to at the end of the session, and I get whatever he sends me a cheque for. I put in no claims for travelling expenses or anything else. The clerk makes up the bill and gives me a cheque for the amount. I have found it impossible to attend regularly, and that is the reason I am taking up the time of the House with these remarks. I attend as regularly as I can, and I feel it would be a great advantage to myself and other gentlemen who are similarly situated if my suggestion were adopted. I am sure that we do not want to receive money that should fairly go to those who attend regularly, while we are not able to do so.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—The injustice of the suggestion of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken appears to me to be this : that there are a great many like the hon. gentleman from Marshfield who cannot go home during adjournments, while these other gentlemen can go home. We have to stay here. My hon. friend from Toronto and others in the same position, would divide the money of the other gentlemen who attended during the session but did not remain here all the time. That would be hardly fair. I am utterly indifferent as to what plan is adopted, except that I think there should be some fairness about it. Take a man from British Columbia. The House adjourns for some weeks and he goes home. He occupies many days in coming and going. You can hardly apply the same rule in such a case as is applied to the member who remains here. When my hon. friend was making his calculation it reminded me somewhat of a rhyme in the old books:

> When first the marriage knot was tied,
> Between my wife and me ;
> Her age did mine as far exceed
> As three times three does three. &c.

I am not going to argue it out, but the unfairness of it comes upon gentlemen who are compelled to go home at great expense in money and time and men who can go to their homes without loss of time or inconvenience. Then with regard to the suggestion of the hon. gentleman from Halifax : because one or two men can do something, that does not prove 85 members are doing it. What is conveyed to the country by the observations made by the hon. gentleman from Halifax, and, perhaps to some extent by the hon. gentleman from Belleville, is that a great wrong has been done by some persons simply because they can do it. I do not think that is exactly fair. I think that what the hon. Secretary of State says is about right, that it is a very difficult matter to settle to the satisfaction of every person. There has always been a complaint, and I very much fear there will always be complaints, and it will be impossible to get an absolutely just and equitable system.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is no attempt on my part to show that any senator took advantage of it. He simply took what he was entitled to under the law without asking any questions.

Hon. Mr. COX—The objection raised by the gentleman to my suggestion can easily be remedied by saying that those in attendance at the capital for the purpose of attending, and those who remain here, are entitled to receive the indemnity. There are a great many members who come a long distance who cannot return to their homes during an adjournment, and while they are at the capital for the purpose of attending the House, whether the House is in session or not, they should be paid for that time just as much as when they sit in the House.

The motion was agreed to.

LAND GRANT TO RAILWAY TO THE HUDSON BAY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON inquired :

How many acres of the land in Manitoba or Saskatchewan or Alberta authorized by statute to be applied in aid of a railway from a point on the Canadian Pacific Railway to the Hudson bay has been earned, and by what railway company, and if the lands still required for the completion of the railway to Hudson bay have been withheld from homesteading or any other disposition of the same ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The answer to the first question is :

1. There has been so earned 1,382,528 acres of land.

2. By the Canadian Northern Railway Company as the legal successor of the Winnipeg and Hudson Bay Railway and Steamship Company to which was allotted by order in council of the 11th May, 1885, the land subsidy authorized by section 7 of chapter 25 of the statutes of 1884.

For convenience sake, I refer to the statute of 1884 in amendment to the Dominion Lands Act, in which this clause appears :—

The Governor in Council is hereby authorized, in aid of the construction of a railway from some point on the Canadian Pacific Railway to Hudson bay to make a free grant of not more than 6,400 acres for each mile of railway within Manitoba and not more than 12,800 for each mile with the Northwest Territories.

The answer to the third is as follows :—

3. The Canadian Northern Railway Company has now in process of construction a further portion of the railway on account of which the said land subsidy was so allotted, which portion is to extend from Etoimami to the pass on the Saskatchewan, an estimated distance of eighty-six miles ; and upon the completion thereof the said company will be entitled to a land subsidy of upwards of one million acres, to be selected from the odd-numbered sections in the tract reserved for the purpose of such selection by an order in council of the 5th March, 1895.

4. There is not now any reservation of land for a subsidy in aid of the construction of the railway from the Saskatchewan to the bay.

Answer number four must be qualified by the statute I read. Whoever drew up the papers was not aware of the Act of 1884, apparently, because the Act of 1884 has never been repealed. It was for a railway, not defining the railway, any railway that would be constructed from a certain point in Manitoba to Hudson bay.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Do I understand the answer to be, that from the banks of Saskatchewan river to a point on Hudson bay, there is no reserve of land in terms of the Act of 1884 ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, I read the statute.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I know the statute. Does it follow that there is no land reserved—that there is no land available for that purpose ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I suppose there is land along the line. There is scarcely any land taken up there.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Along the line of the railway as it will be built ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is not really surveyed there.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—This land was not required to be in the fertile belt.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, it was not defined. There was a discussion in the House in respect to it, and some years ago an allotment was made of certain land in Saskatchewan, that out of any lands that were not taken up by a particular railway—I am not quite sure which railway it was—if there was an excess that that excess would be the grant for which the Hudson's Bay Railway then building up through the province of Manitoba and, I think, for about twenty miles outside of that province, might take for that section ; but beyond that there has been no further reservation, beyond the 1,382,528 acres. That is all that is so far reserved.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Can my hon. friend say whether or not there was a limited time fixed for the construction of the road ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, I read the clause. The clause seemed really to escape notice.

Perhaps my hon. friend knew of it, but I think very few people were aware of it. I unearthed it a few years ago. It escaped attention, because it was not in a place where you would expect to find it. In the year 1884, an Act was passed to amend the Dominion Lands Act. That was not the place to look for a subsidy to a railway.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I had a great search to find it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Act deals with the internal administration of the Department of the Interior, and it is clause 7 of that Act. That is still the law.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That is still the law.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is still the law; as far as I know that has never been repealed. I looked for the Land Act in the new revise and I was not able to find it.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It has not been repealed.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Not that I am aware of.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Is the Act not purely discretionary, that is giving discretion to the Governor in Council to make a land grant?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, no, in making grants you never use the word 'shall.' Where you use the words 'The Governor in Council may' do so and so, it is the feeling of parliament that it ought to be done if the conditions attending it are faithfully carried out.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (40) An Act respecting the Indian River Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Roy.)

WILLIAM A. DAMEN PATENTS BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved the third reading of Bill (8) An Act respecting certain patents of William A. Damen.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I move in amendment:

That the said Bill be not now read the third time, but that it be amended by inserting in clause 2, after the word 'Act,' in line 29, the following words: 'made substantial and bona fide preparations to manufacture or' and by inserting after the word 'may' in the 30th line the words 'manufacture and.'

This is a private Bill introduced for the extension of the duration of the letters patent which were issued in 1892. In that year there was legislation passed amending or consolidating the different Patent Acts. Prior to that legislation, the duration of the period of the patents was fifteen years. After that legislation the period was extended to eighteen years. The patents now may last eighteen years. The Bill now before us relates to two patents and asks for their extension so far as time is concerned. The first of these two patents was issued in 1892, prior to the consolidation of the Patents Act, and was for a period of fifteen years. In the consolidation of the Patents Acts it appears that a special clause was inserted, clause nine, if I remember well, which provided that the new consolidated law applied only to patents which would be issued after the Consolidation Act, and would not apply to the patents prior to that consolidation; so that the fifteen years' provision relates only to the patents prior to the consolidation. The parties in the case here had patents prior to the Consolidation Act. By this Bill they ask to have the fifteen years extended to eighteen, and in the second case they demand that the fault of their agent in not renewing the second patent in due time at the expiration of the first period be remedied by this new legislation, so that in fact they want their two patents to have that duration of eighteen years. The first patent will expire next month, and parties in Montreal knowing that fact, and knowing that there is a special clause in the Consolidated Statutes excluding such patents from being extended to eighteen years, have commenced works in Montreal, acquiring land and the necessary plant for the purpose of manufacturing these tires. They claim that inasmuch as this Bill asks for an extension of time, which is by law not allowed to the first patent, that they have a right to be protected in so far as they have commenced to make preparations to manufacture. In my amendment I ask that provision be made that any parties who had made substantial and bona fide preparations to manufacture, should be put in the same position as those who really have completed preparations to commence work when the patent expires, because to all intents and purposes that patent should expire next month. They ask to be protected, because they have acquired the land and made preparations to begin the manufacture. They claim further that the second patent issued to the same company should not be extended, for the simple reason that the second patent is no good, the government having no authority to give two patents for the same invention. At the outset, this second patent was the property of another party and a lawsuit was commenced at the time beween the two patentees just on that ground, that a second patent could not be issued to another party for the same invention; but a combination of the two interests took place. The proprietor of the first patent became the owner of the second, so there was no object in continuing the two patents and the second was allowed to lapse. For two sessions they took no steps to renew that patent. Now they come and ask for a renewal. If the second patent is no good, under the ruling of the government, I do not see why we should by this legislation grant the extension asked for. The committee has decided that the first patent should be extended three years longer, and that the second patent should be renewed; but in justice to those who have been acting in good faith in preparing to manufacture this tire, my amendment should be accepted, as it provides that the acquired rights should be protected.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Inasmuch as this Bill stands in my name, and as my hon. friend from Stadacona has made a long explanation of the facts the House will have no difficulty in concluding, to say the least of it, that the facts are involved. Permit me to say in the first place, that the report of the committee on this Bill is apparently conclusive. There is no dissenting report. I might further say that when the matter came before the Private Bills Committee, there was a full presentation of both sides of the case. The opponents of the Bill were represented by able counsel as well as the promoters of the Bill. The government was represented by the Deputy Minister of Agriculture, who was present, and who apparently concurred in the action of the committee. I hesitate to occupy the time of the House in dealing with so many dates and facts, but I shall not delay the House more than is absolutely necessary to review some facts which have arisen in connection with this Bill. On the 9th July, 1892, the Patent Act was amended. Previous to that, a protection of fifteen years was given to each patent. We have two patents involved in this Bill. For convenience sake we will call them No. 1 and No. 2. If hon. gentlemen will keep that point in view, namely, the 9th of July, 1892, when the Patent Act was amended extending the time for patents from fifteen to eighteen years, it will prove convenient. On the 15th of February, 1892, patent No. 1 was obtained and, under the law, would have a protection of fifteen years. The amending Act of July, 1892, extending patents for eighteen years, did not protect patents granted before the passage of the Act. On the 11th October, 1892, patent No. 2 was issued. Now patent No. 1 had a protection of fifteen years, and patent No. 2 issued the same year had a protection of eighteen years. After the issue of patent No. 2, it was discovered by the Department of Agriculture that there was a conflict between the two patents. Patent No. 2 should not have been issued by the department. Consequently the patent having issued, the department remained passive, and the parties fought it out in the courts and three years were occupied in litigation in determining whether patent No. 2 was an infringement on patent No. 1. To terminate this litigation, the American Dunlop Tire Company purchased both patents, and thus the two patents became merged in a common title. Therefore what conflict existed up to that time was settled.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Were they for the same designs?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—They were practically for the same designs. The American Dunlop Tire Company proceeded to manufacture the tire and continued to do so for about seven years. Then the Canadian Dunlop Company acquired the two patents, the tire being manufactured by the one company. I might say that the Patent Act provided that the fees should be payable every six years. Now keep this in view: No. 1 patent is still alive and does not expire until the 14th of February next, but as to patent No. 2, there was a payment of $20 due the department in October, 1904. The company instructed its agent in Ottawa to pay that fee. Through an oversight, the agent of the company did not pay it, and it was not until a year afterwards, namely October, 1905, that the Canada Dunlop Tire Company ascertained that the fee had not been paid on that patent, and they consequently took steps at once to ask parliament to revive the patent.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—In 1906.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—They discovered it in 1905 and in 1906 took steps to revive the patent. The position is this: No. 1 patent has until the 14th of February to run before it expires. Consequently, we are quite within our right in asking parliament to extend the time of that patent for three years. That, you will recollect, is the fifteen years patent. Parliament, since the passage of the Act of 1892, has extended every patent from that time downward. The policy of parliament has been well settled as to the extension of patents issued previous to 1892—that is an extension of three years to each patent, so as to place them all on an equality with patents issued subsequent to July 9, 1902. Therefore, so far as patent No. 1 is concerned, we are entitled under the well settled policy of parliament which has been consistently observed since 1892, to an extension of three years for that patent. That should make it quite clear, and remove beyond any doubt as to the rights of the petitioners to have this patent extended for three years. Now the question arises as to patent No. 2. Owing to the company not being aware of the non-payment of that fee, they ask that parliament should revive their patent. This has been done, I might say, in no less than four cases on previous occasions. I am told there has never been a case yet presented to parliament where there has been an application for a revival of a patent on the ground of non-payment of fees, in which parliament has not granted the relief sought by the petitioner. There is no good reason whatever why the relief in this particular case should not be granted. The question arises as to the intervening rights which may have accrued. My hon. friend says that the Canada Rubber Company, now represented by what one might term the Canada Rubber Trust, a merger of all the rubber companies of Canada, claim to have expended considerable money in making preparations to manufacture this particular invention. Permit me to say in answer to that, that the Canada Dunlop Tire Company on purchasing those two patents from the American Dunlop Company entered into a contract with the Canada Rubber Company some seven years ago to manufacture those tires, so that the Canada Rubber Company who now claim to have made certain expenditures in anticipation of the expiring of the patents, were the contractors for the Canada Dunlop Tire Company in the manufacture of the article. They were familiar with the patents; were familiar with any possible infirmity in the patents; were familiar with the dates of expiration, and it is not going beyond the fact to say that the Canada Rubber Company now seek to take advantage of the expiry of patent No. 2, they being the contractors for the Canada Dunlop Tire Company. As to the expenditure which they allege to have made, the committee, I think, have no doubt that no expenditure was specially made for the manufacture of this tire in anticipation of the expiration of the patent. When they first entered into this contract, they had all the machinery necessary for the manufacture of the article. Consequently, they own that equipment to-day, an equipment which they provided at their own expense when no question arose as to the life of the patent, and it will be that same equipment they would bring into operation to-day to continue practically the manufacture of the same tire they were manufacturing for the company.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Having made a profit for seven years out of it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—In 1905 the Canada Dunlop Tire Company considered it in their own interest to terminate that contract and manufacture their own tire, which they have been doing, employing a great many hands and having invested a great deal of capital in the manufacture of this particular tire. The only other item which the Canada Rubber Company pointed out to the committee as having expended in anticipation of making this tire was some $60,000 paid for real estate in Montreal, but upon being asked if that were specially expended for the purpose of making this particular tire, they, of course, could not answer in the affirmative. The fact was that the Canada Rubber Company was probably the most active company in the merger which has taken place between all the rubber companies in Canada. They found it necessary to extend their business owing to an expanding trade. They bought real estate with a view to adding to their plant. Consequently there was no evidence whatever before the committee that there was any expenditure exclusively made for the manufacture of this special tire. Now, what would be the effect of a refusal to grant this Bill? One effect would be that the American Rubber Trust would be able to manufacture under their patent in the United States. I did not mention this fact, but the American Rubber Trust purchased the American rights from the Canadian patentees for the manufacture of the same tire in the United States. They, therefore, would have a right to manufacture that tire in the United States and ship it to Canada, while the Canada Dunlop Tire Company, the present owners of the patent, could not possibly be permitted to manufacture that tire in Canada and export it to the United States. What would be the effect of my hon. friend's amendment? It would be simply to nullify the Bill. My hon. friend might as well ask for a six months' hoist of the Bill. He surely could not have considered its effect on the Bill. The proposed amendment would in express language give to the Canada Rubber Trust a positive right before the expiration of patent No. 1 to manufacture a device or invention which is protected by law until the 14th of February next at least. Certainly parliament would not do that. My hon. friend might have limited his amendment to patent No. 2, but his amendment would cover both patents, one of which has not yet expired.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It will expire in a few days.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The Canada Rubber Company certainly would not be justified in anticipating the expiry of this patent, because it has been the well understood policy of parliament to extend all those patents to eighteen years; therefore following the well-established precedent they could not anticipate the expiry of patent No. 1 until three years from the 14th of February next. As to patent No. 2, that is also a matter in the discretion of parliament, and parliament had always without exception exercised its discretion in favour of the petitioners by granting a revival of every patent, whenever applied for, which has lapsed on account of the non-payment of fees. Under these circumstances, I have no hesitation in asking the House to consent to the third reading of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. KERR—Notice of this application was given in the month of October immediately on discovery that the patent had expired. Notice having been given at that time, it was not until the latter part of October or the month of November that the property was acquired or the expenditure made by the Canada Rubber Company which it is stated was intended for the purpose of carrying on this business. So that after the notice had been given, with full knowledge of the notice published by the present applicants that they would apply for this legislation, they themselves in possession of the patterns of the applicant, under which they have been manufacturing for them for years, the Canada Rubber Company chose then to make an expenditure. It was frankly admitted by the counsel present at the investigation that he could not say what the property was going to be used for, irrespective of this work altogether. So that it was taking advantage of the purchase which was made in the general interest of the company and setting it up as having been acquired for the purpose of carrying on this work.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I am astonished that a lawyer so able as my hon. friend should report what passed in the committee. The hon. gentleman is quite out of order in doing so.

Hon. Mr. KERR—My hon. friend should have taken exception at the time, and I could have stated it in another way.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman has no right to state indirectly what he should not state directly. My hon. friend, the mover of the Bill, misunderstood the position taken by the Deputy Minister of Agriculture in this case. He did not say that he favoured this Bill. He said the policy of the government was to stay out of any discussion of the kind. They neither favour nor oppose a Bill of this kind, leaving it altogether to parliament to decide. Now as to precedents, it is very easy to say that the policy of the government has always been to extend these patents; but I think such an extension has been granted only in certain urgent cases and for very strong reasons, and in the present case, no sufficient reason has been given why this patent should be extended three years longer. I do not know why the parties should have thought that parliament would extend the time, in view of the provision in the law which says in positive terms that this law shall not apply to patents issued under the fifteen years' Act, excluding, by that provision, from the effect of the new legislation all patents issued prior to July, 1892. I think the Canada Rubber Company has a claim for protection. They do not ask that the Bill be rejected but they ask that it be amended to protect their rights.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Was this amendment offered in committee?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Does the hon. gentleman wish to lay a trap? If he was in the committee he should know.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I am asking it for the information of the hon. members of the House who are not members of that particular committee.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman might give that information himself and not ask me to violate the rules in the same way for which I had to reproach my hon. friend from Toronto. Besides the purchasing of the land at a cost which my hon. friend says amounted to $60,000, the Canada Rubber Company had other expenses. I have here a memo. signed by two directors of the Canada Rubber Company of Montreal showing an expenditure of $8,300 for materials used, machinery, pulleys and other fittings purchased for the temporary premises in the present factory for the purposes of this work. With these few explanations, I hope that the House will understand that I am not asking that the Bill be rejected, but only that it be amended to do justice.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I desire to add but very few words to what has been said in regard to this Bill and the amendment moved by the hon. gentleman. There are two patents involved in this Bill, as stated by the hon. gentleman from Calgary. One patent had a life of fifteen years; that has been referred to as patent No. 1. The fifteen years will expire next month, so that this patent is in force now. The Bill as regards that patent asks that the term be extended from fifteen to eighteen years. As regards the other patent which was issued subsequently to the Act of 1892, but in the same year, it was given a life of eighteen years, and that patent has expired because the owner neglected to pay a renewal fee of $20. It is claimed that it was by mistake the fee was not paid, and that it was some time after that the mistake was discovered. They had instructed their attorney in Ottawa to make the payment and it was not made. The year after, to wit, in 1905, the omission was found out, and in 1906 they gave the notice in the month of October that they would present the present Bill.

But let us deal with patent No. 2. As regards that patent, the Bill, as far as I can see, is of no importance whatever, because it was held by the Exchequer Court of Canada that this second patent was not legally issued; that it covers the same things as was covered by the first patent, and therefore it would not serve the company any real purpose to be permitted to pay this fee of twenty dollars, especially if they get the relief which they seek to obtain in regard to the first patent, and it is quite indifferent as far as this parliament is concerned, if parliament is inclined to grant the relief as to patent No. 1. The only effect is that the government will receive twenty dollars more than they would otherwise get. So that the question really arises as to patent No. 1. To my mind it is a simple matter, as to whether it is proper under the circumstances which were placed before parliament and the committee to extend the patent which was issued with a life of fifteen years to a life of eighteen years. For my part I think it is advisable to do so, and for these reasons, first because this parliament—I do not say the government, but the parliament—in 1892 changed the policy and decided that in the future patentees would be protected, not merely for fifteen years, but for a period of eighteen years, and of course the law was passed only for the future, as is generally the case. It was not to have any retroactive effect, but the principle was adopted that patentees would be protected for a term of eighteen years instead of fifteen years, as had been the policy in the past, and it was left open to any patentee who held rights under the fifteen year term to apply to parliament and ask that his patent be given the benefit of the new principle which was adopted. Since 1892 a number of cases have been presented before parliament and almost invariably—I would not be warranted in saying in every case—the application was entertained. Therefore the application is presented under favourable circumstances. If we go into the merits of the case, we find that although the patentee was to have fifteen years benefit of his intention, through a mistake in the department in issuing the patent No. 2, his right was interfered with to this extent, that litigation ensued, and that for more than three years he was unable to use his invention and to derive any benefit from it. Ultimately the court decided, I think as far back as 1899, that patent No. 2 was of no value, covered the same ground as patent No. 1, and, therefore, the patentee under patent No. 1 was able to derive benefit from his invention. It seems to me that he has a very strong case to ask now that he be compensated for the three years that he has lost through an error in the department in issuing this second patent, and for my part I am disposed to accept that as being a good reason. Then comes the question of the expenses which are claimed to have been made by the Canada Rubber Company. On the faith of what ? Not on the faith of the expiry of the patent, but in contemplation of the expiry of the patent, because it has not expired and will not expire for fifteen days more. Therefore the company was aware, when they incurred those expenses, of the course which had been adopted by this parliament, and they took the risk that an application might be made, and in fact they have had notice from October last that an application would be made for the extension of the term from fifteen to eighteen years. It was a fair risk for them to take, very likely, but if they had made a strong case as far as these expenses were concerned, and if the patentee or the applicant for this Bill had not made a strong case as far as being entitled to relief, it is not the amendment which is now offered by the hon. gentleman from Stadacona which should be adopted by this House to my mind ; it would not be an amendment affecting the whole principle of the Bill, but an amendment which would grant relief to the extent of the damage or the expense which had been incurred exclusively for that purpose. But the amendment proposed by the hon. gentleman goes far beyond that, and, as far as I am concerned, having given special attention to the case, I must say that I was not impressed that any serious expense had been incurred exclusively for the purpose by the Canada Rubber Company, and that it would be but fair to extend that first patent for a term of three years more.

The amendment was declared lost.

The Bill was then read a third time and passed.

PETROLEUM BOUNTY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (G) An Act to amend the Petroleum Bounty Act, 1904.

(In the Committee).

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I might mention to my hon. friends opposite that the intention of this Bill is to enable the government to allot to the farmers and lessors of certain oil wells, the bounty of that proportion of oil which they have reserved by way of rent. That was the intention originally, and it has been carried out in a great majority of cases by the companies without any dispute; but in certain cases, I am advised that some companies dispute the meaning of the Act and have declined to allow the bounty to go to the lessor where he has reserved a proportion of oil. This will have nothing to do with such cases as those in which a fixed money rent has been reserved. It is intended to affect the cases of parties who reserve one-sixth or one-eighth, or whatever the proportion might be, of the oil as their rental. The equity of the case appeared to me and to the government to be quite clear, but it was desirable that there should be a confirmation of our view by Act of parliament. We do not propose to make it retroactive or to interfere with what has been done under the construction placed upon the Act by some parties. That they must settle for themselves.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I am at a loss to understand what general principle is being applied to the payment of this bounty. The bounty invariably is paid to the producers. Now, the producers, according to the statement made by my right hon. friend, will not be recognized as being entitled to the bounty, but in all probability the farmer, owner of the land, and this difficulty may further occur: let us assume for a moment a lessee desiring to lease certain lands with the intention of boring for oil. He enters into a lease for the absolute fruits of the lease. It seems to me that no question could arise from this point, that he would stipulate with the farmer or the owner of the land that any bounty should be paid to him, or in the event of its not being paid to him, that it should be credited on the rent. It seems to me to be involved in such a way as not to insure that the farmer or the owner of the land will obtain the bounty.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I will point out to my hon. friend the actual state of the case. He is aware that this bounty is practically given in substitution for the tax which had heretofore been levied on the oil.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What tax?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The tax that was formerly levied on oil coming into this country. He will observe that a man who had leased his land, reserving a certain portion of oil under the old system, when the tax was being levied he received a very considerable additional value. When the tax was removed he lost that. It is intended that the bounty should compensate the refiner and the producer alike, and where the lessor had, as I say, reserved his rent in the shape of oil, he would lose that unless he received his proportion of the bounty. The practice in those regions is for one company to lease a very large number of small wells from the farmers on whose property they are situated, and, as a rule, they reserve their rent in the shape of so much oil, usually one-eighth part. The majority of the companies have, without hesitation, accepted the provision which I now propose to make law in the regulations; that is to say, having accounted to the lessor not merely for the amount of oil produced, but for the bounty on it; I want to make the practice uniform. One or two cases only, I think, have occurred in which companies have declined to do that, but there is no doubt that the intention of the legislature was that the lessor should not be put in any worse position by the removal of the tax and the substitution of the bounty than he was before.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Take for instance the case of subsequent lessees—of lessees after the passing of this Act—entering into a lease, would they not——

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—It is not retroactive, but any one who chooses, so to speak, to contract himself out of the benefit of this Act is at perfect liberty to do so. I do not propose to interfere with that

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That would be the result of it. The lessee would at once suggest to the lessor to contract himself out of the bounty.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I am not dealing with that. I am dealing with the case where the lessors contract for a certain fixed percentage of the oil. Those are the cases we are desiring to reach.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Would the result not be to give an advantage to the producer, not to the farmer, because the producer would certainly covet the bounty?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—To whom does the hon. gentleman refer as a producer?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The man who leases the land.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Well, he would not have that advantage, unless the farmer with his eyes open chose to give it to him.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It puts the producer in a better position than he formerly was.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—No, the lessor. The position was this:

there are a comparatively small number of new wells being discovered, although some are being discovered from time to time. In all those cases where they had reserved a money rent the question does not arise, because those people would not be in any shape or way affected by the alteration of the law; but in the case of those persons who had given leases—the leases are usually for a pretty long period, very often perpetual, or at any rate until the well is exhausted—where a man had got a lease, before we abolished the tax, reserving a certain percentage of oil, the well in itself fell in value by the abolition of the tax, and to compensate the lessors and producers for the reduced value, the bounty was granted. It was the intention of the legislature at the time that it should be evenly divided between the parties, the lessor receiving, the bounty on the percentage of oil which he reserved and the lessee receiving it on the remainder. As a matter of fact, as I mentioned, the greater majority of the lessees accepted that construction without any comment or quibbling on their part. It seemed to them equitable, and they gave the farmers or lessors the benefit of it; but a very considerable doubt arose on the construction of the Act, although there was no doubt at all as to the intention of the government on the matter. I propose to remedy that by taking power to make the regulations to meet that particular case. The matter was, of course, suggested to the Department of Justice, and they submitted this particular form which I accept as the best way of dealing with it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—When the hon. gentleman speaks of the tax, he does not mean the Inland Revenue tax?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I mean the Customs tax.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I frankly confess I could not follow the hon. gentleman very well, not being able to hear him. If a person who intends working a well or sinking a well makes a bargain with the owner of the land to give as a rent one per cent, one gallon out of a hundred, has the practice in the past been to grant to the person who leases the land the bounty upon the hundred gallons? The proposition now is, if I understand it, to pay the bounty on the one gallon to the farmer instead of to the person who leases it.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—That is the point, but as I mentioned to my hon. friend, it is quite open to the lessee to make any bargain he pleases, and to reserve to himself the bounty if he chooses.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—But where no bargain has been made, and he leases from the farmer on a rental of one gallon, we will say to every ten, then a person who works a well or leases a property, would receive a bounty upon the nine gallons and the other party on the one gallon.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is not an increased bounty but only a redistribution of it.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—A distribution of it, that is all. I do not propose—my hon. friend knows that I could not propose—to increase the bounty. That would be utterly outside of my power.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The order in council when drafted would differentiate between the different classes of lessors ?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Yes. What we propose to do is simply to validate the custom which has prevailed with the great majority of producers. I am informed by my officers that almost all of the lessees have conceded the principle of paying the bounty to the lessor, but that a very small fraction of them dispute it on the ground of the wording of the Act, and I propose to take power to amend the Act and remove the doubt.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I only desire to ask the Secretary of State how it is possible that he can reconcile the declaration he made a few moments ago with respect to the indemnity matter, with the preparation of this Bill, because if there is a diversity of opinion, then, according to the hon. gentleman's theory, it is impossible to place an Act upon the statute-book. There are differences of opinion in regard to this question, and why should the principle not apply to this matter as well as to the question of the indemnity ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not think the argument would apply at all. There is very little diversity of opinion here. A law was passed which gave the owner of the soil, or intended to give to him a proportion of a bounty which parliament voted for the production of oil. The ordinary practice, as I am informed, is that the farmer gets one-eighth, and on that one-eighth he claims he is entitled to one-eighth of the bounty and he receives that under this Bill.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am not disputing that.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The hon. gentleman from Belleville wants the hon. Secretary of State to reconcile his Bill with his statement regarding the Indemnity Act.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—The object has been fully explained. Prior to the bounty going into effect, the farmer made a lease with the producer, the farmer getting say one barrel for every eight barrels the other man received. The farmers only desire fair usage at the hands of the producer, and they are entitled to that. The producer now gets all of the bounty in some cases. Some companies, however, will grant a division of the bounty to the farmer. What we want to do—and the object of the amendment which the hon. minister has very ably prepared—is to provide that the farmers shall stand on an equality with the producers. That is only fair. If the government passed an Act granting the bounty only to the producer and thereby did an injury to the farmer, it is only right and proper that the government should come to the rescue of the honest farmer and let him have his share.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is carrying out a principle that has been very severely condemned by my hon. friend opposite. You take off the tax which is paid by the consumer under the Customs Act, and you take the money out of the pockets of those who do not consume it, in the way of a bounty, to compensate the producer. That is all. No one has been opposing it, and there was no necessity for the hon. gentleman's defence of the measure. What I desired was really to understand it, and I congratulate those representing the government here, on their conversion to a principle which they condemned in the strongest language they could use while in opposition, that is to the principle of bounties instead of a direct tax.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—Would the hon. gentleman condemn the payment of bounties?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I said that the government are now acting on a principle which they condemned when we affirmed it.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—I want to know what the hon. gentleman himself thinks?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is a principle which was laid down by the Conservative government and which the hon. gentlemen opposite at that time condemned in the strongest possible language. I am only complimenting them on their conversion to principles advocated by the Conservative party and which they condemned at that time.

Hon. Mr. ROY, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

JORDAN-ERIE POWER COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. POWER (in the absence of Hon. Mr. Gibson) moved :

Second reading Bill (N) An Act to amalgamate the Jordan Light, Heat and Power Company and the Erie and Ontario Development Company, Limited, into one corporation under the name of 'The Jordan-Erie Power Company.'

He said : One of those companies is incorporated by a statute of Canada, the other by letters patent issued by the Secretary of State's Department, and the two companies propose to unite into one. There is no addition to the powers of the company; and the details of the Bill can be considered by the Committee on Railways.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (O) An Act to incorporate the United Baptists Women Missionary Union of the Maritime Provinces.—(Hon. Mr. Baird.)

TELEGRAPHIC COMMUNICATION WITH PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Before the House adjourns, I wish to ask my hon. friend whether he has any information as to communication between Prince Edward Island and the mainland by telegraph, or if a report has been received by the government on the subject.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Under the agreement made with the Marconi Wireless Company, in erecting new stations, the company have a month in which to consider whether they will build the station or not, so the government have no alternative. I may say, however, the company have made a contract now with the government to erect a station within the shortest possible time. Material has been brought from Glace Bay, C.B., and I am credibly informed that by the end of next week it will be in operation. Under the terms of the agreement there will be no charge whatever between Bear Point and Pictou, and even the messages will be telephoned from Bear Point to the station at Murray harbour. The government had at first under the contract with the Anglo-American Company communicated with them, but it involved a correspondence, and I suggested to the minister that he should drop them altogether and wholly irrespective of the contract with the Anglo-American, make this contract with the Marconi Company.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It will be ready by next week?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think by Saturday of next week.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at Three o'clock.

McPHERSON DIVORCE CASE.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY moved :

That Rules 24a, 112 and 138, be suspended, and that Arthur Leon McPherson be permitted to present a petition, praying for a Bill of divorce from his wife, Annie Booth, notwithstanding the time for presenting petitions for divorce Bills has expired.

The motion was agreed to on a division.

WESTERN DIVISION OF NATIONAL TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY AND GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC.

INQUIRY POSTPONED.

The notice of motion being called :

By Hon. Mr. FERGUSON :

1. What portions, stated in sections and miles, of the eastern division of the National Transcontinental Railway have been placed under contract by the government up to the present time.
2. What is the nature of the work embraced in the contract or contracts referred to ; are they for grading only, or does any of them include tracklaying or ballasting, or all three operations.
3. What will be the cost per mile of grading, tracklaying and ballasting, stated separately or all three operations combined, on each section of the said eastern division embraced in the aforementioned contracts.
4. What is the maximum grade of the sections of the said railway embraced in the contract referred to ?

And will at the same time ask similar questions regarding contracts let by the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company on the western division of the said National Transcontinental Railway.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Is my hon. friend ready to answer these questions that relate to the Western Division?

Hon. Mr SCOTT—The answer I got from the Department of Railways is what I expected, that they have no information on the subject of the Grand Trunk Pacific. They can only obtain it by communicating with the Grand Trunk Pacific Company.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The government have to guarantee the bonds of the Grand Trunk Pacific for a large amount, and surely parliament has a right to know the details of the contracts let by the company.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The department told me that they could obtain the information but it would take some days to get it. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will let the inquiry stand until next week.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I have no objection to letting it stand.

The order was postponed until Thursday next.

THIRD READING.

Bill (G) An Act to amend the Petroleum Bounty Act, 1904.—(Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.)

MALONE AND HOPKINS POINT RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being called :

Second reading Bill (12) An Act to incorporate the Malone and Hopkins Point Railway Company.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I see that the Bill is not printed in French and I therefore move that the order be discharged and that it be fixed for Wednesday next.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I would call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that the Bill has not been reported. In many cases parties interested in these Bills have not furnished the Standing Orders Committee with the necessary copies of notices, maps &c., and so long as these documents are not furnished we cannot report favourably on the petitions, so it would be well for parties interested in those Bills to lose no time in complying with the rules of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

NORTHERN CANADA INQUIRY COMMITTEE.

FIRST REPORT ADOPTED.

Hon. Mr. WATSON (in the absence of Hon. Mr. Davis) moved concurrence in :

The first report to inquire and report from time to time as to the value of that part of the Dominion lying north of the Saskatchewan watershed, east of the Rocky mountains and west of the Hudson's bay ; comprising the north parts of the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan and the Mackenzie territory, its extent of navigable waters, rivers, lakes and sea coast.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Wednesday next at Three p.m.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON.

INSPECTION OF ELECTRICITY BILL.

FIRST READING.

Bill (P) An Act respecting the Inspection of Electricity.

The Bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved that the Bill be read a second time on Friday next. He said: The Bill is drafted on the same principle as the Gas Inspection Act, providing for an inspection wherever electricity is used, and seeing that the meters are in proper condition.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is that the same Bill that was introduced in the lower House ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am not aware that it was introduced in the House of Commons. It was given to me by the Minister of Inland Revenue. It may have been introduced there ; if so, of course I shall drop it.

The motion was agreed to.

QUEBEC CUSTOM HOUSE APPOINTMENTS.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY moved :

That an order of this House do issue for the production of a statement indicating in so many distinct columns :—

1. The names, christian names, age and nationality, of all persons who have been appointed to any position in the customs house at Quebec since the 1st of July, 1896 ?

2. The names of the persons who were replaced by those new appointments, specifying at the same time whether the persons so replaced were replaced by reason of their death, their retirement, or their dismissal, and by whom they have been replaced.

3. The names of the persons who recommended each of these new appointments.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is no objection to the order going, as far as the first and second paragraphs are concerned, but the minister will, no doubt, object to bringing down the names of persons who recommended the new appointments.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—We do not know that.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Well, I think he will.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—We know who it is.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Whatever can be brought down will be brought down, according to the usual practice.

The motion was agreed to.

NAVIGABILITY OF HUDSON BAY.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON moved :

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excelleney may be pleased to lay on the table of this House, copies of all reports and communications in possession of the government not already submitted to parliament, regarding the navigation of the Hudson bay and the resources and climate of the territory contiguous thereto, also copies of all grants of fishing, mining and lumbering rights, given at any time, by the government, in the said bay and territory; also copies of all reports of surveys received by the government from either engineers, surveyors or geologists, on the feasibility of railway routes, connecting any existing or prospective railway with any port on Hudson bay or James bay ; also a statement of grants of land or money which have been proposed or asked for, in aid of such railways. Also, copies of all reports received by the government in relation to the establishment of lights or other aids to navigation of Hudson bay and Hudson straits, and also a statement showing what action, if any, has been taken by the government regarding the establishment of such aids to navigation.

He said : The subject which I propose to bring before the House is a motion for an address calling for the production of papers that have not already been brought down bearing on the navigation of Hudson bay, the resources of that region, and the opening of communication by rail from the older parts of Canada to Hudson bay.

This matter was before parliament very frequently many years ago; between 1878 and 1894 it was very fully and ably discussed in this House. In the earlier session the discussion was led by a gentleman with whom I had not the pleasure of being acquainted, the late Senator Ryan of Montreal. In the succeeding year 1880 it was brought bofore this House by our late lamented colleague, Senator Boulton, Manitoba, and in 1894 by another lamented colleague of ours, the Hon. Dr. Ferguson of Niagara, and, as I have said, on all these occasions the subject was very fully and ably discussed. During these discussions, it was quite apparent at the time, and perusal of the Senate Debates is quite sufficient to confirm that opinion, that a good deal of discredit was thrown upon the Hudson bay route, in the interest of the St. Lawrence navigation and of other interests in Canada. It was perhaps not unwise that a good deal of deliberation should have been had over this important question, more particularly as, up to that time, and indeed for years afterwards, Canada was grappling with very great transportation problems which were not altogether beyond the problematic stage, and it was but right and reasonable that those problems should be solved and carried through to successful completion before the country would pledge itself to new enterprises such as the Hudson bay route. The time now however has, apparently, come when this question must be earnestly grappled with. Considerable progress has already been made, without any great attention being called to it, towards extending existing railways to the Hudson bay, and the importance of our northern country has become more and more in evidence every year as they roll by. The wonderful position which the Hudson bay, or as it has been more aptly called, the Great Canadian Sea, occupies on the map of America cannot fail to impress every person who gives the slightest attention to the topography of our country. There we have a great lake fully one-half the size of the Mediterranean, situated in the centre of this continent, with a harbour, an ocean harbour let me say, situated 250 miles further west in the continent than St. Louis and St. Paul, and this harbour after having its position in the west stated, has the additional advantage of being as near to Liverpool as the port of Montreal. In addition to that, this great inland Canadian sea has over 2,000 miles of sea coast in what may be described as a reasonably temperate climate. I exclude from that classification a great deal of the north of the bay itself on both sides, and all the waters that flow into it from the north. Its position is such that the lands immediately south of Hudson Bay are in the same latitude as Devonshire, England, and this port of Churchill, on the west side of Hudson bay, is in the latitude of the Bay of Nairn in the north of Scotland. Then we come to deal with the question of temperatures—I am only passing over these very briefly because most hon. gentlemen know as much about this as it is possible for me to know—we have a good deal of authority on that subject. I have in my hand some statements by Mr. Henry O'Sullivan, a surveyor in the employ of the Quebec government, who says after coming down from the Eastmain on a very arduous trip of exploration :

The ordinary half-breeds are more easily coaxed to eat than to swim any day. No matter how often you propose lunch, they are always ready, but it is not so often you get them to strip and wash themselves. This day, however, I succeeded in getting them all to take a plunge and we enjoyed it immensely.

The water was in excellent condition, reminding one of Old Orchard Beach or Chester bay. I have never found the water as warm in any part of the Gulf of St. Lawrence or in Baie des Chaleurs as we found it on the Eastmain coast in the end of August and beginning of September, and I have no doubt that if easy communication could be had by rail, the most northern limit of our province would prove an attractive scene for tourists and health-seekers. While waiting for the sun to come round to the noon marks, we saw a number of whale sporting themselves and blowing off their vapour, while closer to shore countless porpoises or white whales, as the Hudson Bay Company folk call them, were playing around.

I have other evidence. I have the evidence of Dr. Robt. Bell, and I am just mentioning this at the start in order to settle in our minds some questions with regard to temperature, because there has been a popular belief that the whole of the Hudson bay region was almost Arctic in its character, and that the weather even in the summer season was cold. Against that we have the evidence of Mr. Henry O'Sullivan which I have just quoted. Mr. Bell says :

I took the temperature of the sea upwards of twenty times during our voyage, which extended over the greater part of July, August and September and found it to average 53 degrees Fahrenheit. I also noted the temperature of the rivers which we visited, and found that of the average of five of them to be 61 degrees Fahrenheit. We bathed in the salt water almost daily and found the temperature agreeable.

He winds up by saying:

The average temperature of the air between the 11th of July and the 21st of September, from the above observations, would appear to be 62½ degrees, which is very nearly the mean temperature of the rivers, with the average for July and August would be 65½ degrees. As most of these observations were taken in the morning or the evening, and as the nights were generally warm owing to the prevalence of southerly winds, this is perhaps not far from the true mean temperature for these two months, and it is only ¾ degrees above the average of the mean temperature, for these months, of ten principal stations from Halifax, Nova Scotia, to Fort Simpson on the McKenzie river.

I just make these two out of the vast number of similar quotations I could make to indicate the summer temperature of what you might call the southern half of Hudson bay. I think that that would be about the correct line to draw; perhaps two-thirds of the bay in the south might be included in this classification with regard to summer temperature. Now we come to deal with the opening and closing of the harbours.

The temperatures that I have read bear on that question, the opening and closing of navigation within the bay itself, within the southern or larger portion of Hudson bay and the whole of James bay, and then we have the other question to deal with, that is, the opening of navigation in the Hudson strait and of communication with the Atlantic ocean.

Mr. Low, describing Churchill harbour, says:

The approach to the Harbour of Churchill, if aided by a few beacons and lights, would be comparatively safe, as the channel of approach is fairly deep and wide. Once inside the points of the mouth, the harbour extends up stream about a mile, and has an average of half a mile, with a couple of shallow places in the upper part that might easily be removed by dredging; the general depth of the harbour being from four to four and a half fathoms.

I did not intend to read that extract till later; however it has an important bearing upon the advantages of Churchill, which I will be enabled to explain as I proceed. I have here a table which Mr. Tyrrell, one of our most expert and successful northerly explorers, prepared with reference to the opening and closing of Churchill harbour.

This table extends from the year 1824 to the year 1894, a period of seventy years ; it gives the date of the opening and closing of Churchill harbour for all these years, taken from the records of the Hudson bay officials, and it is found that the average day of opening is June 19th and the average day of closing was November 19th, and that the average period of open navigation is five months. Dr. Robert Bell gives his testimony with regard to other points in the bay somewhat south of Churchill. He says :

I have a record of the principal phenomena of the seasons at Martin's Falls, on the Albany, extending through a period of fifty years, and from it I find that the river is open there on an average six months in the year. I have also a record of the dates of opening and closing of Hayes river at York factory, extending over more than fifty years, from which it appears to enjoy an average of fully six months of open water. The Nelson river is open for a longer period.

This evidence does not bear upon the experience of one year or a few years, but, in the one case, of seventy years, and in the other cases of fifty years, and it settles beyond all doubt—and I find there is no evidence set up against it—that harbours in Hudson bay and the mouths of the rivers are open from five to six months of the year. Of course hon. gentlemen will understand this statement has no bearing or relation to the navigation of Hudson strait to the Atlantic ocean. Then we have another point to consider, and that is the safety of navigation. This is what Dr. Bell says with regard to that subject :

Both the bay and strait are remarkably free from rocks and shoals, which might interfere with their free navigation. The groups of islands near the east side of the bay are surrounded by deep water, and a wide channel leads up the centre of James' bay. Fortunately the main body of the bay, which is the portion likely to be hereafter frequented by shipping, is entirely without shoals, reefs, or islands. The depth is very uniform over most of the bay, and nowhere does it present any great irregularities. It averages about 70 fathoms throughout, deepening to 100 and upwards in approaching the outlet of Hudson's strait ; while in the strait itself the soundings along the centre vary from about 150 to upwards of 300 fathoms. The bottom appears to consist almost everywhere of boulder clay and mud. Near the shores a stiff clay, affording good holding ground for anchors, is almost invariably met with on both sides.

While this is the character of the route which will be used by ships from the port of Churchill to Liverpool, that it is absolutely free from rocks and shoals, it must be borne in mind that this is not the general condition prevailing on the coast of Hudson bay. There are mud flats or shoals prevailing over the great part of the coast. This one signally good harbour of Churchill is an exception, but I think I am quite safe in saying that there are other ports in the southern portions of Hudson bay and James bay which may with a little expense, be made useful for the internal commerce of the country, Churchill, however, appears to stand out as the only one port that will be available for ocean communication with large ships. Fortunately it is situated in the right spot for communication with the great Northwest and equally convenient as a route to Liverpool. Now I come to deal with Hudson strait, and hon. gentlemen will pardon me if I read to them extracts from the reports of four of the most reliable and distinguished explorers who have visited these straits within the last twenty years for the purpose of investigating the navigation there. I may say in starting that the investigation I made on this subject leads me to dismiss as utterly unwarranted the pretentions that have been set up by advocates of this route that there is anything like six months' navigation of the Hudson strait. I do not think it would be safe or fair to say that there is five months' navigation. Four is very much nearer the mark, and it might in some years be found to come down to three and a half months; but there is no question, I think, from the authority I am about to submit to the House, that we have an absolutely open navigation of three and a half or four months, and sometimes perhaps four and a half through the strait. That is what Commander Markham says:

I have in my possession an official record of the voyages out and home of the Hudson Bay Company's ship 'Prince Rupert' for a period of eleven consecutive years namely, from 1835 to 1846, inclusive. I find that the average time of getting through the strait in the outward voyages during this period (and it must not be forgotten that the strait is 500 miles in length) was sixteen days. The longest time was thirty-one days, when there was probably an exceptionally bad ice year. The shortest time was eight days. But the delays in getting through the strait were caused by calms and adverse winds, and not by the ice. On the homeward passage no difficulties were met with from ice in the strait, and the vessel usually reached London in about five weeks after leaving York Factory. The earliest date for sailing from York Factory was the sixth of September, and the latest the third of October. In the latter case the 'Prince Rupert' was thirty-eight days on the passage to London; so that it is impossible she could have had any serious detention from ice in the strait.

Hon. gentlemen hearing the number of days read, and considering the familiarity we have with ocean crossing only by steamers, might think that this seemed to be very long; but those of us who are old enough to go back to the period of sailing vessels will remember that it is only the normal period of time occupied in crossing the Atlantic from the maritime provinces by sailing ships. Now I will read what Capt. Gordon says:

As to the length of season for practical navigation, if we regard the presence of field ice as the only barrier, the information which we have got would point to the months of July, August, September, and October as being the months in which the straits are passable. As a rule in July there will be delays, not to vessels strengthened and sheated there would be no danger in making the passage.

All the inhabitants of the Labrador, the straits and the bay, spoke to on the subject, agreed stating that the ice movements this year were much later than the average; at Fort Churchill the season was fully a month late, and on the Labrador three weeks, so that I think that on the average four months will be the length of the season for practical navigation by steam vessels which would be freight carriers. There have been, I am informed, seasons when the straits were clear of ice in the month of June, but they are, according to the logs of the Hudson bay ships, quite exceptional. Captain Hawes spoke of such being the case only once in his experience of fourteen years.

That is Captain Gordon's testimony. Then we have what Commander Wakeham says:

I now conclude this part of the report by saying that I absolutely agree with Captain Gordon in fixing the date for the opening of navigation in Hudson strait, for commercial purposes, by suitable vessels, at from 1st to the 10th of July. I do not consider that the strait can be successfully navigated in June. Such a ship as the 'Diana' might force a passage through, but these vessels would be useless for commercial purposes. They have to be so braced and strengthened that they are impossible as freight carriers.

Therefore, for all the reasons I have enumerated, I consider the 20th of October as the extreme limit of safe navigation in the fall.

Then we have Mr. Lowe's testimony as given in the recent report on the cruize of the 'Neptune':

The period of safe navigation for ordinary iron steamships through Hudson bay strait and across Hudson bay to the Port of Churchill may be stated to extend from the 20th of July to the 1st of November. The period might be increased without much risk by a week in the beginning of the season and by perhaps two weeks at the close.

Absolutely confirming what the other parties have said. Now with regard to the ice in the strait, we have a great deal of information in the different blue-books that have been laid before us. Those of us who live in the east, particularly one like myself who lives in Prince Edward Island, are very familiar with ice conditions, to our sorrow, although we have a beautiful climate. It is not our own manufacture of ice. It comes down from the northern seas and hangs around our coasts. It is a foreign element which we do not welcome. Navigators in the north speak of four kinds of ice which they encounter. There is the young or harbour ice, which is never regarded as very serious. Then there is the rafted ice, and that is the class of ice we have to do with around Prince Edward Island almost entirely. It is ice which is drifted by storms, one flake of it lies piled on top of another until it assumes very formidable dimensions. That kind of ice, although a great difficulty in the way of navigation, is not insurmountable by any means where you have good steamers, except when formed by being driven up into a cove or bay. In the open it is not solid ice, and there are generally open spaces between the pieces, so that when it is not driven together solidly a strong ship can always work her way through it, especially after the water becomes warm in July. Then in the north they have something which we know nothing at all about, and that is icebergs. It is a fortunate thing for Hudson bay that all the authorities are agreed on this point, that there are no icebergs formed in Hudson bay, or in the waters that flow into the bay. The icebergs that have been found there by navigators have always been encountered within one hundred miles of the Atlantic, and it is now settled that they are icebergs that have been formed up around Greenland, and they are carried into the Hudson strait by the current, and after moving a short distance into Hudson strait, they meet another current and are carried out to the Atlantic, where they stray, sometimes, into the way of ocean commerce. Fortunately there are no icebergs formed or made within the Hudson bay or Hudson strait. They are a foreign element that come there, and when they are there they have to be treated, as they are everywhere, with great respect. There is another character of ice called growlers. They are icebergs after they have been broken up. They will often break up into half a dozen parts. They then lay low in the water and do not show on the surface, but they have all the elements of the icebergs within them. They are the most dangerous enemies of navigation wherever they exist. Most of the losses to navigation in northern waters are incurred by encounters with growlers. They are seldom if ever found in Hudson strait. The few icebergs that get into Hudson strait do not break up till after they get out again into the warmer waters of the Atlantic. That process begins then, and in that form they are very seldom encountered with in Hudson strait. I might say in proof of the statement that I a now addressing to the House that Captain Gordon who, I am safe in saying has been one of the most conservative of all the explorers that visited those northern waters, rather leaned to the belief that icebergs which he saw inside of Hudson strait west of the opening into the Atlantic, were caused by glaciers in some of the northern waters in Hudson bay. The next year, in 1885, he corrected that opinion: He investigated the matter further and came to a conclusion on which all navigators are agreed. He says :

> In my report last year I described the ice as consisting of three kinds, viz., icebergs, heavy arctic ice and ordinary field ice. The icebergs are stated to have come from Fox channel. This conclusion was based on the report of No. 3 station made on the homeward voyage of the 'Neptune,' that the icebergs passed the bluff from west towards east. This report was made on the strength of the few observations which the party had been able to make in the interval between the two calls of the 'Neptune' at the inlet. Further and more perfect observations show conclusively that the current sets in the opposite direction and that the icebergs move from east to west. If further proof of the existence of this set were necessary we have it in the drift of the 'Alert' when fast in the ice off Ashe inlet and invariably carried to the westward.

From all that I have been able to read, on the subject, this is the only evidence in favour of the formation of icebergs in Hudson bay, and this statement which Mr. Gordon made in 1884 he corrected in 1885.

A very valuable blue-book has been placed in our hands, and I confess that the study I have made of this subject has been caused by the perusal of that most interesting work by the head of the Geological Department. It is a book that gives evidence of the greatest possible care in its preparation, and after reading it through from end to end I am inclined, from the very conservative view that is taken in the whole course of the description that he gives, to place very great reliance on the ultimate conclusions which Mr. Lowe arrived at. I shall read some of the concluding observations of that report, because I am anxious that they shall be placed on our records :

> Taking Regina as a convenient center for these northwestern farming lands, the distance from there by the way of Prince Albert to Churchill is about 800 miles or the same distance as from Regina to Fort William on Lake Superior, and a thousand miles shorter than the distance from Regina to Montreal at the head of sea navigation on the St. Lawrence. The distance from Churchill to Liverpool is almost the same as that from Montreal to Liverpool, consequently there is a saving distance of a thousand miles of rail or river carriage in favour of the northern route.

The question of the storage of the grain until the season following the harvest, is at first sight a serious one, but when it is known that not twenty per cent of the grain at present reaches the sea-board before the opening of navigation of the year following that in which it is harvested, this objection practically disappears, for the grain may be as well stored on the shores of Hudson bay as in the elevators on the plains, or at Fort William. The question of storage is reduced to the length of time between the opening of navigation of Hudson strait and the time required to transport grain from Fort William to Montreal after the opening of navigation on the great lakes, and this difference in time may be measured by days.

The country through which a railway must run to reach the port of Churchill is known to offer no serious difficulties and although the local freights between the bay and the head of Lake Winnipeg may be small the district traversed is equal in fertility and natural resources to much of that through which the Canadian Pacific Railway runs to the northward of the great lakes. Given a good harbour, such as that of Churchill and an adequate number of steamships, there will be no difficulty in removing from that port during the season of safe navigation all the grain and other supplies that can be drawn there by a single line of rails.

The point having been established that Hudson strait is absolutely free for navigation, so far as ice is concerned, for four months in the year, the further fact being established that the course of ocean-going ships from Port Churchill to Liverpool through Hudson strait is absolutely free from all rocks, shoals and difficulties of navigation; the still further point taken into consideration that this navigation of four months will be mostly in the long summer days when in that northern latitude the sun shines on an average probably twenty hours a day. Sunlight will enable mariners to find their way without depending so much on lighthouses and other aids to navigation. Churchill communicates with the open sea just as directly as Halifax and is not hampered with a long St. Lawrence navigation like Montreal or, to some extent, Quebec, or even with the Bay of Fundy which impedes navigation, to some extent, in connection with the harbour of St. John, it communicates directly into the open sea that is as safe for navigation in the four months of the season as any sea in the world. These are all wonderful advantages in favour of the Hudson bay route. I was going to make an observation or two before reaching this point with regard to the resources of that country. I confess I feel it almost unnecessary to do so. Since the opening of the Yukon and Cobalt we have all been getting a glimpse of the value of this great hinterland. Wealth such as has been discovered in these regions may be in store for us at very many other points. There are indications already of extensive deposits of rich mineral wealth. We know there are valuable fisheries. It is proved beyond every doubt that there is valuable timber growing along the rivers flowing into the southern part of Hudson bay and James bay for a hundred miles or so from the mouths of those rivers; that there is water power on those rivers, and all this shows us that when the bay is reached by railway communication from the settled parts of Canada it will be a great impulse to trade and enterprise of various kinds. There are two distinct propositions before Canada with regard to reaching Hudson bay. The major one has been in our mind so long and which I have been discussing, is to reach Hudson bay by railway from a point in Manitoba or the Northwest Territories to Fort Churchill that will open communication with the old world and afford an outlet for the wheat and cattle of the Northwest superior to any other outlet which could possibly be furnished to that empire we possess in the west. It is known by hon. gentlemen that the Canadian Northern Railway has already been constructed from Winnipeg to a point at the Saskatchewan river. In reply to a question of mine, the hon. Secretary of State told us a few days days ago that the last link south of the Saskatchewan river is now under construction, a stretch of 86 miles, for which a land grant of over a million of acres of land is being earned. That seems to me to be a very improvident transaction. It may not be a very dry prairie, but I understand it is prairie country, and I cannot conceive it possible that the cost of that road would be more than thirty or thirty-five thousand dollars a mile. If I am correctly informed as to the character of the land that is being given to the Canadian Northern Railway for that section, 12,800 acres per mile, it is equivalent to nearly $100,000 per mile. So we are paying $100,000 or thereabouts for the construction of a railway that is not costing more than one-third of this amount. I regret this for many reasons. I think it will set a pace for further demands from the Canadian Northern or any other railway company that builds a road to Hudson bay. There will be a demand for an exorbitant land grant for the construction of the 400 miles of road from the Saskatchewan river to Churchill. I cannot conceive that the government have done their duty with regard to this matter, because while it is quite true that this grant was made in 1884—after a great deal of difficulty I found in the Dominion Lands Act, a peculiar place for a subsidy to a railway—and it is found in the present revision of the statutes and forms a clause of section 6 of the new revision of the Dominion Lands Act, under which the Governor in Council were empowered to grant land to the extent of not more than 6,400 acres per mile for a railway towards Hudson bay within the province of Manitoba, and not more than 12,800 acres per mile for land beyond the province of Manitoba. It was clearly the duty of the government to have watched the values of land and the cost of railway construction and reduced the grant to reasonable proportions. It is a misfortune that such care was not exercised and I am afraid I shall have to charge the government with a good deal of negligence in not having used the powers they undoubtedly possess with regard to this matter and reduced the aid to this railway within reasonable dimensions.

However, it may now be too late to improve for that part of the railway. From what the hon. Secretary of State has told me, that appears to be settled and accomplished. There remain 400 miles more of railway to be constructed from the Saskatchewan river to Port Churchill. I have gone over two very valuable reports, one report in two sections, that has been laid on the table during the present session, of two explorers, Mr. McInnes, and Mr. O'Sullivan, who were instructed specially during last season to go over that route and investigate the character of the country for the extension of the McKenzie & Mann Railway from the Saskatchewan river to Churchill. I have gone over that report carefully, and it must be satisfactory to every body to find that in their opinion there are no difficulties whatever in the way of construction of that railway. They report, in addition to that, a very valuable tract of land, not very large in extent, but apparently very rich, on the line of that route. At one place they state there is a solid block of about 10,000 acres, the bed of an ancient lake which has been dried up and the soil was found to be very rich. I have not the slightest doubt that other considerable areas of valuable land will be found along that route from the Saskatchewan river to Churchill, land suitable for settlement, and it is more than probable that there are valuable resources of other kinds in that region. I hope it will be possible for the government to aid that railway out of lands along its own line, so there will be no further drain to be made either on the treasury of Canada or upon the lands of the older and more settled portions of the Northwest, for the purpose of securing the construction of this remaining 400 miles of road. However, I am strongly of opinion that it should be undertaken and accomplished as soon as possible, because, with the progress the Northwest is making, we will need all the good outlets possible within a very short time, for the carrying out of the produce of that great country. I desire to place on record my opinion that for the purpose of carrying out the wheat and cattle of the Northwest a road to Hudson bay, and a line of steamers connecting Churchill and Liverpool will be worth half a dozen National Transcontinental railways, and will not cost the people of Canada a tithe as much. Here we will have a very short haul by rail from the centre of the wheat fields to a harbour on the ocean, and have ocean conditions for navigation for four or five months of the year equal to what they are perhaps anywhere in the North Atlantic. The opinion I am giving with regard to the value of this route as compared with the National Transcontinental Railway and other lines of railroad which are all rail routes, is based on the cost of transportation. When we had the question of the National Transcontinental Railway before us some very illusory calculations were made by a member of the other House, Mr. Charlton, to show that a road properly constructed and equipped could profitably carry wheat from the west to the east in competition with water routes. Since then Mr. Charlton has published a volume of his speeches on public questions, and in that book there is one on the National Transcontinental Railway made early in the discussion in which he submitted a more conservative estimate of the cost of carrying wheat by rail ; but he does not quote or put on record the speech in which he estimated that wheat could be carried from Winnipeg to Quebec, by an all rail route, at six cents a bushel, including carrying empties back. He has shown his own lack of faith in the calculations he then made by dropping them from the book he has since published. No all rail route will have a chance to compete with a water route such as the Hudson bay is, or with the St. Lawrence route, and my observations with regard to that are not directed against the Grand Trunk Pacific to the head waters of Lake Superior. So far as that portion of the line is concerned, it will furnish a good outlet for carrying a portion of the wheat of the Northwest; but the proposition which was so seriously put before us that wheat could be carried as cheaply by an all rail route to the ocean ports as by rail and water routes, is, to my mind, entirely illusory and I think the chief advocate of that all rail route has shown that he has lost faith in his own calculation.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Does the hon. gentleman presume to say that the grain producers of the west would hold their grain a whole year to have the advantage of shipping it by the Hudson bay route ?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—If the hon. gentleman had listened to what I was saying, he would have heard that only twenty per cent of the wheat grown in the west at the present time finds its outlet by the Atlantic in the year in which it is grown, and if he will keep that in mind he will conclude that there will not be a great deal of suffering on the part of the wheat growers if their wheat is carried to Fort Churchill instead of being stored in elevators at Fort William.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Is that statement made by the corn exchange or by an engineer ?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I quote it from a gentleman who may not know quite as much as my hon. friend, but who is a very intelligent man, and I think it corresponds with the general knowledge we have of the fact that a very large proportion of the wheat of the Northwest does not find its way to European markets in the year in which it is produced. It is also true with regard to Hudson strait that the open season is somewhat prolonged in the fall though it does not start early in the summer. Hon. gentlemen can readily understand that, from the fact that ice coming down from the Arctic regions is found there all through the month of June and sometimes into July, but newly made ice does not come down in October, or to any great extent even in November. All the authorities agree that it is possible to prolong navigation somewhat into the fall. However, it may happen that none of the wheat produced in one year would find its outlet to Europe during that same year; but, as I have already said, and as Mr. Low says, that is not a very serious matter, as it is what happens with a great deal of the wheat that goes out by the St. Lawrence at the present time. As I said a few minutes ago, there are two distinct propositions opening before the country with regard to communication with Hudson bay. One is communication from the wheat fields, and the ranches of the Northwest by the way of Port Churchill to Liverpool, and the other is communication from the south, opening James bay and the southern part of Hudson bay to the enterprise and trade of the older provinces. Knowing what we do about the resources of that country, I do not think we can come to any other conclusion than that whenever a line of railway connects the southern part of Hudson bay with the older provinces we will get access to the fisheries, the lumber and the mineral wealth of that northern country, and that it will give an impulse to the trade of Montreal and Toronto and other Canadian cities. We know how our Canadian cities are benefited by the impetus given to trade through the discoveries of the mineral wealth of Cobalt, and to some extent, though it does not come so closely to us in the east, through the development of the Yukon country, and there is not the slightest doubt that when a railway taps James bay, whether it be a branch of the National Transcontinental Railway or of the Canadian Pacific Railway which is already building in that direction, or the railway owned by the Ontario Government, an immense impetus will be given to trade in the central parts of Canada, and great wealth will be found to exist there, in the development of which Ontario and Quebec will benefit. The mouth of the Nottaway river, I think, presents the greatest advantages in the way of a harbour on James bay. The distance from that point to Churchill is not less than 800 miles, and the railway which taps James bay at the mouth of the Nottaway river will be in direct communication with Montreal and Toronto, and will serve the internal trade of the country. The Mackenzie and Mann proposition is to reach Hudson bay from the west, and establish a great port at Churchill. The two propositions are before us and they are not rivals. I do not know which will be realized first, but they are both most important and, when they materialize, Canada will experience a fresh impulse on the road to prosperity. The question of the disposition of this northern territory rises in any discussion on the subject of the Hudson bay and the territories surrounding it. Manitoba has set up a strong plea for an extension of its boundaries northward and eastward. I notice that at the opening of the Ontario Legislature, the government of that province, in the speech from the Throne, indicated their views with regard to the division of the Keewatin territory. They claim that the eastern boundary of Manitoba should be carried due north until it strikes Churchill river, and thence the Churchill river to its mouth should form the boundary between Manitoba and Ontario; that Manitoba should get all Keewatin west of that boundary, and Ontario all east of it. We have had a similar plea put up on the part of the province of Quebec that Ungava should be handed over to that province. I am strongly of opinion myself that the port of Churchill should be held by a western province. I think there should be no dividing the waters by following the channel of the Churchill river. In the great province of Ontario there will always be rival outlets to the ocean, and this outlet would not be so much in the hands of its friends if it were controlled in any respect by Ontario. The proper course to pursue would be to give Churchill and I would say a great part of Keewatin, east of it to the province of Manitoba, on account of the insufficient dimensions of the province at the present time, and what I consider the still greater reason that Churchill, which is bound to become a great national port of special value to the west, should be in the hands of a western province interested in that route to Europe. I confess that I am not very favourable, at present at all events, to agreeing to the appropriation of Keewatin, or Ungava to the older provinces except in giving to Manitoba what may properly be regarded as its own hinterland and putting it in position as regards area somewhat on equality with the other western provinces. In some respects it has been scarcely fair to the smaller provinces that these large additions have been made already to Ontario and Quebec. They may tell us that it was awarded by proper legal process, and that is, of course, a very effective answer; but while effective from a legal point of view, it nevertheless has been the cause of raising some very troublesome questions. I cannot believe that the United States would occupy the same position it does to-day if the west had been parcelled out among those states that had a border upon it, and there were only thirteen or fourteen states in the union at the present time instead of forty-six. I believe such a division of territory in the United States was never thought of, and I am inclined to think that some harm has already been done in the disposition of the hinterland of Ontario and Quebec. In the awarding of a large territory to Ontario that province has been almost doubled in wealth and importance. The territory that Ontario received is most valuable—rich beyond any conception and the great province of Ontario has been immensely benefited by the extension. But having so benefited, I think the country should pause and pause seriously before handing over more territory to a province that has fared so well in the matter already.

Hon. Mr. KERR—Ontario got nothing more than it was entitled to. There was no concession.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend is not correcting me at all. I have already stated that Ontario got it by legal process.

Hon. Mr. KERR—Ontario got it because it was hers.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—By legal process the right of Ontario was determined, and we have to bow to that decision.

Hon. Mr. KERR—What legal process?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—By the decision of the Privy Council of England.

Hon. Mr. KERR—That was only determining a stated case.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I am right in saying that a reference was had to the Privy Council, and that is how the matter was ultimately decided.

Hon. Mr. KERR—But that northern portion had always belonged to Ontario.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I am not saying it was wrong; far from it. It becomes us as good subjects to bow to the decision of the Privy Council. Right or wrong, Ontario got a very great advantage which she had not possessed previous to that time, with regard to that hinterland, and that being so, we should pause before accepting any proposition for adding further territory to Ontario.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—You are not sorry that Ontario got it?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—No, I am not sorry that Ontario fared so well.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I never knew that there was any dispute as to the right of Ontario to that portion of the territory to which my hon. friend refers. The dispute was as to the extent of territory west of it. Ontario claimed a great deal more than the award gave her.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—In constituting the province of Manitoba the government of Canada did not appear to recognize the legal right of Ontario to what is now called New Ontario. Sir Oliver Mowat contested the matter, and it went to the Privy Council, and the process ended by fixing the boundary between Manitoba and Ontario, and between Ontario and Keewatin, and between Ontario and Quebec as they are to-day. On the strength of the argument used by Ontario and the legal decision arrived at, Quebec came in and claimed a similar hinterland on the very same ground, and it was conceded. I do not find any fault with it. I do not say that it was wrong in one case or the other, but I do say with regard to the position of Quebec that it has the effect of disturbing the pivotal arrangement that was made at Confederation with regard to representation. I will be told, I daresay, that the court has not found that way, but this becomes not only a matter of law, it is a matter of politics and is a matter of equity. There cannot be the slightest doubt in my mind that the large addition that was then made to the province of Quebec as well as to the province of Ontario, although the added territory did not at the time increase the population, there being a very great deal of wealth in that country, ultimately it will be a country in which a considerable population will settle. The wealth of that new country will attract population to the province of Quebec, especially to the cities of that province, just as Cobalt and these northern regions of Ontario have tended to increase the population of Toronto, Hamilton and other cities in that province.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I do not like to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but will he tell us something that the province has gained? Neither Quebec nor Ontario gained anything at all. The court merely established that the province of Quebec at the time of confederation was as it stands now since that decision, and that the province of Ontario stands as it stood before; so that when confederation was formed and talked of in the province of Ontario they talked of the province of Ontario as it stands now, and when they talked of Quebec, under the Confederation Act, they talked of Quebec as it stands now.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—And if my hon. friend will allow me on behalf of Quebec, I call his attention to this: He has stated that the addition of that territory might have changed the pivotal condition of Quebec. Will the hon. gentleman state to the House or to the country how many voters came to Quebec through the addition of that territory?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The hon. gentleman from Victoria misconceives the point or he would not interrupt. I am always glad to have an interruption, if it tends to bring out the point clearer than it was before. My contention was that it did not matter very much whether at the time of the enlargement of the provinces' boundaries the new territory contained any very considerable population. What I did contend was that if that country is rich in resources, as I have no doubt a great deal of it is, in time that wealth will tend to increase the population within the old boundary of the province of Quebec. I know that the contention set up on the part of Ontario and Quebec is that what new territory they got was really within their boundaries, but the government of Canada did not know it. Sir John Macdonald did not know it, because when he established Manitoba he undertook to form a province which contained part of the territory now in Ontario. My hon. friend shakes his head, but I am stating what is absolutely correct. After confederation the government of Canada did not realize that the boundary of Ontario would be pushed as far back as it was subsequently, and it was owing to the contention advanced by the Mowat government, which was carried before the Privy Council, that that point was settled. It is absolutely correct to say, when we entered into confederation, that in the mind of the people of all the provinces and of the statesmen who framed the Confederation Act, Quebec was considered as it then stood and they considered Ontario as it then stood. Ontario does not come into this discussion however; as far as the question of representation is concerned, it is only Quebec. I am only leading up, in this discussion, to speak of Ungava, and surely my hon. friend now in his argument against the contention set up by the smaller provinces in the east with reference to their loss of representation, would not be prepared to offer the same argument in the case of the addition of Ungava to Quebec, Quebec never claimed that it owned Ungava. In fact the claim advanced by Ontario for the extension of its boundaries, by the addition of new territory, was in the line finally established. It did not claim beyond that, and Quebec then set up a claim, and the claim of Quebec does not go beyond what is now the present boundary. The province of Quebec, in the correspondence which I have looked over carefully, admitted that its claim did not go beyond that. But while I submit that there would be strong objections to adding any considerable part of Keewatin to Ontario. I would admit in an equitable way that Ontario should have as good a port as there is to be obtained in a reasonable stretch of country along the southern shore of James bay, and, if her present teritory does not give her such a port, I think it would be equitable to give her a coast line on the James bay which would include the makings of a reasonably good seaport, but I do not think it would be fair to go beyond that, and beyond that I think the whole question of the distribution of the Northern country, except giving Manitoba her boundary, should be held over for some time to come. With regard to Ungava, I have suggested that the matter shall be held over until such time as Newfoundland comes into confederation, and it might be an inducement to Newfoundland to come in, to give her Ungava; it might be as a condition that she shall renounce her claims to the Atlantic coast of Quebec, the Labrador coast of Quebec at Belle Isle and beyond it. If you added that coast of Quebec it would be open to the objection of again disturbing the pivot of representation. But I hope, before that point is reached, this question of representation will be dealt with as I believe it will be, in an equitable manner, and when that is done, the government will have a freer hand with regard to the disposition of Ungava.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The subject which the hon. gentleman from Marshfield has selected to deal with is a very interesting one. It is, as he says, one which had been dealt with on various occasions in this House before; but now the question has become one of more living consequence than it was, say in 1894. I think that the House is under an obligation to the hon. gentleman for the valuable information which he has submitted with respect to the subject matter of his resolution. It is clear that whatever other gentlemen who are obliged to be here when they would perhaps sooner be at home, may do, the hon. gentleman from Marshfield makes very good use of the time of his compulsory imprisonment; and I wish further to say that with one or two slight exceptions to which I may take the liberty to refer, I do not think any fault can be found with the tone of the hon. gentleman's speech. The statements which he has made are nearly all statements which are borne out by the facts. Still I do not look at the question just in the same way as the hon. gentleman from Marshfield. I understand that in Scotland, very often where a road goes over a high hill, there is to be found a large flat stone, on which the wayfarer who has climbed the hill is supposed to sit down and rest himself, and those stones are known by the name of 'Rest, and be thankful.' I think we have been doing great things during the last few years, considering the wealth and population of this country. We have been making very great expenditures indeed, largely, no doubt, for the purpose of developing our resources; still we have been making very large expenditures. Our annual expenditure has got to be very considerable; and the debt, although it has not been increased much of late, is very heavy; and we have on our hands at the present time, apart from everything else, this Transcontinental Railway, of which the hon. gentleman spoke in a somewhat disparaging manner; which, I think, is calculated to occupy the energies of this country for some little time to come. Taking everything into consideration, for instance the possibility that the tide of prosperity which has flowed in our direction so long, may at some, perhaps not very distant, period cease to flow quite as strongly as it has been flowing in the past, it is not sound policy for this country to assume new burdens, burdens of a serious character, but rather to 'rest and be thankful.' I look upon the proposal to build a railway from the Pas on the Saskatchewan to Fort Churchill, and to connect that with a line of steamers to England, as a somewhat formidable proposition. Further, I think that, on the whole, the hon. gentleman over-estimates, although not seriously, the possibilities of the Hudson bay route. I must admit that the hon. gentleman is more conservative than a great many of those who advocate the route; and I think it well that this discussion has been introduced by him because there are enthusiastic people, particularly in the west, who do really believe that the navigation of Hudson bay and strait continues open for six months of the year. I shall quote from Mr. Low's report a passage which the hon. gentleman either read or cited, which gives substantially Mr. Low's conclusions. In the last chapter of his report, at page 295, he says:

> The period of safe navigation for ordinary iron steamships through Hudson strait and across Hudson bay to the port of Churchill, may be taken to extend from July 20 to November 1. This period might be increased without much risk by a week in the beginning of the season and by perhaps two weeks at the close.

You have from the 20th of July to the 1st of November. Now, we must remember that a gentleman in the positon of Mr. Low, sent out on an inquiry of this kind, is somewhat disposed, to look favourably on the scheme, which I do not say he advocates, but which, to a certain extent, he approves; and I have taken the trouble, the hon. gentleman having called attention to this report the other day, to look at some passages in it, which do not seem to me to quite sustain the conclusion which I have just read. I turn to page 14, and about one-third of the way down the page, Mr. Low says, speaking of the 9th of September—and that is well within the period when the navigation is supposed to be unobstructed:

> A large number of icebergs were passed during the day, having been apparently drifted into the strait by the westerly current on its north side, probably aided by favouring easterly winds. They were not very numerous to the westward of Big island.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—They are cheerful companions.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am talking just now of Hudson bay.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—They are not objectionable. They are very good in hot weather.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Icebergs, at that particular time, would be found on the North Atlantic too, in the course of the Strait of Belle Isle navigation.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Then I refer again to this report. At page 36, speaking of the 19th of July, I am not going to quote the first part of it, but he refers to the ice; he says:

> Ice to the northward gradually forced the ship closer to the shores of Coats, where after passing a wide bay partly filled with large low islands, we coasted within two miles of a prominent headland about 400 feet high, which forms the northeast cape of Coats, and which was named Cape Préfontaine in honour of the Hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

Beyond Cape Préfontaine the ice became more plentiful and many large pans were met with. The ice had the appearance of being lately broken up, and owing to its smooth unrafted condition, we judged it came from Fisher's strait, rather than from Fox channel to the north of us. During the night this ice forced the ship southward into the channel between Coats and Mansfield, so that the western shore of the latter was reached some twenty-five miles to the south of its northern end.

This ship was specially constructed for Arctic navigation, and she was forced out of her route by ice on the 19th of July. On the same day, at page thirty-seven, we find that a strong southerly wind had been blowing all day, and it was hoped it had loosened the ice along the southern shore of the strait. He says :

The ship was taken under the land but without success, so that after butting through the slowly closing ice all day we were finally tightly beset in the early morning, about three miles from the eastern Digges island. The 21st was foggy, with snow flurries in the morning and showers in the afternoon ; the ice remained tight about the ship all day, and she drifted eastward with the ice, passing Cape Wolstenholme and in the evening, being about five miles to the east of Eric cove.

Then on the same page he says :

Persistent ramming forced the ship through about five miles of the ice on the morning of the 22nd, when she was again tightly beset until the evening, at that time being about 25 miles eastward of Cape Wolstenholme, this distance having been made by the drift of the ice.

That last difficulty took place on the 22nd of July, when the steamer was on her way to the southern side of the strait. So much for the early summer. Now, I shall call the attention of the House to other passages dealing with the later summer. The ship was near Nottingham island. This was on the 8th of September. At page 67 he says :

It was considered dangerous to attempt to enter the ice in such weather with the unknown Mill island directly in the course; we therefore turned back to pass south of Nottingham island. This decision proved wise, for next day the whole mouth of Fox channel was found completely filled with heavy ice, drifted south from the northern parts of the channel. The condition of the Neptune's stem did not warrant any contact with the ice that could possibly be avoided.

Hon. Mr. POWER.

Further down in the same page he speaks of large icebergs being grounded off the eastern end of Salisbury island. It has been contended that there is no difficulty in getting out until, some people say, the first of December. Now we are reading about this ship, specially constructed for Arctic work, going out in the early part of September. He says:

On the 13th, having rounded Salisbury and Nottingham during the night, ice was met with at nine in the morning, twenty-five miles to the westward of the last-mentioned island. The course was changed to south of west to skirt the edge of this great pack, and as it continued unbroken to the westward, the idea of passing through Fisher's strait was abandoned and the course was laid to the southward of Coats island. This passage was encumbered by ice until dark, when the ship lay to awaiting daylight.

There is more about ice on the page, but I do not care to weary the House with that. Then just at the close he says:

The ice from Fox channel had advanced southward and westward nearly twenty miles since we last saw it. This necessitated our keeping close to Mansfield island.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—What date was that?

Hon. Mr. POWER—It was about September 25.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—It was ice all the year round.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think the better way is to look fairly at the matter. I do not think it could be reasonably claimed that the Hudson bay and strait are navigable for ordinary commercial vessels for more than three months at the outside. The question is whether, having spent hundreds of millions as Canada has, largely with a view of bringing the products of the west down to the east, and bringing the goods of the east to the west, we should undertake at the present moment, and without further information, and without urgent necessity, to try to take away from the railroads that we are building, the occupation which the transportation I have spoken of would give them. I think we had better wait and allow the people of the west to ascertain whether, on the whole, it is a desirable thing that this road to Hudson bay should be opened. It is very well to say that is a selfish view for the people of the east to take, but after all, the east has been, until very recently at any rate, paying for most of the work that has been done, and that work has been chiefly for the benefit of the west. I do not think the west should expect us to be over anxious to spend money for the purpose of taking away from this part of the country the advantage that may arise from the great expenditures that have taken place. The hon. gentleman spoke of two routes, I think he spoke of them as alternative routes, and then he concluded that both schemes might be adopted.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—No, I spoke of them as two distinct propositions. They are not rival schemes at all.

Hon. Mr. POWER—He spoke of them as not being rivals. They were distinct. Here is one point where I think his observations were open to some criticism. The hon. gentleman thought proper to make some remarks which were somewhat derogatory to the National Transcontinental Railway. I wish to call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that many important discoveries with respect to the valuable character of the hinterland of Quebec and Ontario which have been made within the last two or three years are due to the government's scheme for building the National Transcontinental Railway. The government surveyors and engineers and other employees have observed that the country is worth very much more than it was thought to be worth. Then I wish to direct the hon. gentleman's attention to this fact; probably he is correct in saying that the mouth of the Nottaway river is about the best point on the James bay for connection with the railway system of the Dominion. When the National Transcontinental Railway has been completed, a comparatively short branch may connect the eastern system with James bay, and through James bay, with the Hudson Bay Territory; so that instead of condemning the National Transcontinental Railway the hon. gentleman should approve of it. It is going to help along the scheme which he has at heart. With respect to the other scheme, the road from the Pass to Fort Churchill, we have not always looked at that from a purely business standpoint. While the hon. gentleman speaks of the dry bed of a lake as containing valuable land, I think that the farming land between the Pass and Churchill is a very small quantity indeed. I do not think we have any reason to suppose that for agricultural purposes that part of the country is worth much; and this problem naturally suggests itself; it is said, by gentlemen who understand the transportation question, which I do not claim to do—I have no doubt the hon. gentleman from Marshfield does though—that as a rule the local traffic is the traffic that makes a railroad pay. But there cannot be any substantial local traffic on a road located from near the mouth of the Saskatchewan to Fort Churchill. There will be very little local settlement. There may be, perhaps, a certain amount of fish carried over the road, but that would not count for a great deal, and I do not understand myself how you are going to make a railway pay which will have business for not more than four months of the year. That is one of the questions that have to be decided.

Suppose that we are generous and build this railway: and say that to Fort Churchill it may be used for four months in the year. What is going to become of the railway during the other eight months?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN. Lock it up.

Hon. Mr. POWER. I do not wish to be understood as saying that, when the right time comes, and when it is imperatively demanded, this road should not be built, but what I say is that we should not leap before we come to the stile. We should not lose our heads and do some thing which would not be done by cool business men.

We should not be in a hurry about these things, should not lose our heads and do something we may regret afterwards having done. We have certain assets on our hands now that we would be just as well without.

There is just one observation, which has nothing to do with the question, that I wish to make before sitting down. I notice the hon. gentleman spoke of Labrador, as Ungava. I know there is a disposition to introduce that practice, and it ought to be discouraged. Labrador is a good, sonorous, honest name which has been in use for nearly 400 years. Ungava bay is one of the most God-forsaken regions on the face of the earth, and we should not extend a name which applies to that place to the whole of Labrador. Let us call Labrador, Labrador.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The hon. gentleman from Marshfield says that the province of Quebec is indebted somewhat for its population and for its influence with regard to the representation in the Dominion parliament to the fact that this new territory has been added or is about to be added. I can assure the hon. gentleman that the population in that region would not affect one single constituency, or half, or even quarter of any constituency in the Dominion. I admire his generosity in proposing to give Newfoundland one of the good parts of this Dominion as an inducement to that colony to come into the confederation. I think we will hold what we have. We will give none of our territory to Newfoundland to induce her to become a province of Canada. If Newfoundland wants to come in, she will come in of her own free-will. She has quite enough territory to take care of without adding any part of the territory of the Dominion. There are hon. gentlemen here representing Quebec and Ontario, who are quite capable of defending the rights of their provinces, and I think they will agree with me that there should be no such concession whatever. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman from Toronto in saying that it was not the decision of any court that gave what is known as New Ontario to the province of Ontario. The courts sanctioned their demand. The courts could not give territory, so there is no acquired right from the Dominion or any other source. The hon. gentleman from Halifax, in his opening remarks, dealt in a kindly way with the motion made by my hon. friend from Marshfield. I would quite agree with him that the hon. gentleman's study was arduous, and he has brought forth a great many facts, but my hon. friend from Halifax did his best afterwards to demolish the whole structure set up by my hon. friend from Marshfield. If I had left this Chamber after hearing the hon. gentleman from Marshfield, I would have gone away decided in my opinion that we had at least three and one-half months of open navigation in Hudson strait without any obstacle whatever. That would have been my opinion based on his learned dissertation on this question, but the hon. member from Halifax rises, and, after paying a tribute of admiration and respect for the work of the hon. senator from Marshfield, gives to this House and to the country facts which completely demolish the theory of the hon. member from Prince Edward Island. The hon. gentleman has quoted from reports day by day, from the 19th July until nearly the 1st October, facts which go to prove that navigation in those northern waters is almost impossible, if not quite impossible, at least very dangerous. It goes to show what one may learn by listening to two sides of a question. I am very much pleased to have remained to listen to the speech of the hon. gentleman from Halifax. Between the two I am unable to decide, but I coincide largely with the remarks of the hon. member from Halifax in regard to the expenditure that would be incurred necessarily for building a railway for the simple purpose of furnishing traffic for three or four months of navigation. It would not be the people of these territories who would put up the money. It is natural that the government of this country would be called upon to furnish the means for constructing that railroad, and, as he has very fairly and reasonably pointed out, Canada is to-day carrying a heavy obligation. We are constructing works almost beyond our strength, compared with other nations. We have enough on hand for the next four or five years in regard to these public works, and if it is the object of the hon. member from Marshfield to secure the immediate construction of that railway from Saskatchewan river to Hudson bay, to my mind—and I agree with the hon. member from Halifax—he is a little premature. Let us finish the tremendous railway undertakings we have on our hands. After completing that work, if another route should be necessary within the next ten years, let us seek an outlet for the products of the west by constructing the Ottawa and Georgian Bay canal, which will be open seven months of the year, where you will have no icebergs morning or evening, and no snow flurries in July, a route which would be the safest passage between the west and Europe, a route by which dairy, garden and field products can be safely transported in the hot days of July and August, almost without the need of cold storage; a route by which the products of the farm will not be deteriorated in transit. I have not the slightest doubt that the products of the farm carried by way of the Ottawa and Georgian Bay canal will have enough fresh air from the lakes, rivers and streams of the Ottawa valley, in the hottest season, to preserve them from deterioration with very little expenditure for cold storage. I have had the opportunity and the honour to advocate the building of this canal for the past eight or ten years, and I may tell this honourable House that all this section of Canada is in favour of that project. I do not put forward a demand on the government. The government has its hands full for a year or two, but if Providence continues to bless Canada as it has the last ten years, then I should say to the government, commence the construction of the Ottawa and Georgian Bay canal in the interest of the great Northwest and of the country, and it will be an outlet as short, as profitable and as convenient as can be found in any part of the Dominion. That is a scheme which should command, and I have no dout will yet command, the support of the people of Canada. I am glad the hon. member from Marshfield has brought up this discussion in regard to transportation. I am not opposed, as a matter of principle, to the building of the Hudson Bay Railway or furnishing a seaport to any part of Canada. I am in favour of developing every part of the Dominion; but we are only 6,000,000 of people, occupying a vast territory, and we cannot do everything in a day. Let us construct the necessary works first, and then let us deal with the fringes of the Dominion of Canada.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—This is a question which more particularly interests the western part of Canada, and it may not be amiss to me as a representative from Saskatchewan to make some remarks on the subject. In my judgment, and I think in the judgment of most of us, transportation is a problem which affects the people of Canada to-day more than any other question. Whether this railway to Hudson bay would provide greater facilities for transportation in the west I am at a loss to know. I am inclined to think it would not, because to-day we have railroads enough for the requirements of that country. The railway companies are building new lines of railway in every direction, trying to cover all the country they can, though none of them can furnish rolling stock to handle the traffic on the lines already in existence. Hon. gentlemen talk about the west being benefited by the east. I will not undertake to argue that point further than to say that the west is the backbone of Canada, and that it gives an impetus to trade all over the Dominion. We are willing to do our part to encourage business, but we like fair play. They say that the Northwest farmer is a chronic grumbler, but I claim that there is no man that the sun shines on who does his business under such disadvantage as the farmer of the Canadian Northwest. I will give you a case in point. Take the district in which I reside myself, and all the other districts are on a par with us in the province of Saskatchewan at least. We commenced to plough on the Perley farm—and all the farms in that neighbourhood are in the same position—in the month of April in 1905. We had a large number of horses well equipped and we ploughed the land nearly two years ago. We cultivated the land all that summer as we have to do in the west. The practice in the east is to plough the land in the spring and sow the seed, and in six months, often less, the eastern farmer gets his return for his produce. A great deal of his returns come in much sooner because he can send his cream to the creamery and his milk to the cheese factory and get his money in three or four weeks, but in the west we are mostly grain and stock farmers. We commenced ploughing in the spring of 1905 with a large number of horses. We had to pay our men $25 to $30 per month, besides furnishing provision for them and feeding the horses. We cultivated the land all that summer to get it ready for the next year's crop. In 1906 we commenced seeding as early as possible, because that is the proper system of farming in the west. In the harvest we paid $40 to $50 for harvest hands to help take in the crop and in due time threshed the grain and put it in the granary. We are willing to do all that because it is the natural condition of things in our country, but we ought to be in a position to utilize our horses through the winter to market our grain. On the Perley farm to-day there are forty horses doing nothing, because we cannot get cars to send our wheat to market. After keeping them idle all winter, we will have to take them next summer from the farm work to haul the wheat to market. That is the condition of things all over the district where I live. In my district we have not sold a bushel of wheat raised on the ground that we ploughed in the spring of 1905. We had to hold our wheat, the land we had ploughed 26 or 27 months before, and I say that is not a fair state of things. Where is there a man in eastern Canada who labours under such disadvantages ? We cannot get the money out of our crop and we have to pay interest on the implements we purchase. My hon. friend from Halifax says that the railway to Hudson Bay will be idle eight months of the year. Our farmers use a seeder two weeks in the year, and it is idle the other 50 weeks of the year. In the same way we have to invest capital in binders and threshing machines which have to lie idle for over eleven months of every year. But a railway company gets a bonus from the country ; the farmer gets no bonus, and the railroads haul the wheat to suit their own convenience. There is no fair play in that. What we want in this country is more transportation. If the government can grapple with that question they will deal with the most serious difficulty we have to face in the Northwest to-day, and the benefit will go to the commerce of Canada. If the farmer cannot get his money, he cannot pay the merchant from whom he purchases, and the merchant cannot pay the wholesaler from whom he gets his goods and the wholesaler cannot pay the manufacturer who produces them. There is a general tie-up of the whole industry of the country because the railway companies cannot provide enough rolling stock to move the crops. I make no complaint against any railway company. I say, however, that the farmers in the west derive no benefit from the construction of more lines unless they are near competing points. No man can profitably haul his wheat more than ten miles, and each railway has a country tributary to itself, is master of the situation and will furnish cars for the wheat when it pleases them. Now let us see how the Hudson Bay Railway, if built, would help us. Let us start at Regina, that is 60 miles west of Wolseley. I order a car to ship wheat to Hudson bay. There is just a certain length of time in which I can ship it by that route. I order a car from the Canadian Pacific railway, because that is the line I am on, and they say that I cannot get a car. There is no use saying that you can make them provide cars. There are no cars available now, and on our farm we have 35,000 bushels of wheat grown nearly two years ago that we cannot sell for want of transportation. These are facts, and the question to be solved to-day, not for the western farmers alone, much as it presses on them, but for every man interested in the development of the resources of this country, is to provide more transportation and not more railroads. The railway companies say they furnish all the cars they can. If so they do not need more railway lines. They cannot equip the lines they have already, and the rolling stock they have to-day is so delapidated that they cannot keep it up. Even the Intercolonial Railway cannot provide rolling stock enough. There is no use building more railroads ; it is much better to spend the money on providing rolling stock. The Northwest farmer is the most imposed upon man in the country. There is not a senator who can name a single industry in Canada which does not get returns in less than two years from its expenditure. The farmers of my district have large quantities of grain in the elevators from which they cannot get returns in less than twenty-seven months. That is the problem which requires to be solved rather than building a road to Hudson Bay. We were unable to ship more than 20 per cent of our wheat this year for want of rolling stock.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière)—The hon. member from Wolseley says that no one can point to a business which does not bring in returns within two years. Everyone knows that the lumber business in Ottawa here does not. The drive alone takes from one to three years, and there is a year occupied in cutting the lumber and drying and selling it, and then the lumberman only gets paid for it the following winter.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—He always has dry lumber on hand.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Does the hon. member say that it takes eighteen months to get the crop in the Northwest?

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Eighteen months between ploughing and harvesting.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Surely that is not the case every year ? You get a crop every year.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—The system of farming in our country would not suit eastern Canada at all. We have to conform to the laws of nature in order to succeed in farming, and the natural conditions in the west are not the same as in eastern Canada. In the spring of 1889 I sowed 40 bushels of wheat and 60 bushels of oats. It was a dry year, and the seed did not germinate. I lost the labour and the seed. I found out that the proper way to till the soil in that country is to commence plowing in the spring, and to cultivate the land through the summer every ten days. That preserves the moisture. If you do not cultivate the soil the weeds will spring up and get a start. Then the following spring the seed is sown and in that way it takes eighteen months to get a crop. The land plowed in 1905 is not sown until the next spring, and by the time the crop is harvested and threshed it is eighteen months from the time the ground is broken. We do not grumble about that eighteen months—we are perfectly content. Then in the next six months, in place of having our horses idle we should be able to use them to market the grain. Under present conditions we cannot do that. This has been perhaps an exceptional year, but all summer and fall we could not get cars to transport the grain. We would like to haul out a percentage of the crop before navigation closes to get the best price, and then haul the rest in the winter.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN moved the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was agreed to .

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (Q) An Act respecting the Calgary and Edmonton Railway.—(Hon. Mr. Roy.)

Bill (11) An Act to incorporate the Saskatchewan Valley and Hudson Bay Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Roy.)

Bill (120) An Act to Encourage the Establishment of Cold Storage Warehouses for the Preservation of Perishable Food Products.—(Hon. Mr. Scott.)

Bill (30) An Act to incorporate the Woman's Art Association of Canada.—(Hon. Mr. Kerr.)

Bill (33) An Act respecting the Inspection of Meats and Canned Goods.—(Rt. Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.)

Bill (39) An Act respecting the Brockville, Westport and Northwestern Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Watson.)

Bill (45) An Act respecting the Athabaska Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Talbot.)

Bill (48) An Act respecting the Canadian Northern Quebec Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Choquette.)

Bill (50) An Act to amend an Act to confirm an Agreement entered into by Her late Majesty with the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada for the purpose of securing the extension of the Intercolonial Railway system to the city of Montreal.—(Hon. Mr. Scott.)

Bill (55) An Act respecting the Huron Ontario Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Frost.)

Bill (57) An Act respecting the St. Mary's and Western Ontario Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. McMullen.)

Bill (76) An Act to amend the Northwest Territories Act.—(Rt. Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.)

Bill (86) An Act respecting the National Transcontinental Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Scott.)

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (40) An Act respecting the Indian River Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Roy.)

Bill (H) An Act respecting the Quebec, Montreal and Southern Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Béique.)

CANADA CENTRAL RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. KERR moved the second reading of Bill (44) An Act respecting the Canada Central Railway Company.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—This Bill is not printed in French.

Hon. Mr. KERR—The intention was to have it printed in French, and I would like to have it go before the Railway Committee at once. I would urge my hon. friend not to insist on his objection.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—But I would not be doing justice to the other Bills, which have not been printed in French, which have been postponed, if I allowed this one to go.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I should be very much obliged in this particular matter, if my hon. friend would not persist in his objection.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Well, I am getting weak. We will say all right.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill read the second time.

DELAYED RETURNS.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I would ask the hon. Secretary of State if he would be kind enough to inquire if that return of July 10 last, relating to Lieutenant Colonel Boulanger ordered by this House is now prepared.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I shall do so.

The Senate adjourned until 3 p.m., to-morrow.

THE SENATE.

OTTAWA, Thursday, February 7, 1907.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

PRIVATE BILLS IN THE SENATE.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG from the Committee on Standing Orders and Private Bills presented their eighth report. He said : If the House will consent to suspend the rules, the report may be adopted at once, so that any Bills affected by the report may be proceeded with immediately. It might assist, in some cases, to advance Bills a stage. I am referring more particularly to Bills originating in the Senate. I may also say that the Standing Orders Committee adopted the principle at the meeting to-day, of recommending a suspension of the rules in cases where the notice required would expire next week ; that is that the last notice would appear next week, and therefore we felt justified in asking the House to allow a suspension of the rule, upon our receiving an assurance guaranteeing that the notices would continue and be completed next week in the papers in which it is necessary to publish them.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Supposing we adopt the report now, those Bills cannot be received to-morrow. They must be posted for eight days after the second reading, if originating in this House, and for twenty-four hours if they come from the House of Commons. I understood from the hon. gentleman that his special object was to advance Bills originating in the Senate. They cannot proceed. The report may be adopted, and the Bills may be presented to-morrow, but that will not help. I see no cause for urgency.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I was anticipating that possibly a motion would be made that the House suspend the rule with reference to non-contentious Bills if, as I understand, the Railway Committee is likely to meet to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That means a further suspension.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Not with regard to these.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It will involve another suspension, because it is proposed to do away with the eight days.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—For non-contentious Bills.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—How do we know that any Bill will not be contentious ?

Hon. Mr. YOUNG moved that the report be taken into consideration to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (S) An Act respecting the Accident and Guarantee Company of Canada, and to change its name to The Royal Accident and Guarantee Company of Canada.—(Hon. Mr. David.)

Bill (T) An Act to amend the Militia Act as regards the calling out of the active militia in aid of the civil power.—(Hon. Mr. David.)

Bill (U) An Act to revive certain patents of the Nichols Copper Company.—(Hon. Mr. Watson.)

CONTRACTS FOR SECTIONS OF NATIONAL TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON inquired of the government:

1. What portions, stated in sections and miles, of the eastern division of the National Transcontinental Railway have been placed under contract by the government up to the present time?
2. What is the nature of the work embraced in the contract or contracts referred to; are they for grading only, or does any of them include tracklaying or ballasting, or all three operations?
3. What will be the cost per mile of grading, tracklaying, stated separately or all three operations combined, on each section of the said eastern division embraced in the aforementioned contracts?
4. What is the maximum grade of the sections of the said railway embraced in the contract referred to?

And will at the same time ask similar queseions regarding contracts let by the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company on the western division of the said National Transcontinental Railway.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Questions one, two three and four have been already answered as far as they relate to the eastern division. The answers to the remaining questions regarding the western division are as follows:

1. (a) From Portage la Prairie, Manitoba, to range 14, west of the 2nd meridian, a distance of 275 miles.

(b) From range 14 west of the 2nd meridian to range 6, west of the 3rd meridian, a distance of 140 miles.

(c) From range 6, west of the 3rd meridian, to Edmonton, Alberta, a distance of 316 miles.

2. The contracts embrace the necessary grading and bridging; they do not include tracklaying and ballasting.

3. Grading will cost about $5,800 per mile, tracklaying $300 per mile and ballasting, including surfacing, $1,700 per mile.

4. Four-tenths of one per cent against eastbound traffic and five-tenths of one per cent against westbound traffic.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Is that the average cost of all these contracts?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, as I am advised by the Deputy Minister of Railways and Canals.

CONSTRUCTION OF LINE OF RAILWAY TO HUDSON BAY.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON moved:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency may be pleased to lay on the table of this House the orders in council of May 11, 1885, and March 5, 1895, alloting lands in the Northwest Territories under the authority of the Act of 1884, chapter 25, section 7, and all orders in council passed since 1895, relating to grants of lands for this purpose.

Also copies of all contracts between the Canadian Northern Railway Company and the government relating to the construction of a line of railway to the Hudson bay or any portion of the said line of railway.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is no objection to the address; but I call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that in looking over the files he will find that the order in council of the 5th March, 1895, has been cancelled by a subsequent order in council, and I assume the hon. gentleman would like to substitute an order in council instead of the defunct one.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I asked for all orders in council.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman's motion would not cover it, if I did not call attention to it.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Of course the hon. gentleman could not lay before us the order in council that was cancelled, but the subsequent order in council making the cancellation would come up under this motion.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Very well, let it go.

The motion was agreed to.

COMMITTEE OF INQUIRY AS TO RESOURCES OF NORTHERN CANADA.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS moved:

That the names of the honourable senators Roy, Legris, McDonald (Cape Breton) and McSweeney be added to the select committee appointed to inquire and report from time to time as to the value of that part of the Dominion lying north of the Saskatchewan watershed, east of the Rocky Mountains and west of the Hudson's bay; comprising the north parts of the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan and the Mackenzie Territory, its extent of navigable waters, rivers, lakes and sea coast, and that the said committee be permitted to meet and take evidence during adjournments of the Senate.

He said: With reference to the latter part of this motion, I understand the House is going to adjourn in the near future. There are several gentlemen here from the Northwest Territories who have very little to do in these vacations, and there are also several senators from the maritime provinces who will not find it convenient to get home. If this motion is allowed by the House, we will be able to call the committee together and take evidence during the adjournment. There are quite a number of witnesses to be examined, and I find it hard to get meetings of this committee, for the reason that we have only four working days of the week, and there are other committees whose work is accumulating. We want to finish up our work, and if the House will allow us to sit during the adjournment we will be able to get through with a great deal of what we have undertaken to accomplish.

The motion was agreed to.

DELAYED RETURN.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (C.B.)—I should like to know from the hon. Secretary of State whether a return called for on the 27th of April, 1906, respecting collisions on the Intercolonial Railway, will soon be brought down? A partial report was submitted, but the balance of the report has still to be produced.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I shall be glad to make an inquiry about it, and will give the hon. gentleman the information I get from the department.

THE SPAIN DIVORCE CASE.

The Order of the Day being called:

Consideration of the first report of the Standing Committee on Divorce, to whom was referred the petition of Osprey George Valentine Spain, together with the evidence.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I regret to say that even now, after a lapse of two weeks, the evidence in this case has not been distributed. I do not know exactly who is to blame for the delay. The hon. gentleman who leads the House is also head of the Printing Bureau, and, though he may not be personally responsible, he is the one to whom I have to make complaints. It seems ridiculous that after two weeks, and a very small amount of evidence too, we cannot get the report. I do not know what has caused this delay, and I would ask the leader of the government if he would be kind enough to take steps and see that the evidence in these cases is sent to the Printing Bureau, so that no unnecessary delay will occur in distributing the reports.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If my hon. friend will send me a memorandum of the case, I will have full inquiry made and will give him an answer to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I would ask the hon. gentleman to put on the same memorandum an inquiry as to why there is delay in the publication of the French versions of Bills that come to the Senate. Every day we are obliged to raise objections to advancing Bills a stage, because they are not printed. There is something wrong with the Bureau.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Can the hon. gentleman tell me any particular paper that was sent down to the Bureau, the printing of the French edition of which has been delayed? I would like to have the date of it in order to trace it, because in any inquiry I have made in the past I have found that the blame did not rest with the Bureau but with the officers of either House whose duty it was to prepare the translation. I would ask him to give me a memorandum of any particular case that he knows of.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I can give two from the minutes to-day.

The order was discharged and fixed for the 21st inst.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (O) An Act to incorporate the United Baptist Women's Missionary Union of the Maritime Provinces.—(Hon. Mr. Baird.)

Bill (41) An Act respecting the Manitoba and Northwestern Railway Company of Canada.—(Hon. Mr. Douglas.)

MALONE AND HOPKINS POINT RAILWAY BILL.

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being called:

Second reading of Bill (12) An Act to incorporate the Malone and Hopkins Point Railway Company.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN moved the second reading of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I object to the second reading of this Bill. It is not printed in French. I call the attention of the hon. Secretary of State to the fact that this Bill has been before us since the second of January. It is a Bill from the House of Commons, and it is not yet printed in French. That is a delay of eight days.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have taken a note of it.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—We are always inclined to blame the translators. I know it is very often a mistake ; they are accused unjustly and if the translators could be heard before this House they could prove that generally the fault is not theirs.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I do not accuse the translators ; I think they are all right. I accuse the Printing Bureau though.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman from Stadacona says he does not blame the translators. I do not blame the translators either, but if the translators would get to their offices in this building a little earlier in the morning and work a little longer, they would be still less to blame.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—At what hour do they come to their offices ? I heard an hon. gentleman say just now that they came about eleven o'clock in the day.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I have seen them here at eleven o'clock at night.

Hon. Mr. POWER—What were they doing ?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Working.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman should not be afraid, if he has any accusation to make——

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am not making an accusation.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman is making an insinuation, which is worse.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—What is before the House ?

The motion was agreed to.

EASTERN TOWNSHIPS RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL moved the second reading of Bill (42) An Act to incorporate the Eastern Townships Railway Company.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I object. I call the attention of the hon. Secretary of State to the fact that this Bill, which was presented to the House on the 13th January, is not yet printed in French. I refer him to page 185 of the Minutes.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is printed in French in the House of Commons form.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—We have not got it in French here. If it is printed in French, I do not see why we should not get it.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—I move that the Order of the Day be discharged and placed on the Orders of the Day for to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

CONCILIATION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN moved the second reading of Bill (F) An Act to amend the Conciliation Act, 1900. He said : In rising to move the second reading of this Bill, I desire to offer some arguments to the House why I consider it my duty to introduce it at all, and permit me in the first place to say that I have no personal animosity whatever towards organized labour in Canada. I admit that organized labour should have every privilege and liberty within the limits of our law that men are entitled to. I am not going to challenge their right to form such organizations as they have for the betterment of themselves individually or collectively, or yet for the purposes of striking, if they consider it their duty or in their own interest to strike ; but I do object to introducing foreign elements to encourage a strike, to excite our people when a strike has taken place or to encourage demoralizing action on the part of strikers under the circumstances that usually prevail when strikes take place. We have had experience in the matter of strikes for a great many years. When they take place, damage, as a rule, is done to property ; acts that are in themselves a disgrace to a civilized and law-abiding people take place, and very often personal injury is the result. We want to avoid everything that would lead up to a perpetuation of that condition of things in the case of strikes. I cannot see that there are any grounds whatever why our organized labour institutions should ask the right or privilege to bring foreigners into Canada to aid and encourage and incite strikes, and to direct the course that should be followed when a strike is on. When we want statesmen to manage the affairs of this Dominion, we do not send to the United States or to any foreign country for brains and ability to handle our domestic affairs. We find them within our own borders. Some of the best men we have had in Canada as statesmen were men who followed a very humble calling ; for instance the Hon. Alex. McKenzie was an ordinary stonecutter, but he rose from that to the dignified position of Premier of this country. In all matters of state we find amongst ourselves capable men to handle our own affairs. We find also that when our Canadians cross the border, as a rule, they are not hewers of wood and drawers of water. They occupy some of the best positions. In banking, in railways, transportation, and in many lines of business, Canadians are found occupying good positions in the United States. That shows that we have here ability sufficient not only to discharge the ordinary duties devolving upon us as a people, but when our people go abroad they are recognized as men of good, sound common sense, men who are able to hold their own in competition with any other class, or with any other people in the world. Under those circumstances, why should our laws tolerate the introduction of a foreign element to encourage or direct a strike ? Our law at present contains a provision that when a strike takes place, and a man who is conducting a business is absolutely stranded, without help to carry on his works, the law provides that he cannot bring in foreign labour; he cannot go to the United States and engage men to keep his business running. The law so declares. If the law treats the employer in that way, I should like to know why an employee should not be treated in the same way ? If the employer is prevented by the law from bringing in men when a strike takes place, and he is forced to allow his machinery to stand idle and his institution to remain inoperative, because he is not permitted by the laws of our country to go abroad and engage foreign labour to keep his business running, why should organized labour be allowed to bring agitators in, loud-mouthed men, that harrangue the strikers in their lodges, incite them to acts that are not within our law, excite them to the destruction of property and cause such consternation to fall upon us as a people, as has been exhibited in many strikes that have taken place in Canada? Let me, in the first place, refer to the strike that recently took place in Hamilton. There a most lamentable condition of things existed. The cars were prevented from running. People that were in the habit of going to and from their offices for miles from the centre of business, were compelled to find some other means by which to reach their business. Their families and wives and daughters had to trudge along in the mud in order to get down town to do business, and all because a strike had taken place. When the strikers had exhausted, to some extent, the ordinary means used within the limits of the law in trying to get from the Street Railway Company of Hamilton some recognition of the demands that they had made, they adopted illegal means, throwing stones and brick bats, smashing cars, destroying property of every kind, until the mayor was forced to read the Riot Act on the steps of the city hall, and then eventually the militia was called out for the purpose of putting down the disturbance that existed. The militia had to be sent to the city of Hamilton, and violence and injury was the result, and some people that were innocent, who had taken no part in the strike, had their property destroyed, windows smashed and damage of all kinds done to them. I contend that if, under our law in its present shape, such conduct is permissible, it certainly should be amended, so that people would not be permitted to repeat such violence and such disgraceful conduct as was exhibited in Hamilton.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him one question, just for information. Did the Hamilton strike originate from the United States ?

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I was informed that it did. I am credibly informed that an agitator from the United States came over and took part in and encouraged that strike.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—If that agitator had not come to Hamilton the strike would not have occurred. I am credibly informed that that is the case. Now, with regard to the Lethbridge strike, in western Canada, that was a most unfortunate affair. A strike that has brought about in Canada a condition of things that is most lamentable. People have been deprived of coal that is so necessary in a country that, above all portions of this Dominion, requires an abundant supply of fuel. The men would not mine themselves. They struck for higher wages, and shorter hours and certain conditions, and they would not allow others to mine. The result was that that condition of things lasted for some seven or eight months, well on into the winter. No supply of coal has been provided, and what have we got? People in the Northwest are suffering seriously. In many places they have been driven to such extremes that they have had to chop up their furniture and put it in their stoves to keep them and their children from freezing. They have burned lumber costing $30 a thousand. They have had to go out and knock the wires off the fence posts, chop the posts down and make them into firewood. The condition of things there is most lamentable, and it is to be hoped that that kind of thing will never again happen in Canada. But what was the origin of that strike?

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that that condition is entirely due to the Lethbridge strike?

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—Undoubtedly the coal strike contributed very much to it. We have had a very severe season of heavy snowfall and intense frost, perhaps more than the people were accustomed to in past years, but, after all, I contend that the coal strike has contributed very materially to the suffering that these people have been called upon to endure, and that strike would not have taken place if it had not been for the importation of foreign elements that organized, incited and encouraged those people. They belong to the United Mine Workers of North America coal organization, an organization that exists in the United States as well as in Canada. After the strike was declared, efforts were made to put an end to that strike. Every reasonable argument that could possibly be used was offered to put an end to it, with a view to supplying railways, settlers, and the towns with necessary fuel. The strike continued from week to week and month to month, and what was the result? The government were interceded with to use their best efforts if possible to put a stop to the strike. McKenzie King, Deputy Minister of Labour was at last sent west to negotiate with the men. He pointed out to them the disastrous results of the continuation of that strike, that the country was likely to suffer seriously if it was continued. He did everything in his power. He used every argument that could be offered for the purpose of trying to put a stop to it. After they had discussed it for some days, eventually they came to an understanding that a committee would be formed, and that committee should meet President Mitchell, who was in Minneapolis, living in a comfortable, lordly mansion, enjoying the comforts that, no doubt, surrounded him thinking nothing of the poor people in the western Canada, that were on the verge of being frozen to death. That committee went down to interview Mr. Mitchell and see if he would consent that the strike would be called off and Mr. McKenzie King the Deputy Minister of Labour of Canada, accompanied the committee to Minneapolis to see if, in addition to their persuasive arguments, he could do anything to bring about a settlement. He did not interview Mr. Mitchell, after Mr. Mitchell had a conversation with the deputation. The foreign labour leader at last consented to a suspension of the strike on the grounds that had been submitted by the committee. The result was that the strike was called off. Now, I ask this House, I ask this country, in view of the conditions that there existed; the humiliating position that our Deputy Minister of Labour was placed in when he had to interview President Mitchell in a foreign country to see if he would not consent to call off a strike in Canada, that had been originated, no doubt, from the United States and had been perpetuated from day to day and month to month because he had refused to allow any concessions, is it not time that the law should be so amended as to prohibit foreign interference in our labour difficulties? It is to be hoped that we may not have a repetition of those experiences in Canada in future. We have no hostility to our neighbours across the border. We want to live on the most friendly terms with them, but we want them to understand that in those things Canada can manage her own business and that it is not necessary that men of that stamp should be brought in here. If organized labour wants to get foreign money to assist them in their strike, there is nothing to prevent President Mitchell from using the banks and other financial institutions of the country that will gladly take any deposit they have to make and send their cheque to Canada. We are not going to say that they shall not send funds; we are not going to close any avenue of communication with them, but we want them to keep out of Canada under such circumstances and let us manage our own affairs. We say that by their coming here from time to time they have brought about a deplorable state of things at Hamilton, Toronto and other places. We had a strike in Victoria not very long ago, on the 17th of November last. There are two or three shipbuilding firms in Victoria and the strike was among their employees for an eight-hour day. The steamship 'Princess Victoria,' belonging to the Canadian Pacific Railway, got injured and had to be docked and several plates taken off her bottom to be replaced by new ones. She had been so injured that she was unseaworthy. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company advertised for tenders and received offers from shipbuilders in Victoria, Seattle and other places along the coast. The contract was awarded to a Victoria firm. Up to that time the men had been working nine hours a day. The shipbuilding firm in Seattle, whose tender had not been accepted, possibly took a little interest in the men who were working in Victoria. I do not say that they did, but I say it looked very like it. Immediately after the contract was awarded to the Victoria firm, when the vessel was on the stocks, and the company was under contract to put her in a seaworthy condition within a limited time, and when they had two other steamers in course of construction to be completed within a limited time, a demand was made by their men for an eight-hour day for which they were to receive nine hours pay. The firm had a meeting with their men and remonstrated with them for threatening to strike, drawing attention to the condition in which they were placed. They said: 'As you are aware, we took those contracts and are under obligation to cary them out. We have agreed with the Canadian Pacific Railway to have the 'Princess Victoria' ready for sea by a certain time. We have a similar contract for the other two vessels.' The labourers replied: 'We know all that, and that is the reason why we embrace the opportunity to strike and insist that the hours of labours shall be reduced.' Now, there was not another port on the Pacific coast where such a demand was made by shipbuilding labourers. In Seattle there was no strike, and no demand was being made for an eight-hour day. I ask the House to examine for a moment the position in which this shipbuilding firm and the city of Victoria as a competitive point were placed against all the other ports on the Pacific. No demand was made anywhere else but at Victoria for an eight-hour day.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—Were not the men in Seattle and other United States cities working under the eight-hour a day rule at the time?

Mr. McMULLEN—No, the time was nine hours, and there was not a firm in Seattle that had reduced the time to eight hours; nor has any of them done so yet, and I may add, nor has any firm in Victoria. The result of the strike was that the shipbuilding firm was forced to bring in labour from the outside to finish their ships, and when they did so they were interfered with. Everything that could be done was resorted to for the purpose of preventing those men working. The strikers exercised every influence, every threat, every device, to prevent the work going on, and it was a continuous fight every day. What was the result? When organized labour did not secure its end, the carpenters struck, then the blacksmiths, then the blacksmith's helpers. When they were asked 'What have you to do with the ship-builders? What particular interest have you in this war?' They admitted none. They were asked then 'Why do you strike?' and they replied, 'Our head organization is in Kansas city, in the United States, and we have received instructions from Kansas city to strike, in sympathy with the others that have struck.' They said they did not want to strike, and expressed regret at being obliged to obey orders from their headquarters. Under all those conditions, and many others that I could mention, it is time some change should be made whereby we could ourselves deal with disputes between capital and labour. There is no need for continuing connection with those foreign organizations, in view of the experience of the past. I have received, and I daresay a great many members of this House have received, letters on this subject—some of them opposed to the Bill. If it should be the decision of the House to give the Bill a second reading, I am quite willing that it should be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, with the understanding that parties on both sides shall have a full opportunity of being heard for and against the measure. I have a large number of letters which I had intended to read to the House, but I have come to the conclusion that it is better to submit them to the chairman of the committee to which the Bill is referred, and after hearing everything that can be said for and against the Bill, let the committee say whether it should become law or not. I feel strongly upon this question, but I want it to be distinctly understood that I have no personal animosity to organized labour. I wish them every success in Canada. I sympathize with our artisans and mechanics in all lines. I want to give them every encouragement, but I want them to exhaust all their own persuasive arguments and powers in bringing about a settlement of strikes before going to the United States or any other country and importing agitators to incite our people to violence and destruction of property, as was done in Hamilton and London and other places in Canada. In the city of Toronto, some years ago, dozens of cars were smashed on the streets, and the lives of people were endangered. That sort of thing has prevailed in the United States to such an extent that people there are waking up to the fact that some change is necessary. A short time ago, when I was in Missouri during the last adjournment of the Senate, I found that there was a Bill before the state legislature providing that any one interfering with any public utility shall be guilty of a felony, and liable to imprisonment for not less than two years and not more than ten years in a penitentiary. Public utilities, such as street cars, railway trains, telephones, telegraphs, coal mines, transportation steamers, &c., which are used by the public every day should be protected. The public should not be put to the inconvenience which results from strikes. They are not concerned in the matters which bring about strikes, and should not be expected to suffer when difficulties take place between the employers and the employed. Let those who are concerned in the disputes settle their differences under the Conciliation Act which is being placed on the statute-book The legislature of Missouri is acting very prudently in passing such a law, and I cannot see why objection should be raised to similar legislation for this country. It is but right that a man who deliberately interferes with or destroys a public utility, which the public need every day, should be held responsible for his conduct and made an example of by being sent to a penitentiary for a term of years. If we pass a law of that character, and administer it fairly, we will soon put an end to the perpetration of the outrages such as we have witnessed in this country of late years. I have mentioned some strikes which have taken place and which have been attended with violence and outrage. I could mention others, but I do not wish to detain the House. I ask hon. gentlemen to give the Bill fair consideration, and send it to committee where it will be thoroughly considered. I earnestly hope that the committee may report the Bill even if it should be in a modified form.

Hon. Mr. COFFEY—In the Bill now submitted for our consideration, it is sought to ben enacted that 'every one is guilty of an offence and liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding one hundred dollars who, not being a citizen of Canada and a British subject, in any way intervenes in a difference, whether existing or apprehended, between an employer or any class of employees and workmen or between different classes of workmen. Hon. gentlemen, this Bill is not of formidable proportions, but it looms large in importance, and were it given a place upon our statute-book would lead to results which no man can forshadow. I cannot follow the hon. member for North Wellington in the course he has deemed it proper to take on this question. I think it is a mistaken one, although he has presented his argument in favour of Bill (F) with all that characteristic earnestness and sincerety and firmness of purpose for which he is noted. The change which he has proposed to make in statutes now in force, or, rather, the additions which he wishes to have tacked on to them, would, it appears to me, produce deplorable results. There would be but a still louder and longer ringing of the tocsin of war in the industrial centres. Besides, there will not be wanting a very numerous class who will firmly hold the belief that such a step is retrogressive and ill-accords with that freedom of action, devoid of license, which is the legitimate pride of every Canadian. Furthermore, the passing of this legislation would undoubtedly ruffle the feathers of the American eagle and this were to be avoided save in cases where Canada's honour and Canada's rights are at stake. In this matter I do not think either one or the other is involved. It is of paramount importance to promote good neighbourhood between those who live on both sides of the boundary line. We have much in common —our aspirations and those of our American friends in the world's race for greatness run parallel. To some extent the weal of one in the world's race for greatness effects the weal of the other, and the cloud of ill-fortune that passes over the American republic casts a shadow also on the Canadian dominion.

If we take a broad survey of this question, the conviction will be forced upon us that were the contemplated additions made to our criminal law we would thereby have approved the principle that it were advisable to bring into requisition one kind of measure for dealing with trades unions working under international agreement and quite a different yard stick for those who come into Canada as the accredited agents of various firms or corporations whose field of action embraces both countries. If we are to deal with the masses in rough shod fashion, we should have a disposition of like character in dealing with the classes.

While the president of an international trades union may not come into Canada without running the risk of being dealt with as a criminal, the president of a corporation which lives and moves and has its being as a trust or combine finds no barrier erected to stay his progress or interfere with his freedom of action. While the president of an international trades union, who seeks to better the material conditions of his fellows, comes across the boundary line with the fear that he may be branded as a criminal, the ruling spirit of the federated captains of industry may come to us with light step because assured of protection, notwithstanding the fact that his visit is for the purpose of consorting with kindred spirits, in a carefully tylered room, who desire to give another turn to the screw that forces a yet greater flow of money into his coffers, the guiding principle being, in most cases, not how much it is fair to levy on the people, but how much they will endure. Are we to meet the budding Rockfellers of the great republic with smiles and open arms, and the John Mitchells with the frown and the warrant and the officer of the law? I hope the time will never come when liberty-loving Canadians will be so minded. Shame on the few who would pay unseemly and undeserved court and homage—I might almost say worship—to the winners of the furious race for wealth. Let no one, however, say that a smirch attaches to the man of goodly store who builded his fortune upon a foundation of honour and of justice, and of the gentleman's consideration for his fellows. Such a man, who snatched victory in the battle of the brains in the world's whirl of business, wears a crown of honour fairly won.

Another feature which it will be most difficult to explain to all who hold impartial procedure in honour, is that which renders criminal a course of action on the part of a citizen of the American republic while a precisely similar line of conduct by a Canadian is deemed quite legal. Surely this will naturally be deemed a fit subject of complaint, the ground work of an irritation which will but add fuel to a flame which we should strive by all honourable means to extinguish. But who are the men at whose heads this drastic legislation is levelled ? We will be told the walking delegates. The walking delegates are, however, for the most part, Canadians. It has happened that some of the American officials of trades unions who have come amongst us have been ill-chosen; that they were men of quarrelsome instead of conciliatory mould and have but added acrimony to the discussion having reference to better conditions for the workmen—and it were better for the wage-earners had such men not entered the arena. But here again we must distinguish. The number of those whose interference increases and intensifies industry's conflict is very small, while many clever, honest men—men of judicial temperament, seeking but justice—have been the medium of bringing about a truce and a declaration of peace between capital and labour. We can all recount cases of abuse on the part of union men. At times, some of them have taken a course which cannot be defended from the view point of law and order and justice. Cases may be cited too where they have been used to carry out some scheme initiated by a certain class of capitalists whose mode of acquiring wealth would, were every one given his due, land them behind prison bars. Cases may be cited, particularly in the United States where those calling themselves union men and officers of unions, have used their position to enrich themselves by inflicting injustice and suffering on capitalists and labourers alike. Cases may be cited where men have promoted a strike in one section of the continent, so that capitalists in another locality may be enabled to add to their store of ill-acquired wealth. But is it not indefensible, is it not a violation of the first principle of justice to endeavour to place the brand of criminality on the many because a few have been untrue to their trust and have taken their places with those who engage the attention of the detective force. It is too much the fashion to denounce trades unions because of the lawlessness of some of those connected with them. I have no sympathy for law breakers, whether they wear the home spun and move in the humble walks of life or whether they be of the class faultlessly groomed and belonging to the higher circle. I will hold no brief for the union man, or for the members of unions collectively who, while demanding what they call their rights, have but slight regard for the rights of their employers. I will hold no brief for the unionmen who uphold a principle and adopt a practice to which fair-minded men who scan the pros and cons without prejudice, cannot affix the seal of approval. I will hold no brief for the union man who in case of a strike disturbance casts a stone at his fellowman, forgetful and regardless of the fact that he thereby inflicts a more grievous wound on unionism. I have no words of palliation for the conduct of the law-breaker who, in the name of unionism, desires, by uplifted bludgeon, to terrorize those who demand freedom of action in pursuit of legitimate ends becoming free men in a free country; neither have I any defence for those who, in the privacy of their counting houses, run riot with the spirit of the law, and approach as closely to violating its letter as will render them perilously near the policeman and the hand cuffs. If choice had to be made, however, I would ask mercy for the poor man rather than for the rich ; because the former's action is oftentimes prompted by impulse, while that of the latter is deliberate, heartless and cowardly and too frequently, as we know in these our times, calling to mind the frauds committed in Toronto and St. Thomas, has been the means of bringing dismay and poverty and suffering and hunger and nakedness to thousands of humble homes, because the little store of labour's savings had been gambled and lost.

It has been the custom to place railroad employees amongst the most conservative of the industrial classes. I will ask the liberty of reading an extract from a resolution passed by Forest City Lodge, No. 240, of the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, which comprises the trainmen of the Grand Trunk Canadian Pacific and Père Marquette Railway, which I received this morning. Referring to Bill (F) the resolution declares that 'it would be the means of disrupting the good feeling between the employers and employees on Canadian railroads.' * * I would also ask the indulgence of the House to read a few extracts from letters I have received from other labour unions, bearing particularly upon the influence exerted by the delegated representatives of international unions in cases where strikes have taken place and in localities where such are threatened. The Brantford Trades and Labour Council write that, 'the records of the past show that many peaceful settlements have been effected and strikes prevented by the assistance rendered by union officials and agents from the United States.'

The Painters' Union of London claims that Bill (F) could prevent the members from acting in compliance with their constitution and debar them from the benefit of the advice and assistance of the international union officers, whose help in the past has been the means of preventing trouble and amicably settling difficulties and disagreement.

At a meeting of the Toronto Division, No. 17, Order of Railway Conductors, a body that stands in the front rank amongst the industrial classes of the Dominion, it was decided by a unanimous vote, 'to oppose Bill (F) as the members believe that should it become operative it would be very unfair to the Canadian members of the organization and a great injustice to the officers, who on all occasions, have proved themselves gentlemen in their dealings relative to boards of conciliation, or any other differences arising between employer and employed in the train service on our Canadian railroads.'

A strong letter of protest against the passage of Bill (F) comes to me from the printers, a body of men who are generally recognized as the most intelligent amongst the wage earners of Canada. London Typographical Union writes me that, 'Bill (F) would affect its relations with the affiliated bodies and unions, and the international officers could not fulfil their obligations.' I therefore feel satisfied, hon. gentlemen, that the addenda of Bill (F) to the criminal law are but arrows aimed at the heart of organized labour, and will promote, not a more desirable state of affairs, not relations more amicable between workman and employer, but a spirit of resentment, a spirit of disquietude that will open yet more widely the breach that now confronts us.

Apart from all these considerations, however, I hold that the measure introduced by the hon. member for North Wellington is inopportune, in view of the fact that legislation to promote better relations between capitalists and the industrial class is now under consideration in the House of Commons.

The legislation introduced by the Postmaster General has been conceived in wisdom. It is but a step, it is true, in the direction of a peaceful adjustment of trade troubles, but it is better we should go onward in measured paces, feeling our way. The structure that is upreared with undue haste is oftentimes neither strong nor enduring, and so it is with hasty legislation. Let us not by passing this Bill throw another bone of contention into the arena wherein contending factions are dressed up in battle array, but take our places with the Minister of Labour, who, with the premier and his colleagues, have undertaken the task of reconciling differences and interests that lie far apart, so that Canada's capitalists and Canada's workingmen may march onward with unity of purpose and due regard for each other's interests, and thus promote a spirit of peace and good will, respect for law and order, and love of justice and fair-play—confidence supplanting suspicion—mutual esteem taking the place of pride, of wealth on the one hand and the spirit of the leveller on the other—kindness and liberality, poured out in flowing measure to the industrial classes, strangling that delusive dream which beckons them far afield from those first principles that form the corner-stone of that true civilization which is of such vast importance in the building of a great commonwealth for the millions who are with us, and for the other millions who are turning their faces toward this land so rich in promise.

I beg to move, seconded by the Hon. Mr. Ellis, that this Bill be not now read a second time, but that it be read a second time this day six months.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—I second the motion.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—I rise simply to make a few remarks by way of explanation. Although I agree with almost everything which has been so well said by the hon. gentleman from Wellington, I think his Bill is not worded in accordance with his speech. His speech is better than the Bill; at the same time I think a great part of what he has said would apply more to a Conciliation Bill, which will be brought down before long, than to the present Bill. There is only one sentiment about strikes. We are all agreed upon the necessity of preventing disastrous strikes which may be a curse to the country, but let us for a moment consider the Bill as it stands. There are only two clauses in it. I think the first clause is good, so that I would like to have a chance to vote for the first clause when the Bill is before the Committee of the Whole at a later stage. What is the object of the clause? It provides that no person who is not a resident of Canada and a British subect can be appointed a member of the board of conciliation. I think this is a good clause, and why? Because the members of the board of conciliation are invested with judicial functions, and, consequently, they are obliged to act as judges and to judge according to our laws, and it is proper to enact that the members of that board of conciliation should be Canadians and British subjects, knowing our laws and subject to our laws. I think it is proper not to be judged by foreigners. That clause is good and should be preserved. I will have occasion to speak further on that point later on, but for the present it is not necessary. I think that the second clause is very objectionable, because it enacts that an act which would not be criminal if done by a Canadian and by a British subject, will be a crime if it is done by a foreigner. I am not ready to explain how that provision is contrary to the spirit of international law, but I have no hesitation in saying that it is improper to make such a discrimination between a foreigner and a British subject and a Canadian. The clause would be less objectionable if it applied only to those who come here to organize a strike. While I am not ready to say that I would vote for such a clause, because a strike is not declared by our law criminal, it would be less objectionable. If you read the clause you will see it applies not only to strikes, but to all kinds of deeds or acts or words. It says:

> Every one is guilty of an offence and liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding $100 who, not being a citizen of Canada, and a British subject, in any way intervenes in a difference, whether existing or apprehended between an employer or any class of employers, and workmen, or between different classes of workmen, &c.

I call the attention of the hon. gentleman from Wellington to the interpretation of that clause. What does it mean? It means, evidently, that anything which would be done, even with the best intention, by a member of a foreign trades union who would come here, even with the intention of settling difficulties, to prevent a strike, would expose him to a fine under this clause and to be punished as a criminal for doing something which, perhaps, would be in the interest of the country and of the strikers. I do not want to speak at any length upon this question, now, but I submit these objections to the hon. gentleman from Wellington and to the hon. members of this House.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—The hon. gentleman proposes to amend the Conciliation Act. I think it should be shown that the Conciliation Act has failed, and that his amendments are necessary. So far as I heard the hon. gentleman from Wellington—I was not in the House all the time he was speaking unfortunately—I did not hear him attempt to impugn that Act in any way. The hon. gentlemen who are interested in the question,—and I presume all hon. gentlemen are—if they will look at the published report of the Deputy Minister of Labour, will not find any reflections on the workings of the Conciliation Act. On the contrary, all that the deputy minister says seems to be favourable to the operations of the Act, so far as it has been applied. But I regret to say that the Act does not appear to have been used as extensively as, no doubt, was intended or hoped for by the hon. gentleman, Mr. Mulock, now a judge, who introduced the Bill. In the year since the Act came into force, 25 cases of disputes have been settled by arbitration, and thirty-seven by conciliation. In the last year only four cases were settled by conciliation councils. Of the various strikes which took place, 723 strikes in all, or 723 labour disputes in the six years since 1901, twenty-five were settled by arbitration, and thirty-seven by conciliation. There were four by conciliation last year. The largest number was in 1903, when fourteen cases were settled. It nowhere appears in the published document, so far as I can find, that any difficulty arose because of the way the Act was drawn. Now, with regard to the proposition itself, I think the hon. gentleman from Mille Isle (Hon. Mr. David) does not go far enough in his objection to it, because, as I read the Act, if the proposition which the hon. gentleman proposes were carried out, nobody outside of Canada could be called in as a conciliator. The intention is to exclude everybody, a British subject as well as anybody else, unless he is a resident of Canada. If a great dispute arose in this country, we could not call in Keir Hardie or John Burns or James Bryce, or the Countess of Warwick, or any of these eminent people on the other side of the water, who take a great interest in the workingman. The same thing applies also to the second clause, which my hon. friend discussed at more length. The side note to the Bill makes it appear that an alien is referred to, but the words of the Bill itself seems to me to cover the general statement that I have made, that no person could sit on the conciliation councils, unless he or she were a resident of Canada and a British subject. I think the hon. gentleman should have proved that the operation of the Act at the present time, has caused disputes, or has had some effect in producing disputes. That is as to the conciliation council, but as regards the general principle involved, I think that there is a disposition in this House—I do not wish to reflect upon the House, because every body is entitled to his own opinion—but there does appear to be throughout the House a great fear of labour. There is a great fear that, in some way or other, labour will create trouble to the country, unless its movements are suppressed, that if any sympathy is extended to it, there is likely to be injury, and there is a great fear of danger to the country because of this sympathy. Well, the man who looks over the course of history, not to go too far back, from the time of the introduction of the Christian era, will find all the great movements that mankind have sought to forward, have been resisted by people possessing wealth and exercising great influence. They seem to think it advisable to resist these movements. Yet these movements make their way, when founded upon truth and justice, or when they have a certain amount of truth and justice in them. I know it would not be fair to drag in the Reformation in this debate, but I would point hon. gentlemen to where it was thought necessary in the interest of the state to suppress religious views and opinions of men, those views and opinions asserted themselves in the end. The Chartist movement in England may be referred to. Almost all the reforms advocated by the Chartists are in effect to-day, except that the House of Lords exists and that we have not annual parliaments. All of these questions excited fear at the outset, and my hon. friend is excited by the prospective fear which he creates himself. If he is in earnest, why does he not go further, and protest against the investment of Canadian capital in the United States, or the investment of United States capital in Canada, or why does he not prevent our daughters from marrying United States men and our sons from marrying in that country? There are a dozen ways in which the principle might be applied. But it is not well to take labour and make it responsible for all the disorder that affects society. One word more. Each one of us, no matter whether a capitalist or a workingman, is desirous that the masses should be educated. We provide for education. We facilitate their education in every way. Do you suppose, when you have given the masses an opportunity for education and place the ballot in their hands, that an order should go out from this House preventing certain men from sitting on a board, and stop a movement which was intended, whatever mistakes have been made, to remedy the great wrongs of mankind. I think it is impossible to do so. The true way to correct revolution of any kind is to see that it goes in a proper direction, and does not go too far, but not to suppress it entirely. It is just like one of those bombs in which so much explosive is bound up, and when it is thrown does so much damage. It appears to me that no reasons whatever have been given to the House why this particular Bill should pass, no matter what becomes of the question when it is placed before us in the proper shape.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I have one word to say in regard to the legal construction of this Bill. I am afraid that the hon. senator from Wellington has not given sufficient attention to its construction. He has aimed at a certain thing, and I think he has overshot the mark to some extent. This Bill, if it were ever put on our statute-book, would be a most dangerous weapon in the hands of magistrates, who would side one way or the other, with capital or with labour. Laws should not be put into the hands of judges to be interpreted. Laws should be placed in the hands of judges to be applied. That is a principle which is not very well followed in our legislation, and in the legislation of many countries, but experience teaches me from day to day that it is a dangerous thing for any parliament or any representative body of men, to pass on the popular will, through their laws, into the hands of any one individual, whether he sits as a magistrate, or a judge in the superior court, or whether it is five or seven judges sitting on the Supreme Court bench in this country, or of any of the provinces. Their sole duty should be to apply the law. Now, how can any judge apply this law, within the meaning of the hon. gentleman who proposes it ? The fourth clause reads :

> Every one is guilty of an offence and liable, on summary conviction, to a fine not exceeding $100, who, not being a citizen of Canada and a British subject, in any way intervenes in a difference, whether existing or apprehended, between an employer or any class of employers and workmen, or between different classes of workmen.

Now, this is exceedingly broad, and I know no man on the bench who would like to be called upon to interpret it under all circumstances and all conditions. It says : 'Any one who in any way intervenes in a difference.' What is going to constitute a difference ? What is going to constitute an intervention ? Will it be by letter ? Will it be by a nod ? Supposing the organizer is deaf and dumb, he will use no words, but will have to use signs. Will a sign from a man under those conditions be interpreted by the judge as a criminal act ? For instance, the hon. gentleman from Wellington stated from his knowledge, having read or seen that a strike having occurred in British Columbia among the ship-builders that other trades dropped work, out of sympathy, with the strike because they had been ordered to do so from Kansas City. That strike might have been ordered by letter or telegraph. How are you going to deal with a case of that kind ? How is the judge to distinguish between these different methods and say which is criminal ? Remember it says 'in any way intervenes in a difference'. It does not necessarily mean a strike ; it may mean a difference of opinion between the employer and his employees about the work. If he says it should be done in one way, and the men say that it should be done another way, there is a difference. Drafted as the Bill is now, there can scarcely be any relationship between employer and employee that does not involve a possibility of the law being called in to settle these matters. Even an employer of labour, under this Bill, is not allowed to settle a strike unless he is a citizen of Canada and a British subject. I know many citizens of Canada who are not British subjects, who employ labour in this country. Under this Bill such employers would be guilty of a criminal act if they in any way intervened in a difference between their manager and their men. I know that the hon. gentleman does not mean that, but his Bill covers such a case and a judge would be forced, by the wording of the Bill, to prevent an employer who may be a citizen of Canada but not a British subject from settling a strike. Clearly the Bill over-shoots the mark. Then it prevents our fellow subjects throughout the empire from harmonizing with and aiding one another. Surely the hon. senator from Welington, and those who agree with him in the matter, would not declare that citizens of Canada, whether capitalists or employees, should not have the sympathy and co-operation of either capital or labour situated outside the limits of the Dominion ? We are an empire one and united, and what is the trouble of one part of the empire should be the trouble of all. Where help is required, sympathy should not be restricted to the locality where that aid is needed, but an even chance should be given to every part of the empire to take a hand in and help on any good cause. On that ground alone I would be opposed to the working of the Bill as it stands. I also find another obstacle: our government and our people are very anxious to secure capital from foreign countries for the building up of Canada, the developing of its resources, and construction of our great national highways. We are getting capital not only from Great Britain but from Germany, France, Belgium, United States and other countries. We have say, in the city of Montreal, a very large manufacturing concern, employing several hundred men. The president of that company, because he is not a citizen of Canada or a British subject, would have no right to consult with his employees with regard to difficulties that might exist in that factory. The Bill, as it reads, prevents that. Surely this House will not pass a measure of that kind? We have many concerns in Canada whose presidents live outside the Dominion. I know of one concern in which a very prominent English capitalist was elected president the other day. If he was asked to come here and settle a difficulty he would be infringing the Criminal Code of Canada, and liable to imprisonment if he consented. Surely the Bill goes beyond all reason and fairness. The first clause restricts the personnel of an arbitration or a conciliation board to citizens of Canada and British subjects. The arguments which avail and prevail against the 4th clause avail, and prevail against the first. Why? Because the experience of the past teaches us that it is not wise to limit arbitrators to the locality in which you live or the country wherein you reside. In large questions, governments generally take outsiders as arbitrators, and why should not labour, which is the vastest cause in this country or any other country, have a right to appeal outside of the limits of Canada for representatives on an arbitration board? They have done so in the past, and with very beneficial effect. A year or two ago there was an extensive strike on the Canadian Pacific Railway which was doing a lot of damage. I am informed by the secretary of the Labourers Association, that it was one of the largest in Canada, and I suppose one of the largest in the United States. He writes to me as follows:

120 Earl Street,
Kingston, January 22, 1907.

Senator Cloran,
The Senate, Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Sir,—I take the liberty of writing you to ask you, if you can consistently do so, to offer your strongest opposition to an amendment to the Conciliation Act, introduced by Senator McMullen.

This amendment, like an Act introduced by Senator Lougheed sometime ago, aims at making it an offence for a labour leader, who is not a British subject, to take part in any dispute, actual or apprehended, in Canada, and attaching a penalty.

Like all the railway organizations, ours is international, and in the settlement of our strike on the Canadian Pacific Railway some years ago, after eleven weeks of conflict the company offered, if we called off the strike, to re-instate every one not guilty of crime, in their former position, and meet us in six months and give us a schedule. Our president, John T. Wilson, had, before sanctioning the men's request to be allowed to quit work, doné his best to procure a peacable settlement, and had repeatedly urged upon the highest officials of the Canadian Pacific Railway, to submit the matters in controversy to arbitration, but in vain.

At the end of the six months stipulated we met the general manager, but on the question of wages we could not agree, and this time they agreed to arbitrate, the company choosing as their arbitrator, Mr. Gutelius, their chief engineer of maintenance-of-way, an American citizen; the employees choosing their president, Mr. John T. Wilson, also an American citizen, the third arbitrator being Sir John Boyd, the award giving us an increase of 20 per cent on former rates.

I can assure you the men believe they were very greatly benefited, by having as their arbitrator, their president, an expert, and whose service cost them nothing, whose interest was to do his level best for them. And I can speak with absolute knowledge, that far from fomenting strikes, in every case he has exhausted all means of procuring a peaceful settlement by appealing to presidents, vice-presidents, general managers, or any and every one in authorty to submit the differences to arbitration.

And it seems to us Canadians manifestly unfair to attempt to deprive us of the best expert help we can procure, without regard to boundary lines, whilst permitting corporations to import their experts without let or hindrance.

Trusting you can consistently with your sense of duty offer a successful opposition to Senator McMullen's proposed amendment, and thanking you in advance,

I am, yours very sincerly,
A. B. LOWE,
First vice-president, International Brotherhood of Maintenance-of-Way Employees.

Now there is the experience of railroad men who occupy such a prominent position in the railway world of Canada, and who over their own signatures, ask parliament not to place on the statutebook a Bill which would deprive them of the benefits of fair arbitration. I also received the following communications :

Hon. Senator Cloran.
House of Commons, Ottawa.

Dear Sir.—At our meeting of January 3, 1907, we, the International Association of Machinists, in regular meeting assembled, have passed the following resolution :

That we do hereby emphatically condemn the Bill 'F' before the House of Commons, and ask you to use your influence and vote to defeat said Bill, also to use your influence and vote in favour of Bill No. 32, as being in the interest of the people, trade, commerce, morals, and upbuilding of our country and the advancement of the shorter work-day for the labouring class. Hoping sincerely that you will give this your timely consideration and assuring you of our individual support in such matters.

I have the honour to remain,
Your truly,
WILL H. PATTON,
Secretary.

Montreal, January 11, 1907.

Hon. Henry Joseph Cloran, B.C.,L.C.R.

Dear Sir,—Pursuant to instructions of the District Council representing the carpenters' unions of Montreal, I take the liberty to present to you the following resolutions :

Resolved, that this council protest energetically against Bill 'F' by Senator James McMullen amending the Conciliation Act of 1900, and to request our representatives in the Senate and in the Commons to oppose the said Bill.

Be it resolved that the Senators and members of parliament representing this district be requested to support Bill No. 32 by Alphonse Verville, member of parliament for Maisonneuve, fixing the hours of labour on public works at eight per day.

Trusting that the above will meet with your approbation and that you will acquiesce to the desires of the workers.

I am yours respectfully,
JOSEPH AINEY,
Secretary.

Order of Railroad Telegraphers, Grand Trunk System, Division No. 1.

London, Ont., January 24, 1907.

Hon. Henry J. Cloran, Montreal, Que.

Dear Sir,—Kindly note the following resolution, passed by the Grand Trunk Telegraphers, re Senate Bill 'F.'

Whereas, Senate Bill 'F' has been brought to the notice of the Grand Trunk Telegraphers in the Dominion of Canada, and

Whereas, after carefully considering the same, we find that this measure, if enacted, would be detrimental to our best interests, peace and welfare. Therefore, be it

Resolved, that Mr. D. L. Shaw, our general secretary, be instructed to advise all members of parliament and senators, representing the territory through which this system extends in the Dominion of Canada, that the telegraphers on this system are bitterly opposed to the proposed amendments and additions such as is set forth in Senate Bill 'F.' and that we implore their vote and influence in the defeat of any such legislaton.

Yours very truly,
D. L. SHAW,
General secretary.

These are appeals which this parliament cannot resist, and I am positive that if they are of no avail, if they strike deaf ears—and I am afraid there are some here who have deaf ears to any request made on behalf of the labouring class of the Dominion—they will be heard in another place. The hon. senator from Wellington takes a false position when he points to riots and bloodshed which have occurred occasionally in strikes, and then condemn the whole labour movement. He might as well conclude because a bank manager has recently been convicted of robbing a bank that all bank presidents are theives. We may come to the conclusion that they are worth watching, not because this one person has been guilty of robbing the bank of which he was manager, but because neither bank presidents nor directors pay enough attention to the affairs of their banks. We have been able to prove on the floor of this House and it has been proved in the courts of New York, that other financial institutions, such as insurance companies have been systematically robbed by the men who managed them, but because one or two men have been involved in such crimes, we would not be justfied in saying that all insurance men are equally guilty. I do not say that labour commits no crimes, but where crimes are committed in the name of labour the criminal code is sufficiently strong to punish those individual acts. Let not parliament, on account of these individual acts pass a Bill to strangle their liberty of action and their means of doing right. The law gives no man a right to do illegal acts and it is strong enough to suppress riots and prevent the destruction of property. We are doing it to-day in the case of the Buckingham strike, where no foreign element was on the spot. I have no doubt if there had been wise heads to manage that strike, men accustomed to disputes between capital and labour, there would have been no bloodshed. The men in McLaren's mills, who left their work to strike, had no idea of organization, no idea of self-restraint. They had not been educated in that direction. They were freshly organized, and were not of the most highly educated class of workmen; the result was that in their ignorance, without any leadership, they rushed on until the fatal shots were fired, and lives were lost. But that is no justification for introducing this Bill, any more than the occurrences in Hamilton to which the hon. gentleman has referred. If I am not mistaken, the people of Hamilton, or the municipal authorities of that city, were just as much to blame as the strikers for the rioting and destruction of property. Had the municipal authorities taken hold of the situation firmly, the strikers would not have gone so far as they did, but these incidents are not a sufficient ground on which to pass legislation of this character. If the Senate responds to the appeal of the hon. senator from Wellington, and refuses to listen to us who oppose the Bill on behalf of liberty and fair-play, when the measure goes to the House of Commons it will get a very cold reception there. As I have already stated, this subject is occupying their attention, and I know the Minister of Labour will oppose this measure and have it defeated. He has publicly said so in his official position. In passing this Bill we would simply put ourselves once more on record as being opposed to the legitimate demands of the working classes of this country. We know before starting out that our object cannot be attained. Knowing before hand that this Bill will meet with a cold reception and a fatal blow in the House of Commons, we should not be called upon to place on our records an expression of a want of confidence in the working classes of this country. They have assembled peacefully and passed resolutions like any board of directors of a bank or of an insurance company. Those expressions have been sent to this parliament, and, I hope, on their behalf and on behalf of the peace, prosperity and liberty of this country, that this Bill as drafted may not receive the sanction of this honourable House.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—Objection is taken to the wording of the Bill. It may be that the language of the clauses could be improved, but when objection is taken to it on the ground that the president of a company could not interfere in a difficulty or between his company and its employers, I think the interpretation of my hon. friend is inaccurate. In that case, the manager would not be interfering with other people's business. It would be his own business and the consequence is he would be, under the law, within his right. The Bill does not contemplate anything of the kind suggested by the hon. gentleman.

My hon. friend from St. John has suggested that a feeling seems to exist in this body, unfavourable to labour. For my part I disclaim that imputation. I do not think any member of the Senate is opposed to the legitimate interests of labour. I for one, at the end of this discussion, may vote for the Bill, and I do not want to be saddled with such an imputation. Such a feeling does not exist in this Senate, and to my mind does not exist in the country. At the same time, we must admit that the question is very important. Different opinions in regard to the labour question may be expressed pro and con, and under the circumstances, it seems to me that the course proposed by the hon. gentleman from Wellington is worthy of careful consideration. Some of us may have ideas adverse to this Bill, but it seems to me the labouring men who have sent copies of resolutions to many of us should be given an opportunity to be heard. That is impossible before this House, but they can be heard before the committee; therefore let us refer the Bill to a committee where everybody will have an opportunity to express his views fully and furnish evidence in support of his contentions. For these reasons, I would vote for the motion made by the hon. gentleman from Wellington.

Hon. Mr. DeVEBER—I should like to preface the very few remarks I intend to make on the subject with a statement to the effect that, could I deem it advisable, or could I see my way clear to support the Bill of the hon. gentleman from Wellington, I would be a very happy man, indeed. There is something in it that appeals to me. It contains a sentiment and expresses an idea that should appeal to the patriotism of every Canadian, that is, that all bodies—I would go farther than the hon. gentleman from Wellington—that all bodies, corporate or incorporate, union or non-union, should be thoroughly Canadian, a self-governing body that would not have to go outside of the Dominion for advice. But there are times when sentiment must give way to calm reflection. There are occasions when patriotism even must give place to what may be for the common good. Whilst I agree with the principle of the Bill, I must oppose it because I think it is inopportune. We have in Canada to-day a great many mutual benefit societies. They are not exactly the same as unions, but very similar. When they were started in Canada, they originated chiefly from bodies in the United States. As they grew in wealth and importance, it became clear to them that it would be advantageous to them to be self-governing in Canada, and have Canadian jurisdiction. Amicable arrangements were made. There was not a discordant note, and the funds were distributed fairly. Now if this had been done by legislation, by some drastic measure, would there not have been some discordant note? I feel sure there would. I think that the labouring classes have brains as well as we have ourselves and it would soon come to them that it would be more advantageous to be self-governing than to be governed from abroad, and I do not think that the time is very far distant when foreign interference will be no longer tolerated. The strike game is a very peculiar game. I have played a good many kinds of games, and have come across a good many, but this is the only one I have seen where nobody wins and everybody loses. The capitalist loses the interest on the capital invested and which it should have earned. The labourer loses the wages he should have earned. The people of the community in which the industry is situated loses that part of the wages which would have been expended in that town, and the general public of the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan, who relied upon the mines of Lethbridge for their coal supply, were, owing to the strike in those mines, put to great inconvenience, and in many cases I believe lives have been seriously endangered. The question is how to put a stop to these strikes. Now, coming from a town where this strike occurred and having experienced a strike there once before, I have probably taken as much interest in the matter as anybody in Canada. I have studied the question very fully and have come to the conclusion that there is only one possible way to stop strikes, and that is by compulsory arbitration and incorporation of the unions. I might say that during last summer I have endeavoured in a quiet way to bring capital and labour a little closer together, to see if it were not possible for them to meet upon a common ground and unite in an effort to have laws placed upon the statute book that would be not only a simple solution of the question but provide a tribunal that would give a just, equitable and fair decision on every question arising between the labourer and his employer, and then put a stop to such strikes forever. I do not feel that I could give information on that subject at the present time. The conversations that took place between myself and others were somewhat of a semi-private and personal nature, and for the present I do not feel that I should put them before the House, but I can say that I have been more than pleased with the advance I have made, and if nothing turns up to prevent it, I think I see my way clear to legislation that will put a stop to these strikes. We must remember that the matter of preventing strikes by legislation does not lie in Ottawa; it is a purely provincial matter. There is a Bill before the House of Commons at present, introduced by Mr. Lemieux, that goes as far as this parliament can go in the matter. The rest must be purely provincial. What I fear about this Bill introduced by my hon. friend from Wellington is that it may create sufficient irritation to render all the efforts I have made during the past summer negative.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON moved that the debate be adourned until the 20th inst.

The motion was agreed to.

SPECIAL TRAINS ON THE INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired:

What is the name of the train despatcher of the Intercolonial Railway who, in consequence of a misunderstanding, according to the statement of the superintendent of that railway, took upon himself without any authority to have run, on the night of December 26-27 last, a special passenger train between St. Léonard Junction and Nicolet on the Intercolonial Railway ?

What are the explanations which this despatcher gave or can offer to the superintendent for having so acted in violation of the regulations of the Intercolonial Railway ?

At what hour did this special passenger train—to which the answer given to this House on January 30 last by the government relates—leave Nicolet ?

At what hour did it arrive at St. Léonard ?

At what hour did it leave St. Léonard again and at what hour did it arrive at Nicolet ?

Did another special passenger train run between Nicolet and St. Léonard and vice versa on December 27, 1906, the day of the election in the county of Nicolet ?

If this train did run, who asked for it, who authorized it, what was the number of trips that it made between these two localities and what were the hours of departure and arrival for each of these trips ?

What was the amount received for this train?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The instructions given over the 'phone to the train despatcher were, that he was to allow train 146 to proceed to Nicolet and not wait connections with train 153 at St. Léonard junction, on account of the latter train being one hour and fifty-six minutes late ; but to arrange for the branch train to return to St. Léonard junction for the passengers of train 150, if any. Owing to a misunderstanding of the said 'phone instructions, the special train referred to left Nicolet at 21.40 o'clock and arrived at St. Léonard at 22.40. It left St. Léonard again at 1 o'clock on the morning of the 27th, and arrived at Nicolet at 1.40. There was no other special train running between Nicolet and St. Léonard either way on December the 27th. On December the 29th, the day of the election, a pilot left St. Léonard on the arrival of train 150 for Nicolet and did regular work. It left St. Léonard junction at 11.55 o'clock and arrived at Nicolet at 12.45.

It may be added that the orders of the department are that no one is to be carried free, and no trains are to be run in connection with elections unless they are paid for as usual.

The department has no details of the December earnings.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is not an answer to my question. I asked for the name of the despatcher.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I see he has not included it. I will endeavour to find out who the despatcher was.

THE PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to refer to a conversation across the floor yesterday in reference to Bills Nos. 12 and 42. The hon. gentleman from Stadacona had, I think, on at least two occasions, objected to their being proceeded with because they had not been printed in French, and I stated then I was quite sure that on inquiry the fault, if any, would be found to rest, not with the Bureau, which seemed to create a little merriment in the House, and some observations were made about the translators, but somewhere else. Those two Bills came from the House of Commons on Wednesday, the 30th of January. They were, presumably, printed in French in the House of Commons, so the work of translating could not have been a very serious matter. About the time we were discussing it yesterday the French edition was sent to the Bureau. Dr. Dawson says, in answer to my telephone message, 'With regard to your questions, the Malone and Hopkins Point and the Eastern Townships Bills are both in the same state. The copy of both did not arrive until 3 p.m. to-day,' about the time we were discussing it. The copy was sent to the Bureau last night. The proof was returned this morning, and the Bills will be printed in French this afternoon.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—We have not received them yet.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We could not; the proof was only sent to-day. They cannot print until some responsible officer certifies or signs off that the Bill is in proper shape to be finally printed. Sometimes they have to send two or three revises. In this case the final proof was only sent up last night and returned to-day, and is now being printed off.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (V) An Act respecting the Temiscouata Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Tessier.)

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (Q) An Act respecting the Calgary and Edmonton Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Roy.)

Bill (30) An Act to incorporate the Women's Art Association of Canada.—(Hon. Mr. Kerr.)

A SUPPLY BILL.

FIRST, SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (96) An Act granting to His Majesty a certain sum of money for the public service for the financial period ended March 31, 1907.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This is a Bill to meet Canada's contribution to the sufferers by the recent disaster in Jamaica. Part of the amount has already gone forward in the way of necessary supplies; the rest will be forwarded in cash. I move that rules 22, 24 and 63 be suspended as regards this Bill, and that it be read at length at the table. It is necessary that the Bill should be put through all its stages as quickly as possible and receive the Royal Assent.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second and third time, and passed.

BILLS ASSENTED TO.

The Honourable the Speaker commanded the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod to proceed to the House of Commons and acquaint that House :

'It is the Deputy Governor's desire that they attend him immediately in this House.'

Who being come with their Speaker, the following Bills were assented to :

'An Act respecting patents of William A. Damen.'

'An Act for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial period ending March 31, 1907, to which Bill I humbly request Your Honour's assent.'

The House of Commons then withdrew.

The Senate adjourned until February 19 at 3 p.m.

FRENCH TRANSLATION OF REVISED STATUTES.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY called :

The attention of the government to the following declaration made on December 4, 1906, by the Honourable the Secretary of State in relation to the French version of the revised statutes, 1906 :—

'Hon. Mr. Scott—I understand they are making rapid progress with it (the French version). Additional translators are employed, and it is hoped it will be ready on the 1st of January.'

And will ask :—

The 1st January being now passed, is the French version of the revised statutes, 1906, ready ?

If not, when will it be ready ?
How many additional employees have been working at that French version ?
What are their names, and how many days have been employed at that work ?
When will the French version of the revised statutes, 1906, be ready ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—When I made the observation that rapid progress was being made with the French version, and additional translators were being employed, it conveyed, I think, what I meant to say, namely, that the translation was proceeding rapidly and would be finished some time in the beginning of January. I am correct in that. The translation was finished about the beginning of January. The French version is now being printed at the Bureau. Between 250 and 300 copies are already in type. It is quite impossible that it can proceed at a very rapid rate, because the proof-reading necessarily will be confined to the expert, the gentleman who revised the translation, and, therefore, it will be very difficult indeed to print off rapidly. The printing might be done much more quickly probably than proof-reading. I understand the proof-reading is proceeding as rapidly as one can fairly expect, but it must take some months yet before it can be completed. Hon. gentlemen must recollect that it means nearly 4,000 pages of matter that has to be got up with unusual care. It cannot be done in the slip-shod way in which ordinary printing is performed. It is the laws of the country, and even the expression of words has to be weighed and considered before finally settling on the proper words. That is the condition of it. Just as rapidly as the proof-reader and the printer can carry it out, it will be done, and no time will be lost.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman has not answered my question. I asked how many employees are working on that translation ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have had nothing to do with the translating. When I spoke before, I understood that an additional man had been employed from Montreal ; but necessarily the translating must be in the hands ultimately of one person. One person only must be responsible for it ; you cannot divide it up. Even the English copy, revised by a number of gentlemen, must be finally revised by the Deputy Minister of Justice and, necessarily, work of that kind, particularly the French version, must be done under a gentleman who is capable.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I would ask the hon. gentleman to let this question stand.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It has stood twice already. I cannot give any more information. I have been absolutely frank, but I am not a prophet. I have represented all the difficulties in the way, and shown that every effort is being made to meet the views of the hon. gentleman.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I am very thankful for all the trouble the hon. gentleman has taken to answer my question, but had he read the motion I think he would have been able to give the information I want. I asked how many translators had been employed to do that work, and, without being a prophet, the hon. gentleman could have answered that question.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I did answer it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—When I asked the names the hon. gentleman might have given the names. If the information is available it should be given. The hon. gentleman either did not read my motion or he is not willing to give the information. I think the House is entitled to an answer to this question.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This is the third time the hon. gentleman has put this question. I answered the question in the beginning. I stated that an additional translator had been engaged from Montreal to help Mr. St. Louis. Mr. St. Louis must sign off the proof himself and be responsible.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If I had asked my hon. friend from de Lanaudière he could have given the name.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not know his name.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman from de Lanaudière will be able to give all the information. Though he is not a member of the government, I think he wants to be. Although he is not a member of the government, he is able to give all the information asked for ; the government is not able.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will make a special inquiry to find out the gentleman's name. I am sure the hon. gentleman himself knows who it was, and it is just a puzzle for me. I understand it is a Mr. Antonio Perrault, an advocate of Montreal, who is the additional man.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I would ask the hon. gentleman from de Lanaudière to answer the other question as to the number of days he has been employed, and the salary paid, all things which are quite pertinent and which the government cannot answer.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière)—So far as the number of days they have worked is concerned, they have worked every day. The salary received by Mr. St. Louis will be shown in the Auditor General's Report.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think this question should be allowed to stand, and the hon. gentleman from de Lanaudière will be kind enough to get the necessary information for to-morrow or the day after.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—In the matter of the translation of our revised statutes from English to French I understand the difficulties in the way of the government. It is no easy matter to properly and perfectly translate the laws. In my opinion the translation of both versions should have proceeded together, so that the French translators might be in contact with the English officials preparing the revised edition. In that way, not only would the two versions perfectly agree, but even for elucidating some parts in the English version that needs must be obscure, the French translators having to translate from the English would detect some obscurities which will of necessity escape the notice of the English writers. In that manner the two versions would have been ready at the same time, and the French version would have been closer to the English text, and even the English text might have been made clearer. That has not been done. I am not prepared to find fault with anybody; I know the difficulties that stand in the way. That not having been done, I commend the government on having employed proper persons to translate our laws or proposing to have such persons.

The idea of having one person responsible is a good one; in my opinion the translation of our codified laws must be under the supervision of one who will have the responsibility of the whole work. I call the attention of the government to the fact that no one but a trained translator can do the work. No lawyer in the land, no writer in the land, even if he knows the English language better than the trained French translator, can do the work. If we wish to have the work properly done, we must give the job to a man who is fitted to do it, even if we have to pay well for it. Then we may very properly have a jurist from Montreal or some other place to go over the work and see, from a judicial and practical point of view, whether any errors have slipped in. If you desire to have a monument that can be regarded with respect by foreigners, from France—and splendid French scholars are to be found the world over,—we must employ a man who is competent to perform the work. The work should be homogenous, and should be performed by a trained man. In my opinion no one but a trained translator is competent to do it.

FEDERAL AID TO CANADIAN NORTHERN RAILWAY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON inquired:

1. At what point on the Canadian Northern Railway between Winnipeg and the northern boundary of Manitoba, did the federal aid in land begin to apply and where did it end?
2. Has the aid in land to the Canadian Northern Railway been given on that portion of their line to Prince Albert extending from the boundary of Manitoba to the Hudson bay junction, and if so, how many acres of land were given per mile for that portion of the railway in question?
3. How many miles of railway are there between the Manitoba boundary and the Hudson bay junction?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The answers to the hon. gentleman's questions are as follows:

1. The Canadian Northern Railway Company earned land subsidy by construction of its railway line from Beaver to Gladstone, Gladstone to Winnipegosis and Sifton Junction to provincial boundary, all in Manitoba.

2. Aid in land at the rate of 12,800 acres per mile has been granted to the Canadian Northern Railway Company on that portion of the company's railway line to Prince Albert extending from the boundary of Manitoba to Erwood in Saskatchewan.

3. About thirty-two miles.

FORMATION OF ICE BRIDGE AT CAP ROUGE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired:

Has the steamer 'Montcalm' this year prevented the formation of an ice bridge on the River St. Lawrence, near Cap Rouge, and does the government know that its vessel has twice already just escaped being shut up in the ice, the accumulation of which, blocking the river in that locality, has thrown across a natural bridge between the two banks of the St. Lawrence ?

Does the Minister of Marine and Fisheries intend to renew, next year, experiences which up to this day have only resulted in the most complete failure ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The answers to the hon. gentleman's questions are as follows :

1. The 'Montcalm' prevented the formation of the ice bridge on the River St. Lawrence near Cap Rouge, this winter, until January 25, when in spite of every effort of that steamer the ice bridge formed.

The 'Montcalm' continued working, cutting from New Liverpool up to opposite Cap Rouge village, a distance of three miles, but owing to the immense thickness of the ice it was considered advisable to abandon further work.

This vessel was shut up in the ice two years ago but not during the present winter.

2. The experiences have not resulted in complete failure.

Although two years ago during a very severe winter, the ice bridge formed, the 'Montcalm' was able to open it up in the spring in time to prevent floods and to ensure navigation not being delayed.

Last year the 'Montcalm' was completely successful.

This year we hope that sufficient work may be done as soon as the ice becomes weakened, to open the bridge so that navigation will not be delayed, and that the loss and misery caused by flood will be prevented.

EMPLOYMENT OF FOREIGNERS IN MILITIA SERVICE OF CANADA.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY moved :

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that His Excellency will be pleased to cause to be laid before this House, a statement showing the names, christian names, age, and country of origin of all persons who, coming from the British Isles, from English colonies or from other foreign lands, as strangers to Canada, have been placed, whether by order in council, by decision of the Militia Council, or otherwise, in any branch whatsoever of the military service of Canada, in the permanent force or in the volunteer force, together with the date of each of these appointments, the nature of the employment, the rank of the holder (before and after his appointment), and the yearly amount which he receives for his services.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I call the attention of the hon. mover to the phraseology of his motion. He uses the words 'British isles, from British colonies, or from other foreign lands.' I think this House will not commit itself to describing the British colonies as 'other foreign lands'.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Expunge the word 'foreign'. It may go with Lord Dundonald.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The word 'other' will be struck out.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman recognizes that Lord Dundonald was not a foreigner ?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I never described him as a foreigner.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The government did.

The motion as amended was agreed to.

PURCHASE OF DREDGE 'GALVESTON.'

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired :

When was the dredge 'Galveston' bought ? From whom and at what price ?

When and where was it delivered to the Canadian government ?

Was it employed at once in the deepening of the River St. Lawrence or was it necessary to cause it to undergo repairs or improvements that were thought necessary ?

When and where did those repairs take place ?

Of what nature were they ?

How long did they last, and how much did they cost ?

Who is in command of this dredge, and how many persons compose the crew, properly so-called, and the staff on board ?

How much did the keep of this dredge cost, as a daily average, during the last season, distinguishing from the ordinary cost of the work of this machine, and from its expenditure of coal, what the salaries of the crew has absorbed ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The answers to the hon. gentleman's questions are as follows :

1. April 20, 1906. Messrs. H. E. Moss & Co., ship brokers, Liverpool, England, £30,000 with interest to date of payment.

2. April 20, 1906. New Orleans, La., U.S.A.

3. The vessel was docked to fit her for the voyage to the St. Lawrence. The docking, repairs, and outfit at New Orleans, and wages to June 2, when she sailed, and supplies and wages to Quebec, all included, cost $10,942.14.

4. Captain Zéphirin Caron. The crew numbers 28, but there is no staff on board.

5. The cost cannot be made up complete until the close of the fiscal year.

The daily salaries of the crew amounted to an average of about $38.

DEEPENING OF THE ST. LAWRENCE AT BEAUJEU BANK CHANNEL.

INQUIRY

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired :

When did the dredge 'Galveston' commence to clean out and deepen the River St. Lawrence at the locality known under the name of the Beaujeu bank channel, opposite Crane island ?

What is the depth of the river at this place at ordinary low tide ?

Is there another channel to the south of the Beaujeu bank ?

What are its width, length and depth at ordinary low tide ?

For how many days during last summer and last autumn did the dredge 'Galveston' work ?

For what extent and to what depth has the Beaujeu bank channel been deepened, and how many cubic feet of earth have been taken away ?

Is the bottom of the river at this locality sandy, argillaceous, calcareous with or without boulders, and of what nature are the sedimentary deposits and shingle, if there are any ?

When does the government expect to finish the deepening of the river at this locality, the Beaujeu bank channel, and does it intend to supplement the 'Galveston' with an additional dredge ?

What is the name of the latter ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The answers to the hon. gentleman's questions are as follows :

1. August 11, 1906.

2. The original depth on Beaujeu bank at low tide was 21 feet.

3. Yes.

4. Width 1,500 feet, length 4 miles, depth 3 fathoms (18 feet).

5. 50 days.

6. 100,000 cubic yards were removed.

7. The bottom of the river is sandy and argillaceous, but not calcareous. There are some boulders. All the sand and clay is a sedimentary deposit. Borings did not reach the bottom of the sand and soft clay.

8. The work will be completed as soon as possible. A second dredge is being constructed at Sorel for this work.

9. 'Beaujeu' or 'No. 8'.

THE LATE SENATOR HINGSTON.

The SPEAKER—Hon. gentlemen, It is with profound regret that I have to announce to the Senate the sudden death of one of our most esteemed colleagues. A telegram just received conveys the sad news of the demise of Sir William Hingston.

I was yesterday for an hour in the company of the late senator, who seemed to be in good health and in his usual good spirit.

The country mourns the loss of one of its best, its truest and most valuable citizens. He shed lustre on his profession. His name and reputation were known beyond the seas. He was beloved by all for his many virtues and his ideal christian spirit.

A good friend and wise counsellor has gone. We had met at the threshold of my life and our contact had never ceased. As he departs this world it is my sad duty and my privilege to bid an official farewell to one who welcomed me into this life.

Our sympathies go forth to his family in their bereavement.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am sure I speak the views of every hon. gentleman present, when I say we all heartily concur in the very beautiful tribute just read by the Speaker, on the death of our distinguished friend the late Sir William Hingston. It was, I am sure, a great shock to every member of this body, as it was to myself, when at about the hour of twelve o'clock to-day the wires communicated to us the sad intelligence that our friend was no more. It seemed hard to realize that one of our colleagues who sat at one of the desks within my view, just before the adjournment, should now be in the other world. Although in his 78th year, he had a well preserved constitution, and it seemed that there was a long future still open to him. His life had been well cared for. He did not seem to be affected by any malady, and for that reason the shock was all the more severe. His death reminds us of the saying of Burke 'What shadows we are and what shadows we pursue.' Certainly no one would have anticipated the death of Sir William Hingston when they saw him in his seat the day before the adjournment of this House. As has been observed by the Speaker, he stood in the first rank of his profession. He might be called, so far as the medical profession is concerned, a citizen of the world, having held diplomas not only in the mother country, but in France, Austria, Germany and many other parts of Europe. We all remember his carefully worded addresses in the Chamber when he spoke. It was no expression of hasty judgment. He deliberated on what he proposed to submit to us, and his words were, I might say, always full of wisdom. To myself his death is a very great loss. I had, like many other senators probably, a personal attachment to Sir William Hingston. He was a very loveable man. All we can do now is to tender our deepest sympathy to a sorrowing wife and to his children who loved their father so deeply.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I am sure that every member of the Senate will fully agree in the remarks which have been made by the hon. leader of the government with reference to the death of our late colleague Sir William Hingston. The sentiments which he has so very fitly expressed in so sympathetic a manner, I am sure, will be the sentiments of every hon. member present. Death is always sad, sad when it comes to those whom for some time it may have made its imprint, but particularly sad when it suddenly extinguishes a life that gives promise of future years of usefulness and service. Few men were better known in Canada than the late Sir William Hingston. Few have been more closely associated with the interests of the metropolitan city of Canada, Montreal, than our late colleague. There was scarcely a phase of the life of that city with which he was not prominently identified. In its civic, its social, its professional, and its religious life, Sir William Hingston was ever found occupying a very prominent position. In the religious and benevolent institutions of that city, he stood in the foremost rank as one of the most useful and sincere members. In the professional and in the scientific life of that great city, he occupied an advanced position. In the financial interests not only of Montreal but of Canada he always occupied a most commanding place. For many years he was closely identified with the municipal institutions of Montreal, and the people of that city, as evidence of their appreciation of his ability and worth, elected him to the office of chief magistrate, the duties of which he discharged with the sagacity, ability, and dignity which few others have manifested. For many years he was a prominent member of this Chamber, and I am satisfied that the Senate of Canada has sustained a very severe loss through his death. His experience in the many public interests with which he was connected, his counsel, his dignity, his affability, his uniform kindness, his courtly bearing to all, could be equaled by few, and I am sure that these particular characteristics will be remembered and missed by those of us who for many years have had the good fortune to be associated with him. Every member of the Senate will agree with me when I say that the parliament of Canada, through the death of Sir William Hingston, loses one of its most worthy and esteemed members.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I feel sure that this honourable House will bear with me for a moment while I attempt to lay a flower of gratitude upon the cold brow of our departed colleague. Dr. Hingston has been known to me since my babyhood and into manhood. He has saved me from many a physicial pain, and from death about four years ago. He has saved and prolonged the lives of many members of my family, and it was with a great deal of feeling that I heard to-day he is no longer on earth. His body is, but his spirit is gone. I have known him now fully 50 years, since I was a baby, and have always known him to be a man of constant kindness, a man who has during the past half century played a role which does credit not only to the city and the province from which he came, and in which he died, but to the Dominion at large. His role has been a notable one from every point of view. It has been to show to this country what a devout christian can be and can do; what a noble citizen can do for his fellow man, and what a conscientious scientist can do in the face of the divine ideal. Sir William Hingston has gone to his grave with the tears of thousands shed over his bier today. He was a friend of the poor, of the lame, and the halt. He was the friend of one of the largest charitable institutions on this continent, probably in the world. He was the soul of that famous institution, nay the life of Hotel Dieu, Montreal, which cares for the poor, for the maimed, for the diseased and for the suffering. For the past half century and more, he has given all his services, as man, as medical practitioner, as scientist, free of charge. He was beloved, I may say adored, by all those who came in contact with him suffering. They had confidence in his skill and conscientiousness, and that is why I say he was a living example of a devout christian, of a citizen who had every trait of nobility in his character, and of a scientist who was not afraid, as others are, to admit that science can advance and prosper, and man can work out the enigmas of nature without refusing to believe that there is a Supreme Being guiding this world. Sir William Hingston has left behind him foot-prints which will last, which are impressed not in sand, but in the hearts of his fellow countrymen, which will remain in the pages of our history as those of a citizen without a superior, and I may say without an equal. His sun has suddenly set, but it has set behind a mountain of noble deeds and bright example, and I quite agree with the hon. Speaker of this House when he says this country has lost an illustrious citizen, one in every sense of the word, whom the poor deplore, one whom science regrets, one of whom the citizens will say would that we had more to give honour and dignity to this Canada of ours.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—I take this opportunity of addressing a few words to this honourable House, because I am a member of the profession to which the hon. senator belonged, and because I am intimate with his history, professional and public, for the last forty years. I am sure that hon. gentlemen share with me the sudden and painful surprise which the announcement of his death has occasioned. He left this House on the previous meeting apparently in his usual health, erect and dignified as formerly, and no one anticipated that such a sad event was to occur. The records of this Senate are full of the names of noble men, of men who have won fame and honour on the political field, of men who have won fame and honour in other walks of life ; but probably there are not so many of those who were honoured for their deeds in professional and other life with equal benefit to their countrymen, as well as political. In the discussions we have had about the uses of the Senate, among other uses suggested was this, that from time to time citizens who have done honour to the country by their intellectual power or their achievements in the arts and sciences, who had shed a lustre on their country and been beneficial to their fellow citizens, might be called on, as the House of Lords is honoured by the presence of Lord Kelvin and others. If any man representing this class were to be placed in the Senate, there was no mistake made when Sir William Hingston was appointed. The circumstances under which he was called to the Senate I have nothing to do with, but I say the gentlemen who appointed him have reason to be proud of their choice, for no more honoured name is on the records of this House than that of Sir William Hingston. I only wish to speak now of his great merits as a physician and surgeon. He occupied the highest rank in the profession and was looked up to in every scientific treatment. His opinion was listened to with the greatest respect and his efforts on behalf of science were of the greatest value. He was honoured not only in this country but in the United States. There, at the conventions of the highest bodies of the medical profession, he always received the highest honours they could confer. The medical and surgical professions of Great Britain invited him to address them on the important subject of surgery at one of its open meetings. He obtained also the highest honour that a member of the medical profession can receive, namely, a fellowship in the Royal College of Surgeons in England. He had obtained other honorary degrees, but these only serve to show that his fame was not confined to his own country, but had spread into other lands. I think that he was worthy of all these honours. No man wore them with greater dignity and more to the gratification and satisfaction of his countrymen than he did. His honours now are not of much avail to him; his fellowships and doctors of cannon law and doctors of literature can be of no benefit to him, but they will be a benefit and honour to his family. What will be an honour and benefit to him will be the thousands of patients whom he attended. The thousands of poor people whose wants he listened to, and whose diseases he alleviated or relieved. They are the only degrees that he may look for now, and these are the only ones that will be of benefit to him. He has these in abundance, and we need not, therefore, be any way doubtful as to what his future will be. In the announcement which the housekeeper made to me of his sad death, he mentioned to me one panegyric which was more comprehensive than any I heard. It was 'From the crown of his head to his toes he was a gentleman.' That word 'gentleman' applied in its truest sense to him—in the sense of the unselfish man, a man who values his own honour and character, who takes every possible precaution not to see it sullied, and who resents in the most prompt and determined manner any insult. At the same time, he was ever willing to grant to others the rights which belonged to them, always willing to assist the humble and those in want. Sir William Hingston possessed those qualities without any modification or qualification whatever. He was a gentleman in the fullest sense of the word, and I trust that the great gifts which he possessed, and which were so honourable to him, will be as nothing compared with the reward which we are sure he will attain—which he has already attained to in a better world.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I do not usually rise on an occasion of this kind, but I feel impelled to add a word, not in the way of eulogy of our late lamented colleague's career—that has been so well and ably treated by the hon. gentlemen who have proceeded me—but to say a word with reference to his demeanour and conduct and service in this House. I have heard him on many occasions make speeches that were well prepared and thoroughly thought out, and have no hesitation in saying that any one who will go back through our debates and read these speeches will find them well worthy of perusal and well worthy of re-persusal. A short time ago he mentioned to me that he contemplated making a speech on a suitable occasion in this House with regard to the maintenance of dignity and decorum of the Senate. I know he had that speech prepared. He consulted me about delivering it in this House, I think, the second last day he was here, but it was considered that the day was not opportune and it was not delivered. I regret, as I am sure every hon. gnetlemen who hears me make the statement, does, that that speech was not delivered, because, coming from a man like Sir William Hingston, it would have been beneficial to every one of us. We have not heard that speech, but we have his example before us. We can remember that magnificent example during the time he was a member of the House and we will do well if we follow it.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (13) An Act respecting La Compagnie du chemin de fer de Colonisation du Nord.—(Hon. Mr. Thibaudeau, De la Vallière.)

Bill (24) An Act respecting the Orford Mountain Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Mitchell.)

Bill (29) An Act to incorporate the National Accident and Guarantee Company of Canada.—(Hon. Mr. Coffey.)

DELAYED RETURNS.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to inquire of the hon. minister if he has an answer to give to the inquiry I made on Friday, February 8, regarding the name of the train despatcher of the Intercolonial Railway, who, in consequence of a misunderstanding, according to the statement of the superintendent took it upon himself, without any authority, to run on the night of December 26-27 last a special train from Nicolet to St. Honoré.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I sent over to the department, and they declined to give the name. They said it was an inadvertance on his part, and they did not think the name should be made public.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Could they give the explanations which he offered to the superintendent for having acted in violation of the law ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think I stated when the question was first asked that it was an error of judgment, a misapprehension. Those things will occur sometimes, even with the most perfect men. I do not think there is anything further that I can say to the hon. gentleman in regard to the matter.

TELEGRAPHIC COMMUNICATION WITH PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to ask my hon. friend, the leader of the House, what information he is able to furnish with reference to the re-establishment of telegraphic communication between Prince Edward Island and the mainland ? When I last interrogated the hon. gentleman on this subject, he gave us an assurance that this service would be completed by last Saturday week. The latest advice I have from the province is that it is not yet completed. I understand that in another place, last evening, a minister made a statement to the effect that the province had communication by the Marconi system on the steamer all through the time complained of. That statement is incorrect, and it is deplorable, I think, that the department more particularly affected should not have more correct information on the question. No commercial messages were transmitted up to one week ago. There is a notice given on the 12th of this month, that up to the time the tower is erected in Pictou to correspond with the tower on the island, at Cape Bear, and while a steamer is in the port of Pictou, commercial messages will pass through the steamers ; but as it is the fate of the steamer to be out all day, leaving at daylight, and remaining out most of the day and sometimes even through the night, hon. gentlemen can see what the value of this communication is. It is absolutely of no value. Had the government listened to my advice a year or two years ago they would have provided Marconi towers on both sides of the strait for the use of the steamers. If that had been done, there would now have been no difficulty ; but even without that, the erection of a tower, if it had been energetically and earnestly taken up by the government, need not have taken ten days. But as the matter stands, since the 5th of January one hundred thousand people have been left without telegraphic communication from the mainland and none of the promises and assurances made to us by the government with regard to it, have been carried out.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I certainly received a note from the department informing me that the tower was finished and that messages were passing. I received a note from Mr. Gourdeau some days ago—I am sorry I did not bring it here, I thought it was not open to controversy—stating that the towers were completed and that messages were passing, and that the company were working its cable on the line between Cape Bear and Murray Harbour. He sent me a message that he had received from the inspector, in which the inspector said he had remained there for the purpose of seeing it perfected. It is very extraordinary that that information should have been given me if it is not correct.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The hon. gentleman will be greatly surprised to-morrow, if he learns that this information is not correct.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Certainly I will.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I am not saying it is not correct. It may have happened within two days. I have had no telegraphic communication with the island on the subject, because I thought I could not communicate. That is why we have to speak with considerable doubt. If the department has had a message over the wires, that settles it, but until I know that, I must be excused if I entertain a doubt, that the communication exists.

ERROR IN MINUTES.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière)—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to draw the attention of the House to what appears to be an error in the Orders of the Day for to-day. I observe that one order has been omitted and placed on the paper for to-morrow. Referring to page 205 of the Minutes, hon. gentlemen will see that the order 'Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of the Hon. Mr. Ferguson, as to the navigability of Hudson bay,' was fixed for Tuesday, February 19, and on the order paper for to-day it is set down for Wednesday the 20th. I do not know how this can be rectified.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It will come up to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—But it was fixed for to-day, as will be seen by reference to page 205.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It was fixed by motion for to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—I beg pardon. I made the motion myself, and I said I would resume the debate at the first meeting of the House after the adjournment. In view of that, I would ask this House, after we have finished the Orders of the Day, if they would be good enough to allow that debate to proceed.

Hon. Mr. POWER—My remembrance of what took place agrees with what the hon. gentleman from de Lanaudière has said.

The SPEAKER—The debate appears on the order paper for Wednesday, but I suppose, with the consent of the House, it can be taken up as the last order for to-day.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—I move that it be placed on the Orders for to-day.

The motion was agreed to.

DELAYED RETURNS.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I will ask the hon. minister who leads this House if he will be good enough to call the attention of the military authorities to a motion I made on the 3rd June last, that a humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying for the correspondence between the hon. Prime Minister and myself, on the subject of the refusal of the Department of Militia to translate and cause to be published in French the militia regulations which were published in English in the 'Canada Gazette' on the 5th of May last. There was a correspondence between us and an address was passed by this House, ordering the production of that correspondence.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will attend to the matter.

THIRD READING.

Bill (47) An Act respecting the London and St. Clair Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Coffey.)

BONAVENTURE AND GASPE TELEPHONE COMPANY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. POWER (in the absence of Hon. Mr. Fiset) moved the second reading Bill (R) An Act incorporating the Bonaventure and Gaspé Telephone Company, Limited.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I have no objections to the second reading of this Bill. I know it is printed in French, as the following Bills which are marked on the order paper as not being printed in French are so printed. But I want to call the attention of this House to a remark made at the last sitting by the hon. Secretary of State as to the translators of Bills. He said at that time that the translators were behind in their work because a Bill that had been proposed for second reading here was not yet printed in French. Bills are of two natures. There are Bills originating in this House and Bills originating in the House of Commons. Bills originating in this House are translated by our own translators, but the Bills coming from the House of Commons do not come under the jurisdiction of the translators of this House. They are translated by the translators of the House of Commons, so that the remarks made by the hon. gentleman do not apply to the Bills originating in this House. In justice this distinction should be made, so that the responsibility may rest in the proper place.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am unable to recall the particular Bill. I gave a memo of the particular Bill but I could not say from memory now what it was. If it was one from the other House, I withdraw my observation.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—I think we ought to have a full explanation of this Bill. It is far-reaching in its effects, and certainly requires some explanation. It embraces almost everything. While it appears to be a telephone Bill, it will embrace railroads, electric powers and various and sundry things, and I do think the promoter of the Bill ought to be here to explain why he comes to parliament with the request which he makes in this measure. We certainly ought not to allow it to pass without some explanation. There appears to be none. Perhaps my hon. friend from Stadacona (Hon. Mr. Landry) may be able to give us some explanation in reference to this Bill. It is certainly one that requires an explanation before it passes the second reading, because we should know on its second reading what the Bill embraces. What is the object in making a demand for a Bill of this kind ? I have no feeling in reference to it at all, but I do think we should know from the promoter or some one else, why this Bill is introduced.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I have only to say that I am not the father of the Bill and I will not recognize the child.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am acting the part of a godfather to the Bill. I think that the criticism of the hon. gentleman from St. Thomas is a criticism which might be directed against every private Bill that passes this House, or that receives its second reading here. It has not been the practice, and it would be very inconvenient practice now, to discuss the merits of every private Bill in this House. The Railway Committee includes two-thirds of the members of the House, and the Bill which runs the gauntlet of the Railway Committee safely is generally not too objectionable a measure.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière)—The railway plan is before the committee.

Hon. Mr. POWER—And as far as I can gather, from a not very long perusal of the Bill, the hon. gentleman is wrong in saying that this Bill authorizes the company to build railways and that sort of thing ; on the contrary the Bill is rather more limited in its terms than a great many of these Bills are. Clause 10 gives the powers of the company which are to acquire, lease and operate electric lines, telephone, telegraph — nothing about railways — branch lines, machinery and plant. They are authorized to deal in electricity, to a certain extent, under clause 13, but that is a power which we give to all these companies, and I think the hon. gentleman would be perfectly safe in allowing this Bill to go before the large and independent Railway Committee. It is a Bill which has been drawn and introduced in our own House; and the committee will, therefore, have less hesitation in removing any objectionable features which may appear in it.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—With the permission of the House, I wish to say to my hon. friend from Halifax that the Bill does not authorize the construction of a railway ; it authorizes electricity to be used in every shape, form and manner, and if he had carefully gone over the Bill—I do not imagine he has—he would not have made the remarks he did in reference to it. I say without hesitation, that if you read that Bill through you will find that it empowers the company to do almost anything they desire whether with electricity, or other motive power. We certainly ought to know the object of the Bill, and he has not given us any explanation as to why he moved the second reading of it. He says it will go before the Railway Committee, and there be threshed out by a majority of this House. Unfortunately, some of us do not belong to the Railway Committee, and, if we go in there, the first thing we will be told is that we do not belong to that committee, and that we have no right to offer amendments or suggestions.

Some hon. GENTLEMEN—No, no.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—I do say that until the hon. gentleman is prepared to give some explanation as to the object of the Bill, why it is introduced here, and to show whether it comes under the jurisdiction of the Dominion parliament or the jurisdiction of the local legislature, we should hesitate to pass it; and I am not aware that we in this House should wait until Bills have been considered by the committee on railways, private Bills or any other committee. We should be informed on the motion for second reading why we should endorse the principle of the Bill. I therefore offer the same objections that I stated to the House a few minutes ago.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If the House will permit me, the hon. gentleman can appear before the committee, and I can assure him the committee will be only too pleased—as we are always pleased,—to hear the hon. gentleman speak.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—As long as he does not vote.

Hon. Mr. POWER—And give every weight to what he says. This is simply a Bill to authorize a company to establish telephone and telegraph lines down in the Gaspé Peninsula. Surely the hon. gentleman does not wish to prevent the people of that region having facilities for using telephone and telegraph lines ?

Hon. Mr. WILSON—I do not want to prevent it. I merely want the hon. gentleman to explain the nature of the Bill, and the object of it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is the nature of the Bill, and in addition to that the company may acquire lands, and direct, use and manage works, machinery and plant for the generation, transmission and distribution of electrical and other energy; but there is no right given under the charter to build a railway.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not think the hon. gentleman from Halifax has interpreted the meaning of the language uttered by the hon. gentleman from St. Thomas. He did not indicate any desire, as I understood him, to oppose the Bill, but what he did ask was—which I think should be done in the case of every private Bill, and every Bill affecting the people generally —that on the second reading the principle of it should be discussed and explained to the House. It is all very well to say that the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours will discuss and analyse the Bill fully. That is always done, but there is a large majority of the House who are not on the committee, and, consequently, though they would have a right to go to the committee and speak if they thought proper, they do not go, and they would know nothing of the contents of the Bill which they are called upon to vote for. I have called the attention of the Senate, on a number of occasions, to the necessity of having the character of a Bill explained to the House, particularly if it is an important measure, in order that gentlemen who are not on the committee, would have an opportunity of analysing the different clauses, and of knowing really what they are asked to legislate upon, and I hope that in the future that will be done. In the case of nearly every motion for the second reading of a Bill we have no explanation as to its character. And I repeat that those who are not on the committee, as a matter of course, know nothing of its contents. When the committee reports the Bill, as a rule, unless there are some very objectionable clauses in it, the House allows it to pass without any explanation at all, and if an objection is taken or an explanation asked, the answer is 'Oh the committee has fully considered that question, and there is no necessity for discussing it'. I repeat that in order that each senator should know really what he is asked to do, when he is casting his vote, every private or public Bill, and particularly government Bills, should be fully explained before the second reading is passed.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I might point out to the hon. gentleman from Halifax that the title of the Bill is somewhat misleading. It is sought to incorporate the Bonaventure and Gaspé Telephone Company (Limited). According to the title, the rights of this company would be included in these two counties alone, if the title means anything; but if he looks at clause 10, he will find that that company has a right to go from New Brunswick to any part of the province of Quebec to acquire, buy, purchase land, obstruct streams, but not to such an extent as to impede navigation. This Bill, I think, is one which, like many others, should be left largely to be dealt with by the provincial legislature, who are in a better position to know what the province of Quebec wants than the members from Prince Edward Island or the Northwest Territories, and, further we have enough of these Bills down in Quebec already, without the Dominion parliament being made a handmaid to companies who are striving to monopolize all the water-powers and all the franchises of the province. What they cannot get through in Quebec they come up here and try to get from parliament, who are not posted on the position of matters, powers that should come from the provincial legislature, and I quite agree with the leader of the opposition that this is the proper time to discuss matters of this kind. The hon. gentleman from Halifax states that we can go before the Railway Committee and discuss these details, but the hon. gentleman must remember that those of us who are not members of that committee, are members of other committees, and have to attend to their business, whether it be the Divorce Committee, or Miscellaneous Private Bills Committee, or other committees. We cannot attend both at the same time, and sometimes they run together. There is another point which the hon. gentlemen from Belleville has suggested, that once a matter is settled in committee, and the committee reports to this House, it is a difficult matter to have the decision revoked; so that the point raised in this matter is well taken. This is the proper time to ferrit out what is in these Bills. This Bill now before us is simply provincial. It does not say it shall run solely in New Brunswick, but its main features are provincial, and before granting these private charters, it would be well to see that they do not come within the jurisdiction of the province.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think the hon. gentleman from St. Thomas is perfectly right in asking an explanation of this Bill. I looked into it for a few moments and I found that while it carries a name which might properly indicate a provincial measure, yet it does work in two provinces, New Brunswick and Quebec, and if that be the case surely it is within the federal jurisdiction. The name is only the name given to the company, but we are not enlarging the name so as to mention all the privileges which the company would enjoy. The work that the company is to do will come under our jurisdiction.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière)—The particular discussion now going on with reference to this measure proves the necessity for sending such Bills to a committee, and those promoting the measure as well as the committee, can look at the map and see exactly where the railway they are dealing with is located. In a case like this, they would also have a map showing where the proposed telephones, and lines were going, and a glance at the map would enlighten the members more than a long discussion in this House. Perhaps some members do not know where Bonaventure is. I may ask the hon. gentleman from Victoria, for instance, if he could locate every county in British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Pretty nearly.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—It would be very difficult to discuss the project intelligently, without having before us counsel for the promoters and seeing the plans. It has been the practice of the Senate, ever since I can remember, and I think long before—and I think it is a wise practice—to permit all private Bills to go to the committee; therefore if any serious objections are made to the Bill, the explanations are given in the committee and when they are given every hon. member of this House can make any objection he likes, and he has the benefit of having heard counsel for or against the Bill, having heard both parties, both the promoters and any opposition there may be to it, and with all that information before them, members are in a better position to discuss the Bill when it is reported from committee than they are with no information before them.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—All I can say, in reply to my hon. friend, is that I am perfectly well aware that the rules of the House provide that on the second reading the principle of the Bill should be affirmed and a full explanation should be offered. It is all very well to go before the committee after the measure has been explained by the gentleman who has charge of it. All I ask is an explanation of this Bill by those who understand it. My hon. friend says 'How do I know.' I have no map. Very likely I may be able to get at the meaning of the Bill without a map, but I do not think the railway committee would enlighten me very materially if it does not offer more suggestions than some of the reports that emanate from that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (S) An Act respecting the Accident and Guarantee Company of Canada, and to change its name to the Royal Accident and Guarantee Company of Canada.—(Hon. Mr. David.)

Bill (O) An Act respecting the Temiscouata Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Tessier.)

Bill (11) An Act to incorporate the Saskatchewan Valley and Hudson Bay Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Roy.)

PATENTS OF NICHOLS COPPER COMPANY BILL.

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON (in the absence of Hon. Mr. Watson) moved the second reading of Bill (U) An Act to revive certain patents of the Nichols Copper Company.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think it is due to the House that we should have some explanation with regard to this Bill as well as others of the same character. The principle of reviving patents is, on the whole, inimical to the public interest, and when a Bill of so grave a character as this comes before us, from the very start it should be explained before it goes to the committee.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I am only moving this Bill as a matter of courtesy. I do not know anything about the merits of the Bill at all, and it had better stand until Senator Watson returns from the west. I therefore move that the order of the day be discharged, and that the Bill be placed on the orders for second reading for Thursday next.

The motion was agreed to, and the order was postponed until Thursday.

INSPECTION OF ELECTRICITY BILL.

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being called, second reading Bill (P) An Act respecting the inspection of electricity.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said: This Bill is drafted on the laws that stood before the recent revision of the statutes. It is necessary of course that in the references to all Bills passed this session it should be to the statutes of 1906. I therefore move that this order be discharged, and that the Bill be placed on the order paper for second reading for Friday next.

The motion was agreed to.

COLD STORAGE WAREHOUSES BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (20) An Act to encourage the establishment of Cold Storage Warehouses for the preservation of perishable food products. He said: It will be generally admitted that the introduction of cold storage in Canada has been of immense benefit to the people of this country wherever they have had the opportunity of securing it. Cold storage houses now exist in nearly all the large centres of population. They are not distributed as universally as is desirable, and the object of this Bill is to encourage the construction of cold storage warehouses in country places, and in towns and villages where they do not now exist, the government advancing one-third of the cost and securing control of the rates to be charged.

The buildings are, of course, to be inspected and to be in accordance with the requirements and regulations of the department.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What effect will this Bill have on existing cold storage houses ? Does the subsidy extend to those?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They will not be erected where there are cold storage warehouses now.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What about the existing cold storage warehouses?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They have already been enjoying the advantages of business. They are regarded as profitable.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If so, why give 30 per cent to an industry which has already advantages?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In smaller places they must be induced to take them up. There is not the capital. This is a liberal offer to assist in the construction.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—What change does this make in our law with reference to cold storage ? We have already had legislation on this subject. Chapter 7 of the Act of 1897, intitulated 'An Act respecting cold storage on steamships from Canada to the United States and in certain cities of Canada', is to be repealed by clause 10 of this Bill. In what particulars does this Bill differ from the Act in existence ? I should like my hon. friend to tell us what provision is made—there does not appear to be any in this Bill—to take the place of the provision with regard to cold storage on steamships which is being repealed ? Is it proposed to abandon all control of or interest in cold storage on steamships ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Before I commit myself to the actual facts, I should like to allow that part of the Bill to stand until we are in committee. I understood that the contracts with the steamship companies were terminable. They were made under agreements and, apparently, for only a limited time. There are just two clauses in the Act referring to the matter.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Is it not a continuing power ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think not, I will get the information from the Department of Agriculture before the next sitting of the House.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—There is surely somewhere in the laws, provision made with reference to cold storage on ocean steamships. The power of the government to make contracts with steamship companies for the purpose of establishing mechanical refrigeration on board ships may have ceased, but surely it is just as necessary to have inspection and examination of these cold storage appartments on board steamships as it is to have inspection of cold storage warehouses on land. They should certainly go hand in hand. It is very little use keeping a product in good condition until you deliver it at an ocean port, to be then destroyed by lack of proper preservation during the Atlantic voyage.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This has nothing whatever to do with cold storage on board steamships. It deals with cold storage on land. The provision in section 7 of the Act of 1897 was designed to encourage the introduction of cold storage on steamships. When they once provided cold storage on board vessels, and got a premium for doing so, it was not necessary to continue it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The committee is the place to discuss these details.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill read the second time.

INSPECTION OF MEATS AND CANNED FOODS BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the second reading of Bill (33) An Act respecting the inspection of meats and canned foods He said : The purpose of this Bill, which has already been pretty extensively discussed in the House of Commons, is to protect, as far as we possibly can, Canadian trade from any such disorders or conditions as have been found to prevail on the other side of the border. Hon. gentlemen are aware that a great deal of attention has been called within the last few months to the very unsanitary conditions which exist in many of the great packing houses in the United States. They are also probably aware that the exposure of the bad conditions which prevailed there, led to very serious injury to American trade in canned meats. The government caused inspection to be made of most of the factories engaged in carrying on that business in the Dominion of Canada, and, I am glad to say that the results, as reported by the inspectors, show that far better and wholsomer conditions prevail in this country. Nevertheless, it was felt that in view of the attention that has been called to this matter, it was very desirable that a government inspection should be had, particularly of the animals before they were slaughtered, and before they were converted into canned products. This is the more necessary, because the Department of Agriculture, which introduced this Bill, have had advices that it is extremely probable that in several countries with which we carry on trade, and even Great Britain itself, inspection of this kind by the government will be demanded under penalty, and for that purpose this measure which is now in your hands is intended to provide. The chief purposes which it will attempt to carry out, will be careful inspection of all carcases of cattle, sheep, swine, goats, or poultry, before they are canned and in the event of any of these carcases or any canned meats prepared from them, proving imperfect, or having deteriorated, they will be marked by the inspectors as unfit Of course, the matter in its present stage is largely tentative, and it may be found necessary to extend it or to improve it by and by ; but in the first instance we hope, by appointing a reasonable number of officers, and by calling public attention to the extreme desirability of taking proper care in the preparation of these goods, that the Canadian trade may be preserved and indeed increased. The probability is, I suppose, that my hon. friend will prefer to discuss the various details in committee and, therefore, I content myself with this explanation in moving the second reading of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—Is it the purpose of the government to create a new bureau for inspection ? Because that will necessitate a chemical laboratory. There must be some chemical examination if they are going to carry out this inspection in its entirety. If it is confined to animals before they are slaughtered, there will be nothing of the kind required. Will the government take advantage of the laboratories they have, or intend to establish, or is it intended to inspect only the animals before they are slaughtered ?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The chief object of this Bill is the inspection of animals before they are slaughtered. However, as I have said, this Bill is, to a considerable degree, a tentative measure ; it will be enlarged as experience shows it to be required, and I have very little doubt that something such as my hon. friend appears to suggest will be added to it by and by. But the very first and most important purpose of the Bill is to avoid any risk of diseased animals being slaughtered, or diseased meat being canned in Canadian factories, which my hon. friend will see is extremely good as far as it goes. It may be expedient and desirable to go a good deal further, but, as this is a new departure, I suppose the Department of Agriculture wish to proceed by degrees. I think that they will have what my hon. friend calls a bureau—I suppose he means a department. I think they will have a sub-department, but I do not think they will create a separate branch for it, if that is what is in his mind, at present.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—I am advised that clause 12 of this Bill is going to interfere very much with the canning of lobsters. The Dominion of Canada has now the great business in lobster canning almost to themselves, and causing the cans to be marked by the name of the packer will add a very great expense to the industry. They complain that it will in a great measure ruin their business. They have no objection at all to having the factories inspected thoroughly, but they do object to being compelled to have their cans marked. It will require the lobster packer to have new dies every year, changing the date, which will entail a very great expense, and as the continental lobster buyers wish to get the cans unlabelled in order that they may label them themselves, it will be an expense thrown upon our lobster packers which is not necessary.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I will call the attention of the Minister of Agriculture to the point my hon. friend has taken. This measure, as he knows, was pretty thoroughly threshed out in the lower House. He will understand that while the government are most anxious not to put our manufacturers to any unnecessary expense, still it is extremely important in the public interest that all reasonable precaution should be taken to ensure and preserve the good name, which, I am happy to say, Canadian canned goods have so far maintained. How far the provisions made here can be dispensed with, I am not in a position to say. I should have been disposed to think that it would be on the whole, bearing in mind the fact that canned goods of all sorts and kinds hailing from this continent are at a discount, particularly on the other side of the Atlantic, an advantage that the name and designation of the packer was placed on all these articles. My hon. friend, if I am not mistaken, will admit that a good many of these canned foods—fish products in particular—have become suspect in the public mind. I have noticed from time to time, and I have no doubt he also has noticed, that cases of ptomaine poisoning from the use of lobsters and salmon improperly prepared are not unknown even in this country, and while I am sure the government will give every possible consideration to any representations they may desire to make on this point, the public health must be the major consideration here.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—That is perfectly right, and, as I said before, the lobster packers have no objection to having their factories thoroughly inspected and the work inspected as it goes along. What they object to is having to label the cans. It seems the name of the individual and the date on which the lobsters were packed, must be marked on the can. This will involve a great expense which will not be of any benefit, because the labels will be scraped off, particularly from the cans sold to continental firms.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The point my hon. friend takes does not go in any way to invalidate the principle of the Bill, and as the measure is one of very considerable importance, after the second reading I do not propose to proceed with it for some little time, in order that the House may have a full opportunity of considering the various provisions. We can debate it at length in the committee. I will take a note not only of the hon. gentleman's objection but of any other point that may occur to him.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—What I wished was to have the words 'excepting lobsters, added to clause 10b, after the words 'preparation and packing.'

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—We have here some hon. gentlemen of the medical profession from whom I would like to hear, whether it would be quite safe to except lobsters ?

Hon. Mr POWER—I do not belong to the medical profession, but I most emphatically object to the position taken by the hon. medical gentleman from Prince Edward Island. I think it would be a great mistake to adopt the suggestion he makes. I have no doubt that he represents the sentiments of the people interested in the lobster packing business in Prince Edward Island, or in a certain section of the island, but I know that long ago it was the usual practice for the lobster packer to put his own label on each can, and I think that is the best practice.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I rise to a point of order. We should not discuss details now, we are not in committee. We will have no advantage from discussing it now. Let us deal with the principle of the Bill at this stage.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This is part of the principle.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Oh, no, the lobster is not the principle.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I should sit down at once only the hon. gentleman's objection came a little late. I was going to say that the label of the packer is the best guarantee the public can have that the goods are of the proper quality. No man who puts up any kind of edible will care to put it up in a condition unfit for food, if he knows that he has to put his own label on it; and I am surprised that the hon. gentleman says that these packers would be willing that every portion of the process from start to finish should be inspected. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, and other members of the House, must see that if every factory is to be under the eye of an inspector from beginning to end of the packing, you must have as many inspectors as there are factories in the country. I feel that the presence of that immense staff is quite unnecessary, that if you compel every packer to put his own label on—his name and the place where he resides—there is no necessity of having inspectors going to the factories at all, except, occasionally. I hope that when the hon. gentleman comes to consider the matter, he will see that he is really making an unreasonable request.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—The hon. gentleman does not quite understand the position as it is at present. He is speaking of the packing business as it was carried on some years ago. It is entirely different now. Those who can lobsters in our province and elsewhere do it in this way: They put them into the cans and are perfectly willing to put their label on the can and be responsible for what is in the can so far as the people of the Dominion are concerned, but our canned lobsters are not all consumed by the people of the Dominion; they are exported to Italy, Germany and other countries on the continent of Europe and the purchasers in those countries send their agents here and buy the lobsters from the factories. One of the conditions of purchase is that there shall be no label put on the can by the packer; but they stamp the cans with the name and label of the firm in Europe that purchases them. To compel our packers to put an embossed mark on each can, is to require them to do something which will not be of any benefit to them but, on the contrary, an injury and expense. The cans are made in very large quantities by persons whose business it is to manufacture cans for packers. These people would require to put on the cans the date, time and place of packing and if those stamped cans are not used within that season, they are useless for the following season. There should be some modification of that part of the Bill which applies to lobsters. The rest of the Bill is a very wise and practicable measure, but there is some difficulty in carrying out that part of it, and I know that it would be a serious disadvantage to the lobster packers of Prince Edward Island. I have not heard from all of them, but I know the principal ones are opposed to the Bill.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Halifax)—I have made it my business to correspond with some of the prominent lobster packers, and I am anxious to hear from them to have an expression of their opinion about this Bill. There is an impression, and a wrong impression, that the packers label the tins. That may apply to the export of lobsters to the United States, but when you send lobsters to Great Britain and to the continent of Europe, they are not labelled at all. The cases are marked. The packer's name and the month of packing and all particulars are put on the case. Very often an exporter ships a thousand or more cases of lobsters by steamer to London. To compel him to label every tin would mean a large expense in labels and in the number of girls he would require to employ to put those labels on the tins. That is not the way it is done. The lobsters are sent in cases to the dealer, say in London, and that dealer sells them just according to what the cases represent. They examine a can here and there to ascertain if they are up to the standard, and then, perhaps, they are labelled before they go into consumption. Now as to inspection. I agree with the hon. senator from Halifax that it would be absurd to expect that an inspector would be appointed to every canning establishment to see what is going on. An inspector who visits an establishment has two things in view, first to see that undersized lobsters are not packed, and second that sick lobsters are not packed. He examines and finds everything going on nicely and goes to the next establishment 10 or 15 miles off. If you compel the lobster exporters to label every tin, you will impose an amount of expense on them that they will resent. I know something about lobster packing. I have had some experience in the business and I am having some experience in it now and I think it would be a terrible misfortune to compel these people to put all the particulars you mention on every tin. Put your particulars on every case and that is al that is necessary. That is all that is done now, and if you leave it pretty much as it is now it will be better. Perhaps we are doing too much tinkering in legislation of this kind.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—There is always some danger in legislating in a panic or when the country is under undue alarm about any subject. Now this measure has been suggested on account of the disclosures with reference to packed goods sent forward from Chicago and other parts of the United States, ; and I quite agree with the government that it was just the time when it was proper to look carefully into our position with regard to that class of goods. At the same time, I think we should observe all possible care in legislating under a stimulus of that kind that we do not act without that proper knowledge we should have with regard to how our legislation is going to effect some of the industries of our country. This Bill has come to us drafted by the Department of Agriculture, and I think hon. gentlemen will agree with me when I say that a measure dealing with the lobster fisheries should not come from that department. It should come from the Department of Marine and Fisheries, which department must have a great deal more knowledge of that question than it is possible for the Department of Agriculture to have. I am quite willing to admit that the present Minister of Agriculture has had a great deal of experience with similar legislation in regard to agricultural products, and that he is fairly well equipped for dealing with meats and fruits and things of that kind, but I do submit——

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Would my hon. friend permit me to mention to him that it is expressly provided in the latter section of this Bill that the administration of it may be divided into parts.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I know there is that provision with regard to the administration of the Act, but in the study of the question for the purpose of drafting and preparing this Bill, I submit, whatever expert knowledge there may be in the Department of Marine and Fisheries should have been consulted, and that the matter should not have been left in the hands of the Department of Agriculture alone.

Hon. Mr. POWER—What do these officers know about canned goods ?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I might just as well say, what does the Minister of Agriculture know about canned goods ? I might say that the Hon. Mr. Fisher was once in his life a fairly good farmer, and knew about dairy cows and beef cows ; but what experience did that give him with reference to canning the meats of these animals ? But to resume the point that was engaging my attention, was that all these provisions should not be included in one general Bill. The Minister of Agriculture is generally fairly accurate and correct in his legislation with regard to agricultural subjects, but we have this experience with Bills emanating from that department more than from any other in the government, that they come to us perfect and that we are not supposed to do anything but admire. We are not supposed when a measure comes from the Department of Agriculture to exercise our own judgment on it at all. The hon. gentleman reminds me with regard to his Bills of a lady in Paris that Dr. Franklin met one time, who said to him, 'Doctor it is a very surprising thing that I never meet anybody who is always right except myself.' Now, as I said, the minister has had a good deal of experience in agricultural matters, and I am willing to give him the credit of having on the statute books some very good measures, with the assistance of this House. We have amended his measures not altogether according to his wish, but we have amended them nevertheless, and I do not think we have done them harm. The experience of the country has been that we improved them. But with regard to this Bill, and its affect on the lobster industry, the hon. gentlemen who have addressed the House, the hon. gentleman from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Ross), the hon. gentleman from Charlottetown (Hon. Mr. Macdonald), and I dare say the hon. gentleman from Montague (Hon. Mr. Robertson) know more about the details of it than I profess to know, but I have a great many letters on the question. I have letters from Halifax, the city from which my hon. friend (Mr. Power) comes. The very strongest expressions come from that place, and they tell me, and I think they tell me truly, that lobster packing business is in an excellent condition at present. Half a dozen or more years ago there was a great deal of difficulty and trouble with regard to what they call bloated cans, no doubt caused by imperfect packing either in the can or in the goods. Something was wrong in the operation and the goods turned up on the other side of the Atlantic in a condition which they termed 'bloated.' We are glad to know that that trouble has nearly all passed away, and that lobsters, as far as the packing and the quality of the goods is concerned, have a good character on the markets to which they go, and the prices they realize are satisfactory. Would it not be advisable to leave well enough alone in a case of that kind, particularly when we find that all those engaged in the business protest against the change in the land; I have a good many letters objecting strongly to this legislation as it applies to that industry. Every packing industry or every branch of packing has peculiarities in the operations that belong to it. It turns out that the packing of lobsters has this peculiarity, that the trade has got into a certain shape from practically long years of operation and experience and that that shape is satisfactory. That being so, would it not be well to exercise some care and some caution before disturbing a state of things that is so satisfactory, where there is not alleged at the present time to be any abuse, and, at the instance of the Minister of Agriculture, pass a law dealing with the fisheries on a subject which many of us, including the minister, cannot possibly understand.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—A great deal has been said by hon. members who have spoken against the Bill, about the cost of putting the labels on the cans. Others spoke about it having to be changed year after year. I think this Bill is in the interest of the trade of Canada, and in order that our good name be maintained, the word Canada should be put upon the labels of the tins. So far as the stamping of cans is concerned, the dies would be the only expense. With regard to what my hon. friend from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Ross) has said, I should like to take him to Mr. Swift's packing house in Chicago, where instead of a number of hands being required to place the labels on the cans, he would see it done by a machine, as fast as a young lady could feed it, and as fast as a hen could pick up grain. If there is any object at all in this Bill, it is to provide that any canned product shipped from Canada shall be a marketable article and should not go under any other name than that of the Dominion of Canada. My hon. friend from Charlottetown spoke about the management of the trade. The management of the trade takes away the honour of Canada from the fact that no Canadian label is put upon these cans, but a German or English label. Why? These men take the credit of doing the packing. They buy the product of Canada, label it as their own, and the trade of Canada is forgotten; yet the article inside of that can is neither German nor English, but the product of a province of the Dominion of Canada, Prince Edward Island. I was astonished to find my hon. friend from Montague (Hon. Mr. Robertson) who is always willing that the animals should be examined, that the geese and turkeys should be examined, also the goats, but he does not want us to touch the lobster. That is a peculiar trade by itself. The manufacturer is willing that his product should be examined. It is not necessary that an inspector should be required to stand over the men. They can adopt the same principle which is adopted by the British herring fishing industry. Thousands and tens of thousands of barrels are scattered along the quays of Scotland and England, and the British officer comes down and says 'open this barrel, and that barrel and the other barrel,' and if a certain proportion of the herring are not up to the standard, then the government officer refuses to put the full Crown brand on the herring, and the owners will not be able to ship. They will make them keep every barrel of them until they are properly culled. With such a restriction placed upon this industry, that the officer in charge, who knows the business he is called upon to inspect, can open any cans he wishes to, and coming at times unknown to the packer, will be the best security that the goods are honestly packed, because the packer will be afraid to be caught in a trap of that kind.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—There does not appear to be any objection, as far as I can understand, to the principle of the Bill. The details, it seems to me, could be very well considered when we go into committee. I may venture therefore to suggest to my hon. friends that we could read the Bill the second time now and have it considered in committee, at any reasonable time, say this day week, if my hon. friend opposite thinks that time would answer. Within that period, every hon. gentleman who is specially interested will be able to communicate with his constituents, and I can assure them that every consideration will be given to their representations. I am quite in accord with the hon. gentleman who spoke last, in thinking that this House cannot be better employed than in giving careful consideration to Bills of this description, which are in no sense or shape of a party character, and which are intended at any rate to promote the trade of this country, and to preserve the health of its people. I think the Senate is absolutely within its rights, and in fact it is one of those functions which it can in some respects discharge better than the other House, inasmuch as it has more time to bestow on these matters than they have, and I shall be very glad to receive any suggestions that the hon. gentlemen have to make as to the working of these particular clauses. Of course hon. gentlemen will understand that when objections are taken, that I must confer with the minister who introduced the Bill and who has given his best time and consideration to it, and I will also endeavour to have some of the experts from the Departments of Agriculture and Marine and Fisheries within call so that questions such as have been raised may be answered more readily than I can pretend to do without special technical knowledge. I presume that the House will have no objection, under those conditions, to permit the second reading of the measure without further discussion.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—When the hon. gentleman speaks of sending the Bill to a committee, does he refer to the committee of the whole or to a select committee ?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—It is a government Bill, and our custom has always been—and I think very properly—to refer such Bills to a Committee of the Whole.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—Might I request that the government, on this occasion, should make an exception to that rule. The Bill has created alarm somewhere, and I am not going to find fault myself with the government, because I was one of the first to advocate the inspection of canned meats, especially by the government. But, as I have just said, alarm has been created somewhere by this measure. I hold in my hand some remarks which have been made on the subject, for instance the following :

> This is a very important point and unless they can afford an adequate protection the business will be killed.

I know it is not the practice to refer a government Bill to special committees but perhaps if this Bill were referred to one of the standing committees—

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I am sorry to say I cannot agree to that. It is a government measure, and we must discuss it in a Committee of the Whole.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—I was going to say that in sending the Bill before the committee, the parties interested and experts in these matters could be heard by the committee, but they cannot be heard here. In this case, perhaps the government might see its way clear to depart from its usual course. At least I make that suggestion, and my request is that it be sent to one of the committees.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I should like to point out without venturing any opinion on the question which has been discussed, that the arguments which have been advanced would be equally applicable to the abandonment of the same restrictions with reference to the salmon fisheries. Consequently this fact will have to be taken into consideration, that should the government entertain the representations which have already been made on behalf of the lobster fisheries, similar consideration would have to be given to an equally important industry in British Columbia, viz., the packing of salmon.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That is, if they ask for it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—As far as the asking for it is concerned, I understand that demand was made. It goes without saying, that a rigid inspection such as is proposed by this Bill, will meet with the disapproval of all the canneries. We have to presuppose that without discussing the merits of the Bill. A cannery or a packer or a manufacturer, on general principles, will object to the interference of government inspections. At the very threshold of the consideration of the Bill, you have to lay that down as a principle; consequently the mere fact of industries protesting against the government inspection it seems to me, should not be entitled to that weight which we are supposed to give to it.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—I had not intended to say anything about this matter, but the hon. gentleman has raised the question about salmon. I do not think the salmon canneries have any objection to raise to the principle of this measure, but the question of putting labels on the cans will very materially affect their business, I think, because I know they have been in the habit of shipping large amounts of salmon unlabelled, and buyers in England and Germany have especially put that clause in contracts, that the salmon shall be sent unlabelled, and then they put their own labels on them when they get to England. I have known cases where they have occasionally had their own labels sent all the way from England to be placed on cans in British Columbia, so that if any alteration is made with reference to the lobster canneries, I think the same consideration shall be given to the salmon canneries in British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—I did not desire to provoke a discussion, I simply wished to draw the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce to this question that he might be prepared when we went into committee to discuss it and amend it if we can possibly get it amended. I do not wish to take him by surprise in the committee because I wanted him to be thoroughly prepared in this matter.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read a second time.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (39) An Act respecting the Brockville, Westport and Northwestern Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Watson.)

Bill (45) An Act respecting the Athabaska Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Talbot.)

EXTENSION OF THE INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (50):

An Act to amend an Act to confirm an agreement entered into by Her late Majesty with the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada for the purpose of securing the extension of the Intercolonial Railway system to the city of Montreal.

He said: In 1890, when the Intercolonial Railway was extended to Montreal, a very elaborate agreement was made between the Crown and the Grand Trunk Railway in reference to the use of a part of this line from 40 miles south of Montreal and also the use of the station and various privileges. The original document was filed in the office of the Secretary of State. A mistake, either in copying it or in printing it, has occurred with regard to a number of words, none of them very material, but still it is important it should be an accurate copy, and it is for the purpose of correcting those mistakes. I will call attention to them when the Bill is in committee. Some of them are merely verbal and some not very important ones.

The motion was agreed to and the Bill was read the second time.

HURON AND ONTARIO RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON (in the absence of Hon. Mr. Mitchell) moved second reading:

Bill (55) An Act respecting the Huron and Ontario Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Frost.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—I protest against this Bill being read a second time without some explanation from the mover. If the hon. gentleman will refer to the statutes, he will find that the Bill has been before the House for a long time, but the Act originally passed, as you will see by the Bill, was in 1896; then in 1903 it was re-entered, and in 1904 again, and last year it was again presented to the House. What do we find this Bill to be? I desire to raise my voice in protest against what is purely a local Bill, brought here for a charter from the Dominion, to deprive the municipalities of the various constituencies of control over their own road. The original Bill as it was passed on the 23rd of April, 1896, reads in this way :

> Whereas a petition has been presented praying for the incorporation of a company to construct and operate the following lines of railway, and for such other purposes as hereinafter set forth, and it is expedient to grant the prayer of the petition, &c.
> Who are the incorporators ?
> 1. A. McKinnon Cameron, of Meaford; Josiah W. Curts, of Port Perry ; Albert E. Scanlon, of Bradford ; Henry J. Rolston, of Shelburne ; William Laidlaw, of Durham ; Henry Horton Miller, of Hanover; M. McNamara, of Walkerton ; John Green Murdock, of Lucknow ; W. R. Thompson, of Teeswater ; Norman McInnes, of Tiverton ; Andrew Malcolm, of Kincardine ; John M. Roberts and J. Reginald Shannon, both of Goderich ; Thorp Wright, of Flesherton ; and John Humbertson, of Ripley, all of the province of Ontario, together with such persons as become shareholders in the company hereby incorporated, are hereby constituted a body corporate, under the name of 'The Huron and Ontario Railway Company,' hereinafter called 'the company.'

They are all entirely and absolutely within the province of Ontario, and that Act passed, as I said before, in 1896. Now will the promotor of this Bill tell me that any of the work has been done upon this line ? Have they done anything in the last 10 or 11 years ? Nothing. It is nearly 11 years since this company was originally incorporated. The clause reads :

> The company may lay out, construct and operate lines of railway of the gauge of four feet eight and a half inches from a point in the town of Port Perry, in the county of Ontario, to the town of Kincardine, in the county of Bruce, connecting with the town of Uxbridge.

And it passes Newmarket, Beaton, Shelburne, Flesherton, Priceville, Durham and Kincardine. Will the hon. mover of this resolution tell me that any of these points are really outside of the province of Ontario ? We are having difficulty over this question of provincial rights at the present time, and I do not think it is just or fair to the province of Ontario. We ought not to assume the responsibility here of giving charters encroaching upon provincial rights. You will find later on they are asking for what? They are asking for power to assume control over various municipalities, the roads, the highways, and other local rights, as you will find by reading this Bill. I must admit that there is a declaration in the Bill that the undertaking hereby authorized is a work for the general advantage of Canada. Whilst that statement is made, I ask wherein is its truthfulness or correctness ? Is it for the general advantage of Canada, unless it is on the principle that all railroads are for the general advantage of Canada. I may say I do not wish in any way to interfere with the construction of railroads. I believe all railways are an advantage to Canada, but anything done by way of construction in the various municipalities, or in the provinces is for the general advantage of Canada and you might therefore just as well claim one thing as another under such a clause.

Now let us look at the Bill in its present shape.

It being Six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—When the House rose for recess I was trying to explain why I objected to the Bill under consideration. I contended that it was encroaching upon provincial rights. We ought all to feel anxious to prevent any encroachment on the powers of the provinces by the federal government. We can understand readily that it would cause a feeling of jealousy, and we know that such a feeling exists towards the Dominion in various provinces, on account of the Dominion assuming jurisdiction in certain matters which are within the provincial domain. Take, for instance, the various means by which companies are incorporated to produce electricity at Niagara and other points. It will not be long, if things go on as they have been going of late, before a conflict arises between the provinces and the Dominion. It is not to the interest of this country that any entangling alliances or any differences should exist between the federal and provincial authorities. I therefore contend that in allowing certain charters to encroach upon provincial rights we are doing a public injury. This Bill is advocated here on the ground that it is in the general interests of the Dominion. What do we find this Bill to be? The company was chartered in 1896. Has anything been done towards the construction of the line? It has been renewed several times, and why is this House asked to renew it for two years more? We know that there are such things as speculations in charters, and I think this is a Bill which should not be passed by this parliament. Section 14 of the original Act, passed in 1896, gives the company power to interfere with the various municipalities. They can enter upon roads and streets and take them out of the jurisdiction of the municipality and place them under the jurisdiction of the Dominion. Do the municipalities desire to have their rights legislated away by this parliament? We ought to try and protect provincial rights and not encroach upon the rights of the municipalities. This Bill gives the company absolute power, if their line should run near a water-power, to get possession of that power and exercise jurisdiction over it. Is there any necessity for such legislation? Will you tell me that just because they say their project is one for the general advantage of Canada, we should, therefore, place it on the statute-book of the Dominion? The time is not far distant when there must be some means to separate the powers of the various provinces from those of the Dominion. I hope my hon. friend who has moved the second reading of the Bill will explain to me why it is necessary that this legislation should be placed on the statute-book of the Dominion. The sooner we make up our minds to protect the rights of the provinces from encroachment by the federal power, the better it will be for the Dominion. We ought not to antagonize the provinces. We are the stronger power, and should yield rather than encroach.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.).—I agree with very much that has been so well advanced by the hon. gentleman from St. Thomas. Apart from what he has said, there is much in this Bill that requires to be looked into very carefully. The original charter was granted in 1896. It was renewed in 1903 and again in 1904 and in 1906. When application was made to this parliament so far back as 1896, and apparently nothing has been done from that day up to the present, we should know something more about the necessity for this legislation, and why the work has not been carried out as originally proposed. Another point which I am pleased to see was brought up by the hon. senator from St. Thomas is with respect to legislation that is being introduced now in so many Bills incorporating railway companies, that the roads they are to construct are for the general advantage of Canada. That is a phrase which is very much abused, and the government should see that it is eliminated from the statute or limited in such a way as to apply only to roads which really are for the general advantage of Canada, and extend from one province into another. As it is now, we have applications for roads ten to twenty miles in length, entirely within the province. But it is proposed to connect a short line of that kind with the Grand Trunk Railway or Canadian Pacific Railway and therefore, it must be for the general advantage of Canada according to the interpretation that is now given to the law, when the object of the promoters is simply to apply to parliament for a subsidy either of land or money. We have too many applications for roads which are really not for the general advantage of Canada in the sense in which that phrase was incorporated in the law in the first instance. I am glad this point has been brought up. I endeavoured to introduce it in one or two previous sessions, but no one appeared to take much notice of it. The government should take up the matter, and there should be some limitation of the broad view now taken which enables people to apply to parliament for charters without much idea of carrying out their projects. The promoter of this Bill should be in a position to give some reason for passing it. None has been given yet, and I see no reason for supporting it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Unfortunately, the hon. gentleman who has charge of this Bill is not present, and it is unfair to proceed with the discussion in his absence. I therefore feel inclined to move that the debate be adjourned until Thursday next.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I trust the hon. gentleman will not press his motion because I have been in communication with the hon. member in whose name the Bill stands, within a very short time at his home, and I am sure we are all happy to learn that he is improving in health. He sent his regards to every member of the Senate, and is in hopes that by the middle of March he will be able to resume his position in the House. As a matter of courtesy, I undertook to move the second reading of the Bill. I should like to call the attention of the House to one or two features——

Hon. Mr. POWER—It was with the object of closing the debate for the present that I rose to move the adjournment. If it is to be continued I ask to withdraw my motion.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I was asked by the hon. gentleman from St. Thomas to give some reason for proceeding with the Bill. One objection the hon. gentleman takes is that it is eleven years since this company got a charter, and it has been renewed three times since. If it was renewed two years ago I am astonished that my hon. friend from St. Thomas did not raise the objection he has made this afternoon. If he would closely scan the Bill he would see that it was a measure which should be granted by the parliament of Canada, because it has its termini at Sarnia and Windsor. We cannot legislate beyond the international boundary but we can grant permission to build to the boundary and connections can be made with railways in the State of Michigan. There is a good deal of force in what my hon. friend has said about renewing charters from time to time, but I would remind him of a company incorporated to carry out a very important project connected with his own city, that has been applying for renewals of its charter originally obtained in 1870. That company was incorporated for the construction of the Detroit river tunnel, and that work was only begun last year. So that this is not a new departure. It is simply asking what hundreds of railway companies have asked for; what the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Grand Trunk Railway and the Canadian Northern Railway ask for at every session of parliament—simply an extension of time. I thought, as a matter of courtesy, in the absence of our colleague that the hon. gentleman from St. Thomas would have withdrawn his objection. All other railways are treated in a liberal manner, and why exception should be taken to this particular road is something I cannot understand.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—Does it, or does it not, come within the jurisdiction of the province to charter a road to run to Windsor and Sarnia so long as no power is given to cross the international boundary?

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—My hon. friend knows as well as I do that we have no legislative authority beyond the bounds of our own country, and if this railway were to run from one point in the province to another point without connecting with railways in the United States, it has a right to apply to this House, and receive as it did in 1896 1903, 1905 and 1906, a renewal of its charter. I am not in a position to give reasons why the railway has not been built or to show how many miles of it are under construction. My hon. friend claims that this is encroaching not only on provincial rights, but on municipal rights. There never has been a railway built in Canada that did not encroach on local rights. The fact that the work is for the benefit of Canada gives a railway company the right to expropriate. My hon. friend is situated in the centre of a very large railway section. What would Canada be to-day, and what would the province of Ontario be were it not for the enterprise of the railways ? I have expressed myself time and again in this House as being a believer in free trade in railways. I go further than that and say that every railway should have its charter from the Dominion of Canada and then we would not have the dual supervision that we have now. However, that subject is not under discussion at present. I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that this railway has the right to come here and is entitled to the same fair consideration at the hands of this House as all other railways have had before.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON moved that the Bill be referred to the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—One remark made by the hon. gentleman from St. Catharines conveyed the impression that I objected to the construction of railways. He said I ought to be the last person to take such a position as I live in a railway centre. I do not object to the construction of railroads, but what I did say was that this company had been incorporated eleven years ago and has not done any work. They may perhaps be holding that charter for such a length of time that they have interfered with some other parties constructing a road in that section, and therefore my hon. friend from St. Catharines would really be the one to obstruct the building of railways. I am in favour of the construction of railways. I have never said I objected to railway construction, but I say there is a right and a wrong way of doing things, and that we ought not to do an injustice to the municipalities for the sake of getting a road built. My hon. friend is the one who objects to railway construction. If he could show me that this company after being incorporated for eleven years had even made a survey, or had gone to the Grand Trunk to sell its charter, it would be a different thing. He contends that this is a work that ought to come under the jurisdiction of the Dominion of Canada because the line runs to Windsor and Sarnia, but that is within the jurisdiction of the province of Ontario. The province could charter a dozen roads going to the boundary line, but not across the line. I therefore contend that he failed to make out a just cause why this Bill should pass. I shall not object to it any further, but I expect in two years time, if I should be alive and here, to find the same parties knocking at the door begging to get their charter extended that they may have another opportunity of peddling the charter around for two years longer.

The motion was agreed to.

NATIONAL TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (86) An Act respecting the National Transcontinental Railway. He said: This is a short Bill of one clause, applying the Act which is found in the new Revised Statutes, chapter 98, an Act respecting the liability of His Majesty in public companies for labour used for the construction of public works. The provision is, if a contractor or sub-contractor fails to pay his men, that by filing a claim in the department, the minister will see that the contractor is forced to pay for any labour properly due. This is applying the same principle to the Natioanl Transcontinental Railway.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (57) An Act respecting the St. Mary's and Western Ontario Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. McMullen.)

Bill (12) An Act to incorporate the Malone and Hopkins Point Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Cloran.)

Bill (42) An Act to incorporate the Eastern Townships Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Mitchell.)

NAVIGATION OF HUDSON BAY.

DEBATE CONTINUED.

The Order of the Day being called:

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of the Honourable Mr. Ferguson:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency may be pleased to lay on the table of this House, copies of all reports and communications in possession of the government not already submitted to parliament, regarding the navigation of the Hudson's bay and the resources and climate of the territory contiguous thereto, also copies of all grants of fishing, mining and lumbering rights, given at any time, by the government, in the said bay and territory; also copies of all reports of surveys received by the government from either engineers, surveyors or geologists, on the feasibility of railway routes, connecting any existing or prospective railway with any port on Hudson bay or James bay; also a statement of grants of land or money which have been proposed, or asked for, in aid of such railways. Also, copies of all reports received by the government in relation to the establishment of lights or other aids to navigation of Hudson bay and Hudson straits, and also a statement showing what action, if any, has been taken by the government regarding the establishment of such aids to navigation. Hon. Mr. Casgrain de Lanaudière.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think the hon. gentleman has not understood the Orders of the Day. The order is that the debate on this motion shall take place on Wednesday.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—If the hon. gentleman looks at page 205 of the minutes, he will see that it was fixed for Tuesday, February 19.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I would call the attention of the hon. gentleman to another entry, where it says that on the motion of the Hon. Mr. Casgrain, the order of the House was fixed for Wednesday. I would also call attention to the practice. Bourinot says at page 234 :

> The rule which requires a strict adherence to the order paper is absolutely necessary to prevent surprise. So rigorously is it enforced in the imperial parliament that even when it has been admitted that a day has been named by mistake and no one has objected to the appointment of an earlier day the change has not been permitted.

It is quite applicable to the case we are discussing now. The order of the House is that the discussion of the motion shall proceed on the 20th. There may be persons who are not here to-day who had made up their minds to speak on that motion on the 20th, so that no surprise could occur in the present instance, and we cannot proceed at an earlier day than the one fixed by order of the House. The hon. gentleman has no right to proceed to-day. Another additional reason is that he cannot make a motion without giving notice that he wants to change the order.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—I do not want to change anything.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If he proceeds to-day it is a change of the order.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not think the hon. member for Stadacona is very serious when he lays so much stress on what appears in the minutes, because he has himself on more than one occasion discovered errors in the minutes. I do not know whether he was in at an earlier stage of to-day's proceedings, when the hon. senator from de Lanaudière brought the matter up. It was generally understood then in the House, that when we got to the end of the Orders of the Day, the hon. gentleman from de Lanaudière should proceed with his speech. I do not think that the hon. member wishes to hinder the hon. senator from de Lanaudière from speaking. I understand that the hon. gentleman is being called away by somewhat urgent business, and could not very well be present to-morrow, and any hon. member who wishes to reply to him by waiting till to-morrow, will have the unrevised version of his speech made to-day, and can more effectually demolish whatever the hon. member from de Lanaudière says. Under the circumstances, I hope my hon. friend will let the hon. senator from de Lanaudière make his speech now, and we can adjourn immediately afterwards.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman tries to apply to me what applies properly to himself. He is the father of our rules, yet he does not want to adhere to them. Surely the hon. gentleman does not mean what he says? My object is, not to prevent the hon. member from de Lanaudière from speaking, but to protect the public. We have our rules, but if we are every day setting them aside, what will become of this House?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think the House is quite safe under the protection of the hon. gentleman. He will see that we do not go too far astray.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—We cannot be safe now, because when three of us were working in the same direction we had enough to do, and now the hon. gentleman from Halifax has deserted me.

The SPEAKER—Do I understand that the House will extend the courtesy of suspending the rule to allow the hon. senator from de Lanaudière to proceed with the discussion of the motion, with the understanding that the Order of the Day tomorrow will remain, that is to say, that the matter will stand on the Orders of the Day for to-morrow?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think the better way would be for the hon. gentleman from de Lanaudière to hand over his speech to the reporters.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—When I moved the adjournment of the debate, I moved that it be postponed to the next meeting after the adjournment. My hon. friend from Halifax and the Speaker, I am sure, will bear me out in that statement.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman cannot stand against the written document. I was in the same position last year. I appealed to the minutes, and the decision was against me. His Honour the Speaker will remember that I was ruled out of order.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—I am pretty much of the opinion of my hon. friend, that the debate was adjourned until to-day. I do not wish to question the written document. I suggest that the hon. gentleman from de Lanaudière be allowed to make his speech, and the debate can stand until to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—With the leave of the House——

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I object.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Then we can move an adjournment and talk on anything we like. Before the Orders of the Day were called, I rose and directed attention to an error in our minutes, and it was the unanimous consent of the House then that this order would be taken up after the Orders of the Day as they appear in the minutes. I call upon the hon. leader of the opposition and the hon. leader of the government to say if that was not the understanding. To try now to upset that understanding is hardly fair.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—In justice to what my hon. friend has said, I did understand in the earlier part of the session that the House consented to go on with the discussion this afternoon.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I will waive my objection if it is perfectly understood that it will not form a precedent even when an hon. gentleman wants to go away.

Mr. SPEAKER—I think it was my failure in putting the regular motion. As a matter of fact, the hon. gentleman is right. The House had agreed to proceed to-day.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Hon. gentlemen, I thank you, and I especially thank the hon. member from Stadacona, for the courtesy extended to me. I promise that this will not establish a precedent for as hon. gentlemen know I speak so seldom that it is not likely I shall abuse the privilege. I wish to congratulate the hon. member from Marshfield for bringing up this subject. The navigability of Hudson Bay is a question which interests every member of the Senate, and I wish to pay a special compliment to the hon. member from Marshfield on his industry. I think he can well be taken, especially by younger members, as an example. He works hard, in studying all the Bills ; he masters the geography of Canada, and he has gone so far as to use the terrestrial globe to ascertain the shortest possible distance between Churchill and Liverpool. If most of us would follow his example, there would be no doubt in the public mind as to the usefulness of the Senate. But having paid him that compliment, I am sorry I cannot arrive at the same conclusion that he has, as to the navigability of Hudson Bay. He takes what I think is a wrong basis when he speaks of a latitude as governing the climatic conditions of a country. He tells us, for instance, that the southern part of Hudson Bay is in the same latitude as Devonshire, England. That would lead to the assumption that the climate of the two places is somewhat similar. Churchill, he says, is in the same latitude as Scotland, but the isothermal lines are the proper criterion by which to ascertain climatic conditions. Quebec, for instance, is in the same latitude as Nice on the Mediterranean, and as Mentone, but no one who has lived in Quebec, and visited the Riviera would dream for a moment of comparing the climatic conditions of the two cities. There is an enormous difference.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—In favour of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—In favour of Quebec for cold weather. To give an idea of the very cold climate of the southern part of Hudson bay, I may just point out that the same isothermal line that passes the most southern part of Hudson bay passes through Great Bear lake, thence north of Fort Macpherson and on to the mouth of the Mackenzie river in the Arctic ocean. This line on the east side of Hudson Bay would pass through the most northern part of Greenland. There is no place on earth, in the same latitude, colder than Hudson bay, with the exception perhaps of a few places in Siberia. The mere inspection of the terrestial globe showing the isothermal lines will prove what I say. For instance, Vancouver is in the same latitude as Lake Abitibi. When the hon. gentleman told us that the southern part of Hudson bay was in the same latitude as Devonshire, I thought for a moment he would have us believe that the temperature was somewhat the same. The intense cold of Hudson Bay so deflects the isothermal line south, that we feel its effect even here in the city of Ottawa. The fact that we are opposite the southern end of James bay deflects the isothermal line to such an extent that this same line passes Gaspé and the Straits of Belle Isle and strikes the most northern part of Norway, the land of the midnight sun. Hudson bay being such a cold region, there is a contour line around its shores for a distance of 200 miles, following almost the shape of the bay, within which there is hardly any vegetation. There is nothing but rocks and muskegs, and a few trees scattered along the shores of the rivers, and so far apart that it would not pay the lumberman to operate in that country. There is a little lumbering done along the rivers, where logs are cut and easily hauled to the rivers. But when that narrow fringe of timber is exhausted, it will not pay to lumber there. If you want to lumber there you would have to import all your supplies. You will have to build eight hundred miles of railway, to reach the shores of Hudson bay, and you would have to haul all your supplies and carry your men that distance, which would make lumbering operations very expensive. We have most of us read the report of the trip of the 'Neptune,' which has been widely quoted by my hon. friend from Marshfield, and also by my hon. friend from Halifax. If you will read that book carefully, you will find that the 'Neptune' met ice every month in the year, and that there were icebergs in the straits until the middle of August. To those who see icebergs from the deck of a steamer they may appear very beautiful but they are in reality exceedingly dangerous to navigation, because the visible part of the iceberg is only one-eleventh of its bulk. If you see an iceberg 70 or 80 feet high, it will draw 700 or 800 feet of water, and an iceberg drawing so much water is very often carried south by the strong southerly current while the surface ice may be driven by the wind in an opposite direction. The field ice may travel two or three miles an hour and when a iceberg going in an opposite direction meets it, it crashes through like a great battleship. Now, if a steamer not specially constructed to meet such conditions were caught in that ice, it would be crushed like an egg shell. There are no commercial steamers that could possibly live between an iceberg and field ice travelling in opposite directions, and so, ships navigating those waters must be specially constructed as was the 'Neptune.'

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—And specially equipped.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—And specially equipped, too.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—What was her horse-power?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—I cannot say from memory. The 'Neptune' was first sheeted with 4-inch British oak, then four inches of greenhart, and inside there was a lining of three inches, and between the outside lining and planking it was filled up with solid rock salt in order to preserve it and make it perfectly sound against any shock from the exterior. Those ships are made saucer-shape, so that when ice crushes them they are lifted bodily out of the water. Then the bow of the 'Neptune' was of solid timber, eight feet thick and sheeted with one inch of iron. The timbers inside are all placed cross-ways, and there is so much bracing, that it leaves very little space for cargo. My hon. friend knows perfectly well how those steamers are built. All who have seen the sealing ships leaving Newfoundland know how they are constructed. You can take only a very small cargo on such ships, and they are almost useless as freight carriers. When you get the necessary supplies on board—and you have to have an extra year's supply, because you are never sure when you enter Hudson bay that you will come out the same year—your ship's space is pretty well occupied. We all remember what a heavy cargo of supplies the 'Arctic' carried. I saw the 'Arctic' lying in the dock at Quebec, and there was not space to move about either on the deck or in the hold. I am glad to say, en passant, that none was wasted, and that what was not used was brought back. If the House will permit a slight digression, I will say that Hudson bay is pretty well known to Quebecers. In history we read that our ancestors thought nothing of snowshoeing from Montreal or Quebec to Hudson bay, and it may be of interest to know that Pierre Lemoine—an ancestor of the gentleman who was for a long time clerk of this Senate, and an ancestor also of our sergeant-at-arms—in 1685 left Montreal with his brother and a few valiant followers on an expedition to Hudson bay. They started on snowshoes and carried their ammunition and supplies with them. I do not suppose they carried tents, so they slept in the open, covered with the blankets they carried with them. They arrived at Hudson bay on the 20th June.

We would consider that a great exploit today. I wonder how many of our brave volunteers of the present age would undertake such a trip with any prospect of ever returning. I refer to this matter, because Mr. Low, in his report, has given an historical summary of the expeditions to Hudson bay, and as this is a public document, bearing the stamp of the government of Canada, the facts contained in it should be accurate. Mr. Low speaks of a large force accompanying Iberville, but the fact is that it was a very small party indeed. They arrived at Hudson bay on the 20th of June, and easily captured the forts along the bay. Then Iberville and his brother Maricourt, with nine men in two bark canoes, captured a warship which lay in the bay. They returned to Quebec in this ship in 1687, two years later, the ship laden with furs worth a king's ransom. In 1688, Iberville went back to Hudson bay, and believing peace had been restored between France and England, he sent back his ship again laden with furs, and kept with him fourteen men. Later, towards the fall, he found three warships in the bay so caught in the ice that the men could not come on shore and were obliged to remain imprisoned in their ships. In the spring of the year, the ice bridge still existing between the shore and the warships, they were powerless, and their crews were suffering from scurvy. Iberville, with his fourteen men, seized the three ships, the largest of which carried twenty-four guns. He was not able to man the captured vessels and so was obliged to sink two of them, preserving the largest, in which he returned to Quebec in 1689. Eight years after, in 1697, Iberville sailed from Newfoundland with several ships. These ships were caught between an iceberg on one side and drift ice on the other. One of the ships was lost in collision with the 'Pelican,' and another was so suddenly crushed by the ice that her crew had barely time to save themselves. That occurred in the Hudson straits, on the 28th of August, in the year 1697.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—What part of the Hudson bay strait? It is 500 miles long.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—The 'Pelican' entered Hudson bay and on the 4th September arrived at Fort Nelson. There Iberville saw three ships which he ascertained were the English men-of-war 'Hampshire,' 52 guns; 'Deering,' 32 guns; and 'Hudson Bay,' 32 guns. Iberville, hero that he was, offered battle, and sailed for the largest prepared to board her. But the captain of the 'Hampshire' changed his course so as to avoid the encounter, and poured out a broadside which swept the decks of the 'Pelican.' The battle lasted three hours and a half. The 'Hampshire,' in delivering her broadside, presented her flank to the 'Pelican,' and the 'Pelican' so concentrated and directed her fire on the water line of her enemy as to tear a gaping hole in her side. The 'Hampshire,' in full sail, sank in her own length, and all on board perished. Then the 'Hudson Bay' surrendered when she saw the 'Hampshire' sink, and the 'Deering' sought safety in flight. Such a terrible snowstorm blew that night that at midnight, notwithstanding all the ability of Iberville as a navigator, both the 'Pelican' and the 'Hudson Bay' were driven ashore. The next day, the 5th of September, the storm had ceased, and while they were caring for the dead and wounded twenty of the men were frozen to death. That occurred in 1697, opposite Fort Nelson, in Hudson bay, and in view of such an inhospitable climate in September, I doubt if my hon. friend will declare that much navigation can be carried on with commercial success in these waters. I ask pardon for having recalled these facts, but as Mr. Low has related another story, I thought it my duty to make the truth known. Iberville wrote to the King of France that he was tired of taking Hudson bay. He asked for another mission, and Louis the XIV sent him to conquer the West Indies. Later on Iberville founded Louisiana, which for years remained an appanage of the French Crown.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Can the hon. gentleman give me a little light on this same subject he has been dealing with. Are there not statistics showing at what season the Hudson bay ships have been in the habit of coming into the bay and at what season they left?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—I may say, offhand, that for the last 200 years the Hudson Bay Co's ships have reached Hudson bay on the 2nd of September, on the average; of course, steamships would make better time.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—They only made one trip in a year.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—The 'Adventure' was sent to Hudson bay waters by the present government, and she was specially built and equipped. She made just the one trip, and had to return with one-third of her cargo, not being able to land the balance. Had there been good wharfs and modern equipment at the different posts, doubtless she could have landed all her cargo. But the fact remains, that the 'Adventure' sent by this government could not land all her supplies, and had to come back in the month of October for fear of being caught by the ice.

As to the question of transportation, I may say that for the last few years I have given special attention to this matter, and I think I can demonstrate that the idea of my hon. friend from Marshfield is impracticable from a commercial point of view. He says that a railway from Regina to Fort Churchill, 800 miles, connecting with a line of steamers to Liverpool, is better than a dozen transcontinental railways. Let us see if that is not somewhat far-fetched. He admits there would be 800 miles of rail haul from Regina to Fort Nelson. This railway would have very little local traffic for the 200 miles contiguous to the shores of Hudson bay, and there would also be very little local traffic for some considerable distance beyond that. The traffic would have to be done during a period of three or four months.

Hon. Mr. TALBOT—Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that that route could be used only during three to four months?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—No, I say the freight would be carried by water during three months. The navigation in the bay would be open for three months, but giving the ships additional time—that is giving them the benefit of the trip going west and of the return trip going east—you might make it four months from the time the ships first left England until it returned.

Hon. Mr. TALBOT—Will the hon. gentleman explain why it would not be as well to have elevators at Fort Churchill as at Fort William?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—There is no railway running there. The vessels would not take cargo there when they would have a perfectly safe route via Lake Superior. I may say these steamers would have to charge enormous rates, because I take it you could not get any insurance on them, and insurance governs navigation. Why are freight rates much higher from the St. Lawrence than from New York, or other United States ports? It is because the marine underwriters will not give the same rates of insurance to ships going to Montreal and Quebec as they will to Portland, Boston or New York. The insurance rates govern the freight rates. I ask the hon. gentleman from Marshfield if he will say they could get insurance on an ordinarily constructed ship to navigate those straits for three or four months? Or, if it did get insurance—because I understand in London you can get insurance on almost anything if you pay the rate—up goes the freight rate and there would be no advantage in the route. I do not think a high class railway like the Transcontinental should be built to Hudson bay. But there is no objection to the construction of a pioneer railway, and I believe we will see, in the near future, one or two such railroads going to Hudson bay, not for the purpose of carrying wheat to England but more for the purpose of freighting out fresh fish and the minerals that may be found in that country. I do not want it understood that I am against the construction of a railway to Hudson Bay, but I would be very chary about taking stock in such a railway.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Why should you be willing to build a railway to that place, if the people would all perish up there?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—I said I would not take stock in such a railway. I believe there is an application before parliament for a charter to build to Port Churchill, I would have no fault to find with such a road, but I do not think it would pay for some time to come.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend spoke of a dozen transcontinental railways, what I said was half a dozen transcontinental railways. I spoke of the main line in Northern Ontario and Quebec, not of the road down to Lake Superior.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—I accept my hon. friend's correction. My hon. friend also said that I had declared some three or four years ago, when speaking on the Transcontinental Railway, that the distance was 1,350 miles from Winnipeg to Quebec, and that I am now quite willing to admit that I had made a mistake. I was not correct, but I think my hon. friend will pardon me when I tell him the extent of my mistake. The line has actually been located, chained, and surveyed, from the abutment on the Quebec bridge to the city of Winnipeg, and as any one can verify by simply making the inquiry from the Transcontinental Railway Commission, the distance is 1,349½ miles. I am quite willing to say I made a mistake. The actual chainage is 1,349½ miles, and so I was out half a mile. I hope the hon. gentleman will forgive me. I ask pardon for that error. My hon. friend has spoken of the book issued by Mr. Charlton and said that Mr. Charlton did not dare repeat in the book in which he published his speeches the statement he made in the House of Commons, that wheat could be carried from Winnipeg to Quebec for six cents per bushel. My hon. friend said that Mr. Charlton was too modest to repeat that statement in his published book, and that he had withdrawn it. Now, knowing Mr. Charlton, as hon. members of this House know him, they will know he is not the man to withdraw any statement that he has made. Mr. Charlton has been a pioneer in advocating in the parliament of Canada the possibilities and potentialities of railways in this country, and when he made that illuminating speech in the Commons four years ago, when he spoke of building a railway through this north country with a gradient of not more than four-tenths of one per cent to the mile, people thought it was the speech of a visionary. They thought no such railway could be constructed. Why the thing is within sight of accomplishment to-day. If hon. gentlemen will come down to the railway board, where the plans have been deposited, they will find that not only between Winnipeg and Quebec, but that between Edmonton and the summit of the Rocky Mountains, in the Yellow Head Pass the profile and plans show a grade of 4-10 of 1 per cent.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes, at 100 per cent more than the first estimate of the cost of construction.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—The cost may be considerable, but, it is not a question of cost I am now dealing with.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I never contended that it was not possible to find a line with a gradient of 4-10 of 1 per cent. I also said if it was built at all, it should be built as near as possible to that grade. I did not charge Mr. Charlton with any deviation from the statement he made with regard to the rate in his early speech, but I did charge him with omitting from his book the calculations he made with regard to the carrying of wheat from Winnipeg eastward at a later date. In the earlier speech on the question, he did put that down at 12 cents a bushel, but in the later one after making some allowance for carrying the empties back, and something for profit, he made it 6 cents a bushel. He made that speech a month after he made the first one, and in the speeches he publishes in his book he produces the first one and leaves the last one —which he claims to be his latest conclusion, and about which the Liberal press made such a hurrah all over Canada—he left that absolutely out.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—If hon. gentlemen will read the preface of his book, they will see that what Mr. Charlton professed to publish in that book was some speeches he made, but not all the speeches.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Would not the latter speech be the right one to publish?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—I am much pleased that the hon. gentleman from Marshfield takes such an interest in what I say. I feel much flattered. We have established that the length of the Transcontinental Railway between Winnipeg and Quebec is now, roughly speaking, 1,350 miles. The question of transportation, which is such a great question and so important, is very simple when once you can get at its actual cost. What is the cost of transporting two thousand tons for one mile, west of Winnipeg, at the present day ? I have the figures here. The cost per train mile, first is $1.35.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—What kind of train ?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—A train that will haul 2,000 tons. That cost is made up in this way: maintenance of way and of structures, 30 cents, maintenance of equipment 30 cents, conducting transportation—that means coal, wages and oiling, &c.—64 cents, taxes, &c. 6 cents, general expenses 5 cents, making $1.35 to haul 2,000 tons for one mile. By multiplying that by the total distance, you will get exactly the figure that it will cost to haul 2,000 tons 1,350 miles, which is $1,822.50. I want to make this perfectly clear to the hon. gentlemen—2,000 tons is the total weight behind the locomotive. That does not mean 2,000 tons of wheat, because you must deduct the weight of the cars. Take 800 tons for the weight of the cars—a very liberal allowance—and you will then have 1,200 tons of wheat, and at 33⅓ bushels to the ton you will therefore haul 40,000 bushels for $1,822.50. It is a simple arithmetical calculation to find how much one bushel will cost.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—How much ?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—4½ cents, and if you allow 30 per cent profit for the railway you will have the sum of 6 cents per bushel, making Mr. John Charlton absolutely correct in the statement he made four years ago in the House.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Does my hon. friend know of any railway that is carrying wheat by rail for double that amount over that distance ?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—There is to-day no railway in Canada which will equal the standard of the Transcontinental Railway between Quebec and Winnipeg. The Canadian Pacific Railway for instance, which is a fine road, is no longer a modern road. The Canadian Pacific Railway has grades of one and one and a half per cent east of the Rockies. It has grades of four per cent, or 200 feet to the mile in the Rockies. The Canadian Pacific Railway could not commence to compete for trade with the Transcontinental Railway even if it got double the freight rates. In this scale of cost I have noted so much for maintenance of way and so much for haulage, including fuel and train hands, but in the details I have not included interest on the capital cost of construction. I have given the figures for the maintenance of way, and the maintenance of the structures, and for the equipment and the cost of transportation, and the profit of 30 per cent would take care of the interest on investment.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Do you include interest for the first cost of the road and depreciation?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Not as yet.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Is there any allowance for carrying empties back, which will be very little less than carrying the load eastward particularly as you will have a harder grade eastbound?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—No. There is very little difference in the grade. Does the hon. gentleman know that the wheat is only one-sixth of the freight carried by the Canadian Pacific Railway ?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Can you tell me how much the Canadian Pacific Railway carries ?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Very little now, on account of its heavy grade. I may say that it is difficult to proceed if the hon gentleman interrupts constantly.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—But it is very misleading, unless the hon. gentleman gives the explanation. I have a telegram on my desk, showing that they transported in the year 1902-3, the largest year, according to my telegram from Winnipeg, only 664,104 bushels of wheat.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—That corroborates what I say, that the Canadian Pacific Railway is not in a position to do business under such conditions, and that answers the position taken by the leader of the opposition. I know of no other railway in Canada which can do business at a rate which the Transcontinental can make a fair profit on.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Not at that rate, but I said double that rate, and I will put it now treble that rate. If my hon. friend can point out to me any railway on the continent of America that will carry grain by all rail for say 18 cents a bushel for the distance he mentions, il will certainly be a great surprise, not only to myself, but to every hon. gentleman in this House.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Might I be allowed to suggest that it would be more convenient in every way if the hon. gentlemen reserved their contradictions till the end. Interruption to a reasonable extent is fair enough; but in this way the speech is cut up.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—I am rather pleased with these interruptions. It shows, in the first place, that hon. gentlemen have been good enough to listen to me, and that is an attention that everybody does not receive in this House. I have heard some wide statements made in this House, and no attention paid to them. It seems that my argument must have some force if it touches the political susceptibilities of the hon. gentleman from Marshfield and the hon. leader of the opposition. I may say that this discussion as to the navigability of Hudson bay was brought on at an opportune moment by the hon. member for Marshfield. You would think some little carrier pigeon had brought from Manitoba the news that Mr. Roblin intended to dissolve the legislature and bring on a general election in the province. I do not like to surmise, but the discussion came at a very opportune moment. Since the hon. gentleman has chosen this time to raise the discussion, I think it only fair that I should avail of it to prove to the farmers of the west that they have in the Transcontinental the best, the safest and cheapest way of getting their grain to tidal waters. I have given the figures and the hon. gentleman will have plenty of opportunity of getting railway experts to contradict these figures if they can. I shall be very glad if they can inform me where I have erred in any respect. I challenge contradiction of these figures. I have given a lot of study to the question, and I believe my figures to be correct. When I stated four or five years ago that easy grades could be got on the immense plateau to the north, members on the other side would not believe it. When I stated that the railway would be 1,350 miles long, hon. gentlemen did not credit it. When I stated it would be 1,400 miles, the hon. gentleman from Westmoreland rose from his seat to express his incredulity and he told me that the Liberals in the other House had declared that the distance would be 1,475 miles.' I said I had nothing to do with what they said, that I had measured these distances carefully, and I was confident in the accuracy of my statement. The hon. gentleman said the minister himself said so and I said the minister had not consulted me ; that if he had consulted me, perhaps he would have been better informed. I regret to see that the hon. gentleman from Wolseley is not in his place. He complained that the farmers of Manitoba and the Northwest were not being well treated, in that they had no railway facilities. I do not see how the hon. gentleman can make such an assertion in the presence of senators from the province of Quebec. In the Temiskaming district we have the towns of Ville Marie, Guiges and Duhamel, settled for twenty-five years, and their only means of communication is by bark canoe in summer and dog sled in winter ; and yet the hon. gentleman complains that the people of the Northwest are not well treated. The people of Quebec contribute their money to build the railways of the Northwest ; they cheerfully contribute and say nothing. But they do not continually grumble that they are not well treated. Take the railway going to Nominingue. As president of the colonization society of Montreal, I, together with some parish priests, called on Sir Thomas Shaughnessy, and we begged for the construction of 33 miles of road from Nominingue to La Rapide du L'Orignal. And in his generosity Sir Thomas said that in two years he would build the thirty-three miles, although the parish priest pointed out that 75 families had left the place on account of the lack of railway accommodation and two whole parishes had threatened to abandon the district unless the railway was built within a reasonable time. Yet the hon. gentleman from Wolseley would have us believe that the Northwest was badly treated. In the county of Charlevoix, which has been settled for a great many years, there is not a single railway to be found. Take the county of Gaspé, represented by the Postmaster General Hon. Rodolphe Lemieux, and you will not find one mile of railway in that immense county which has a coast line of 300 miles. Still we do not complain, and cheerfully do we contribute to build railways elsewhere

Let no one rise in the House and say, in the presence of the representatives of the people of Quebec, who have contributed to build railways in the Northwest, that they have been badly treated. I think the farmers of the Northwest are well treated, and will be still better treated. There are parishes which have been exisfing for 200 years in Quebec where they have no railways. Where would you find a county like Charlevoix, with a population of 25,000 and no railways? I admire the representatives of the Northwest for demanding railway facilities for their people. I commend them for it, and I only wish the people of Quebec would take a leaf out of their book and ask for railways in our province. The Canadian Pacific Railway proposed last year to build 967½ miles of railway, some in Ontario and some west of Lake Superior, but how many miles did they propose to build in Quebec ? Not one. The Canadian Northern Company are building hundreds of miles of road in the Northwest. How many miles are they building in Quebec ? None. Sir Wilfrid Laurier went down to St. Jacques L'Achigon in the county of Montcalm to open a railway six miles long. Why, were I Prime Minister of Canada I would be ashamed to inaugurate such an insignificant railway. I hope that the farmers of the Northwest will show their appreciation of the good that the Liberal government has done for them and for the country ; I hope they will realize the extended railway facilities placed at their disposal, the greater postal facilities they enjoy, and the lesser taxation they are called upon to bear. I trust they will acknowledge the statesmanship which has given them the National Transcontinental Railway to carry their produce to the seaboard at cheap rates ; rates so low that the ten cent Roblin rate cannot compare with them. I trust to see the province of Manitoba expand her territory towards the Hudson bay, until she equals in area her giant sisters, Saskatchewan and Alberta, so recently elevated to statehood by a Liberal prime minister and a Liberal government. And finally, I express my confidence that the people of the west will not fail to demonstrate their gratitude to Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who so prudently and wisely and successfully guides the fortunes of our young and vigorous nation.

Hon. Mr. McGREGOR—I do not like to speak on a subject of which I know very little. However, I think I know as much about it as a good many of those who have spoken of it, and I have some interesting facts which I can furnish. In the first place, let me say, having some little knowledge of navigation and knowing something of the danger of winter navigation, I take some interest in it. I have had to do with shipping all my life. Very few of us have been at sea in a snowstorm. There is no danger at sea more dreaded by sailors than a snowstorm. It s a great deal worse than a fog, which is bad enough. When you have a snowstorm and cannot depend upon your compass, you are experiencing the greatest danger possible. I read with very much interest Mr. A. P. Low's account of the cruise of the 'Neptune.' He tells us, at page 20:

> The proximity to the magnetic pole accounts for the sluggishness of the compass in these waters where no reliance can be placed on the compass, this with the uncharted coast renders the approach to any of the harbours uncertain and dangerous.

I have also the log of the steamship 'Adventure' which went out last year, and I found a few notes in it where it is stated that the compass deviated as much as 19 degrees. Imagine a ship in water where there is a snow storm and where there is no space, no opening, and with a compass varying 19 degress ! Can you imagine anything more dangerous in the shape of navigation than that ? Then we talk about four months of navigation. Here is a fact that Mr. A. P. Low was in the Hudson bay all year, and he sailed at the earliest date he could get out. On the opening of the spring, although the ship was ready she could not get away until the 18th of July, the earliest date (page 34 of report). The 'Adventure' a steamer chartered by the Dominion government was there last year discharging her cargo. She was a small boat, built a year ago, with plates an inch thick, costing $180,000. The captain of that boat, the 'Adventure,' came away the 1st of October, the latest date according to the ship's own log that he could venture to remain:—

> Boat left for shore to get mail ; moderate wind and snow, freezing hard ; 5 p.m. hove up anchor ; 6.25 streamed log off Battery beacon. On the 28th September. Blowing a gale with heavy squalls of snow. Then on October 1 the ship's log records 'wind and snow ; freezing hard.'

So that he came away with a boat not to be equalled in any country. She was only built a year ago, costing $180,000, and the captain of that boat would not dare stay there after the 1st day of October.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Where was he on the 18th July ?

Hon. Mr. McGREGOR—Low, with the 'Neptune' was in Hudson bay all winter. The 'Adventure' was not there at that date. The 18th of July was the earliest date which Mr. Low says the 'Neptune' could sail. It was not the harbour ice that he was afraid of. She would go through a foot and a half of ice any time. It was the navigation outside he was afraid of. I will give you the deviation at the different times. On the inward voyage he left Sydney on Friday, the 3rd, and the fourth day out he was in the ice. She speeds, under fifteen tons of coal, ten knots an hour.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This is the 'Adventure,' and not the 'Neptune.'

Hon. Mr. McGREGOR—On the tenth of August there is this note :—

8 p.m., light northeast wind, weather clear, steaming through ice ; 8.25 rounded Cape Chidley. Met heavy Arctic ice. Rounded into Burwell harbour, and at 1 p.m. commenced discharging cargo. Found very difficult to land on account of ice.

On the 16th August—

3 p.m., misty weather, cast lead seven fathoms ; 4 p.m., let go port anchor, thick fog, compass 19 degrees deviation.

Friday, 28th September—

A strong wind, a dull overcast. 9.30, left ship with boats loaded with coal and general cargo, wind increasing ; 2 p.m., coming off to ship launch flooded and stopped, had to anchor with 4 boats astern ; 3.15 p.m., reached ship and hoisted all on board. 5 p.m., heavy squalls with snow ; 6 p.m., blowing a gale.

On the 1st October he left some 300 or 500 tons of cargo, not because he was afraid of Hudson bay, but because he was afraid of navigation in the straits. Hudson bay, for navigable purposes, is an absolute impossibility. I was talking to Mr. Robt. Reid, one of the largest steamer owners in Montreal last evening, without reference to this matter, and he stated in reference to the carrying of freights, that they were changing their ships into passenger boats for the reason that grain was now being carried from Montreal and New York at nine pence per quarter, or one penny per bushel.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—From where?

Hon. Mr. McGREGOR—From Montreal to Liverpool. That Hudson bay can become a great factor in the transportation of grain appears to me an absolute impossibility. Taking the statement of A. P. Low, that the 18th of July was the earliest date he could sail, although ready long before that, and the log of the 'Adventure' that the 1st of October was the latest date safe to remain, proves conclusively that there is less than two and a half months of open water. No company is likely to be found who would build costly ships for a special trade for a two and a half months service, with the competition of New York and Montreal carrying grain at one penny per bushel, so that Hudson bay route cannot be successful as a commercial enterprise.

Hon. Mr. TALBOT moved that the debate be adjourned until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until 3 p.m. to-morrow.

THE SENATE.

OTTAWA, Wednesday, February 20, 1907.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

ST. JOSEPH TRANSPORTATION COMPANY BILL.

BILL WITHDRAWN.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN, from the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, to whom was referred Bill (J) An Act to incorporate the St. Joseph Transportation Company, reported that the promoters ask leave to withdraw the said Bill and the committee recommend that such leave be given.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is understood that the fee is to be returned, less the cost of printing ?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—I move that the report be concurred in, and also the return of the fees to the promoters, less the cost of printing.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Does the report of the committee refer to the printing ?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—No.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If it is the report of the committee all right ; if not, a distinct motion must be made.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Then I give notice that the fees be returned, less the cost of printing.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I do not say I would not agree, but I say if the hon. gentleman wants to make that motion he must also make another motion for the suspension of the rules.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—I move that the report be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

STRATFORD AND ST. JOSEPH RADIAL RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN, from the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, to whom was referred Bill (K) An Act to incorporate the Stratford and St. Joseph Radial Railway Company, reported that the preamble of the Bill had not been proved to the satisfaction of the committee. He said : The ground upon which the committee make this report is that the matter is one which comes within the jurisdiction of the province of Ontario, and that this Bill should have been applied for in the local legislature.

The report was concurred in.

THE RULES OF THE SENATE.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved :

That the Committee on Standing Orders be instructed to consider the desirability of assimilating the rules of the Senate with respect to private Bills and petitions relating thereto, to those of the House of Commons, and, if they think such assimilation desirable, to report such amendments to the rules of the Senate as may be necessary to bring it about.

It will be remembered that the rules of the Senate were revised the session before last. An effort was made at the time to secure, as far as possible, uniformity between our rules with respect to private Bills and the rules of the House of Commons ; but since the time when our rules were adopted the other House have made certain changes in the regulations which the rules provide as to private Bills ; and it seems to be desirable, that as in the past there should be at least reasonable uniformity between the rules of the two Houses. The most important change made by the House of Commons is in rule 88, which corresponds with our rule 114. With the permission of the House, I shall just read a few lines to show the nature of the change. Paragraph 3 reads :

The following charges shall also be levied and paid in addition to the foregoing.

The foregoing are similar to those which are provided for in our rules, the deposit of $200 and payment of the cost of printing.

(a) When any rule of the House is suspended in reference to a Bill or the petition therefor, for each such suspension, $100.

(b) When a Bill is presented in the House after the eighth week of the session and before the end of the twelfth week, $100.

(c) When a Bill is presented in the House after the twelfth week of the session, $200.

And then there is a provision for a gradual increase of the fee to be paid in proportion to the amount of the capital, and finally for every additional million dollars or fractional part thereof, $100.

These are the most important changes which have been made. A good many hon. gentlemen were under the impression that if we allowed the difference to continue—that is if we made no provision for a payment of those additional sums—a large amount of the private Bill work would be done in this House ; but the Commons have provided against that, because they have provided that if a Bill passes through the Senate and goes down to the Commons, then the promoter of the Bill will be credited with the amount which he has paid in the Senate and will be obliged to pay the difference in the Commons, so that we are not likely to receive any increased work or any increased revenue under that rule. There is a proviso in rule 88 which, however, does not go very far back :

Provided, however, that if a petition for any such Bill has been received by this House (that is the Commons) within the first six weeks of the session, the additional charges made under subsections (b) and (c) of section 3 shall not be levied.

That is, when a Bill is presented in the House after the eighth week of the session and before the end of the twelfth week, or when a Bill is presented in the House after the twelfth week of the session, if a petition has been presented within the first six weeks, then these additional amounts will not be exacted.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I do not propose to enter any objection to the motion ; I merely desire to call the attention of this honourable House to the fact that, in my humble opinion, the Senate has not been treated with the same courtesy which this Chamber tendered to the House of Commons in connection with the rules. When we decided to make a change in our rules, we communicated with the House of Commons and invited a conference with them in order that our rules would harmonize. The House of Commons have not done anything of that kind. They have changed the rules without any intimation to us. There is no reason to adopt their rules unless, on their merits, they should be adopted. They should not be adopted for the mere sake of making our rules agree with theirs.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Some time ago I asked if we could be put in possession of the rules of the House of Commons. I see they are printed now. I think if it is possible we should have them.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I thought they were distributed. If not I shall see that senators all get copies of them.

The motion was agreed to.

THE FRENCH VERSION OF REVISED STATUTES.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY called attention

To the following declaration made on December 4, 1906, by the Honourable the Secretary of State in relation to the French version of the Revised Statutes, 1906 :

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I understand they are making rapid progress with it (the French version). Additional translators are employed, and it is hoped it will be ready on the 1st January.

And will ask :

The 1st January being now passed, is the French version of the Revised Statutes, 1906, ready ?

If not, when will it be ready ?

How many additional employees have been working at that French version ?

What are their names, and how many days have they been employed at that work ?

When will the French version of the Revised Statutes, 1906, be ready ?

He said : Is the hon. minister ready to give the names of those additional employees ?

Hon. Mr. POWER.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I thought I gave the names yesterday. I was not able to ascertain the renumeration paid. Of course, on Wednesday, the House sits at two o'clock, and I had no opportunity of seeing any of my colleagues.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—We may allow that question to drop, and I have one for tomorrow which will, perhaps, serve the purpose better than the first one. If I had received an answer to the inquiry I have just made, I would have dropped the second one, but as I have not received an answer to it, I will drop the first one, and allow the second one to remain on the paper.

The inquiry was dropped.

POSSESSION OF LANDS IN THE NORTH OF THE DOMINION.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER moved :

That it be resolved that the Senate is of opinion that the time has come for Canada to make a formal declaration of possession of the lands and islands situated in the north of the Dominion, and extending to the north pole.

He said : It is somewhat—I do not know if I may not call it jarring, to read occasionally in the United States papers such paragraphs as this—

The captain of whaler so and so has hoisted the United States flag on a certain island; or that some United States navigator in the Arctic waters has planted the United States flag on another island and taken possession of it, when by referring to our atlas we find that those islands and lands are situated in the Canadian Arctic waters. Reflecting upon what effect those acts of possession might have on Canadian ownership and considering that, although they may be merely of a sportive character, or matters of amusement, still they may have serious consequences in the future, especially when we remember the importance that our friends to the south have attached to as small acts of possession as these in the settlement of our disputes with them, in 1783, for example, and later on, in the matter of the Ashburton Treaty, and still later in the settlement with them of our Alaska frontier. I more especially looked into the question in order to ascertain as far as I could whether those islands and lands over which those United States whalers have hoisted the United States flag did not actually and positively belong to the British empire and to the Dominion of Canada. I have arrived at the conclusion that all the lands and islands that are situated north of the Canadian northern limits and extend to the north pole do belong unquestionably to the Crown of England and ever since the British North America Act, to the Dominion of Canada. England is the possessor of those lands by right of discovery and actual possession, and here I will be excused, I am sure, in going back into history, a little bit, in order to make out my contention. I will be as brief as possible, desiring in no wise to tire my hon. hearers, deeply impressed as I may be with the importance of the question I have the honour of bringing before your attention. That question of title will, some day, be brought up in one way or other, and it is, I believe, proper that we should prepare our friends to the south, and assert in as public a manner as possible our dominion over those lands. Now is the proper time to do so, when England and the United States are on the best of terms, now that the air resounds with echoes and declarations of universal peace, and now that we have pending some questions to be resolved between us and the United States. England can well establish her sovereignty over all the lands that lie to the north of this continent, by right of discovery. Coming to this right, in 1496, just immediately after the news of the discovery of America by Columbus had reached England, coupled with the fabled riches of the orient that Spain and Portugal were to be heirs to by the mere act of discovery, John Cabot, a stranger in England, but who had been naturalized there, a man equal in renown with Columbus, went to the Court of Henry VII., and showed him that while it was too late for England to follow upon the steps of Columbus, since Pope Alexander VI., had made a partition of the heathen countries discovered, by Columbus, and since also the treaty of Tordesillas had confirmed the partition between Spain and Portugal of these territories, had disposed of all the regions touched by the Spanish and Portuguese navigators, there was, however, a chance for England to secure the way to the orient, to the kingdom of the great Kahn, China and Japan, and that was by the northwest passage. This was shown pretty conclusively from maps he had, and he succeeded in getting a ship, the 'Matthew,' of small tonnage, in which he sailed early in the spring of 1497 in quest of a shorter passage than that discovered by Columbus to the Orient.

The object was commercial. At that time no one dreamed of the existence of the separate continent known as America. It was thought to be a part of Asia, which it nearly is, as it is disconnected only by the Behring Strait, or, if not a part of Asia, to be an island intervening between Europe and Asia. Cabot returned from his voyage back to England in the month of August of the same year, and reported having landed on a new island, as he called it and having coasted it for 300 leagues without finding any inhabitants, but that he had found the way for a shorter passage to the west. At the time of the landing of Cabot on the coast of Labrador, Columbus had not yet laid his foot on the American continent. Cabot was the first white man of that period to land on the continent; Columbus had only as yet discovered the West India Islands. What part of America Cabot discovered was for years a moot question, but is now conceded that Labrador is the coast which he discovered, because leaving Bristol, in latitude 51·50, he himself says that he rounded Ireland, and after sailing two days north he took to the west, leaving the sun to his right hand side. As he mentions no accident on the way, this course would land him somewhere about the mouth of Hudson bay, and very likely that is where he did land. He held a charter from the King. He relates that he hoisted the flag of England on the land he discovered, being therefore the first discoverer and the first to take possession of those regions just as effectively as central and South America had been taken possession of by Spanish and Portuguese navigators. Immediately upon his making his reports, the merchants of England and especially of Bristol, and the King himself, became very much interested. He secured five ships for a second expedition, which were loaded with presents and articles of exchange. It is reported that the King of England fitted out one of the ships himself. Cabot sailed with another charter the following year. The first had been granted to him and Sebastian, his son; the second was to himself alone. He sailed with those five vessels, stating that he was going exactly where he had been the year before, and where he had found the entrance to a passage to the orient, but he never returned. From all appearances, Cabot entered Hudson bay and was lost, as was Hudson himself later on, and many others have been in its dangerous recesses. Cabot never returned and never made a report, but some of his ships returned and reports were collected by Cabot's son, who probably never had set a foot on the American continent, but built a reputation for himself on the discoveries of his father, and the reports of his companions. This is the first formal act of possession made on the northern part of this continent by any European power, and that act of possession redounds to England. It is English possession. After the Cabots, the English court followed up the search for a passage to Japan and China by the north as the English know how to follow any problem they once undertake to solve. For over a century and a half they sent explorers, mariners after mariners and sailors after sailors who successively went for the purpose of forcing their passage to Cathay with a mission to take possession of North America in the name of England. I may mention first Frobisher, who was sent thither by Elizabeth, and who returned after having landed on the American continent with reports that a possible northwest passage existed. He was sent back twice again by the great Queen of England. After Frobisher, Captain Davis sailed as far north as the Arctic circle, and Captain Perry, as early as 1666, penetrated very far inland to the west and reached latitude 82 north, making four voyages, three of them in the employ of the court of England, and one in the employ of the Dutch. Thomas Button, in 1612, erected a cross at the mouth of the Nelson river, and took possession of those parts in the name of England. He was followed by Captain Baffin and by Captain Fox, each taking formal possession of the spots where he landed. Later on Zack Gilham, Capt. Newland, and many other sturdy seamen crossed over to America in search of that passage, and each and every one of them took possession in the name of the King. That is certainly sufficient to establish a right of possession by discovery, since it has been agreed among nations that in order to establish a good title by discovery the country must be previously unknown, formal possession must be taken and acts of occupancy must be done; that the intention of occupying the country must exist by the parties making the discovery and that peaceable possession should follow. All these conditions exist in the case of England taking possession of North America. True, our ex-colleague, Hon. David Mills, in the 'Boundaries of Ontario' somewhat challenges the right of England to possession of our northern regions on the ground of non-occupancy, maintaining that settlement and tilling of the ground must actually take place. That applies, no doubt, to countries with a temperate climate where agricultural settlement is possible; but in the case of Arctic wastes and recesses, what is deemed, in my view of it, sufficient to establish possessions and give a good title, is occupancy as much as occupancy can take place. No more would be demanded to make a perfect title for England in those regions than is requisite in the case of France in the Sahara Desert. No one expects France to till the Sahara Desert in order to come within the definition of what is needed to perfect occupancy. The fact is, England did what could be done in the way of occupancy and its authority over Hudson Bay and the lands and islands lying to the north of it has remained unchallenged for all that period of time. Russia, during the discussion arising out of the Alaska boundaries, laid down the doctrine that fifty years of uncontested possession gave sovereignty over Arctic regions. From the time of Cabot to the actual establishment of the Hudson Bay Company, to which I shall refer later, 170 years elapsed of unchallenged peaceful occupation of the lands and islands lying north of Hudson Bay. Therefore on that ground the title of England to the Arctic regions seems to be perfect. During all that time the northwest passage had not been found, though England was still intent on finding it. In 1746, the British parliament passed an Act part of which I will read, because it may serve as a model for an Act of a similar character which I hope may be passed by our own parliament. I am reading now from the Act of 1746:

Whereas the discovery of a northwest passage through Hudson's straits to the western American ocean, will be of great benefit and advantage to the trade of this kingdom; and whereas it will be a great advantage to adventurers to attempt the same, if a public reward was given to such person or persons as shall make a perfect discovery of the said passage. May it therefore please Your Majesty that it may be enacted ; and be it enacted by the King's Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords, spiritual and temporal, and Commons in this present parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that if any ship or vessel, ships or vessels, belonging to any of His Majesty's subjects shall find out and sail through any passage by sea between Hudson bay and the western and northern ocean of America, the owner or owners of such ship or ships, vessel or vessels as aforesaid, so first finding out and sailing through the said passage, his or their executors, administrators or assigns, shall be entitled to receive and shall receive as a reward for such discovery the sum of twenty thousand pounds.

So far, up to that date, the discoveries had been mainly in the north. England wanted a route across to the Pacific. Following this magnificent offer of $100,000 came Franklin, of whose heroic exploits we all know. Franklin did more towards exploring our northern hemisphere than any other man. He travelled no less than 1,000 miles in the Arctic region until he heroically sacrificed his life in exploratory work. That was in the fifties. To McClure is due the enduring honour of, at least, finding the coveted northwest passage. In 1853, he crossed from the Alaskan waters to the Atlantic ocean, proving conclusively that such a passage as had been sought for during three and a half centuries by other explorers did exist. McClure secured the prize offered of $100,000 for discovering it. McClure took possession of the land he travelled over. He acted in behalf of England; therefore the dominion of England extends not only northerly, but all across the northern continent to Alaska. This again, in my estimation, is sufficient to establish a title of dominion by right of discovery; at least to perfect it. Now, all the rights and titles of England over those regions have been handed to us by virtue of the British North America Act. There was, however, one nation that contested England's supremacy, not to the northern regions, but around Hudson bay, and that nation was France. After the time of Cabot, and for nearly two centuries, little was known of what English sailors were doing in Arctic America, though in the meantime France, through Jacques Cartier, had discovered and taken formal possession of what to-day constitutes eastern Canada, and what was then called New France. As early as 1626, a French company, the Company of New France, was formed which was given powers about as extensive as those given later on to the Hudson Bay Company. Those powers were exclusive in their nature and gave a right to that company to traffic with the Indians for furs all the way from the St. Lawrence up to and including Hudson bay. In 1656, the Sovereign Council of Quebec authorized Jean Bourdon to make discoveries in and take possession of Hudson bay, which he did. Afterwards again Governor d'Argenson despatched thither Father Dublon and the Sieur de la Vallière, who also made acts of possession over parts of Hudson bay. More envoys followed d'Argenson, the Sieur Duquet and others. When the French found out that the English had established posts there as early as 1670, they fell out, of course, as they naturally would at that time. The French and English fought. In 1680, there were no less than six trading posts in Hudson bay. Moose Fort, Fort Rubert, Fort Albany, Fort Nelson and Fort Bourbon, a French fort. They began fighting in time of peace. Between 1682 and 1687 most of the English forts were taken by the French, the hero on the French side being Lemoine d'Iberville, whose history reads like a romance. The Hudson Bay Company made complaint to the King of the encroachments of the French and it was resented in England. William III. who had renewed the Hudson Bay charter, he himself being interested in the company, espoused the cause of the Hudson Bay Company. In the declaration of war which ensued, mention is made of the wrongs suffered by the Hudson Bay Company, and this is given as one of the causes justifying the war, which goes to show that England never relinquished her rights around and in Hudson bay. Here is the clause:

That the French King should invade our Caribbee islands and possess himself of our territories of the province of New York and Hudson bay; in hostile manner, seizing our forts and burning our subjects' houses, &c.

These refer to the Hudson Bay forts. By the peace of Ryswick, the English forts, which practically constituted the whole of the settlement around Hudson bay, were left to the French ; but after the war of the Spanish Succession, the Treaty of Utrecht gave over to England almost the whole of Hudson bay; until finally, in 1763, the treaty of Paris surrendered to England all the rights that France then had or ever had in these northern regions, making, therefore, the title of England absolutely complete. France was the only nation that had ever contested the Supremacy of England over Hudson bay and the adjoining territories. England, after the treaty of Paris 1763, became and has continued, and in my estimation is still the possessor of the whole of the northern part of the continent. To complete the title of Sovereignty over a new country, occupancy is necessary. It is easy to show that what occupancy was possible in our northern regions was made in behalf of England, and this again completes the title and makes it perfect. As I said before, the occupancy must vary with the conditions of the country. Brazil claimed the whole of its territory before having explored one-tenth of it because there was no possibility of exploring it at that time. Venezuela is claiming all the country traversed by the Orinoco, and it is only a few years since the sources of the Orinoco were discovered. The occupancy must be according to the conditions of the country. Now the occupancy by England of our northern latitudes was almost as perfect as it could be, and the occupancy was that of the Hudson Bay Company. The history of that country is one of the most interesting. That company's history is a noble one. Its promoters, its presidents, from Prince Rupert and Lord Churchill, afterwards Duke of Marlborough, down to Lord Strathcona, that company of all companies I have read of, of all companies that have worked for the good of England, of all empire builders is the noblest I know in the history of the empire. Prince Rupert was a cousin or brother of the King, I forget which.

Following the reports of the discoveries I have just mentioned, finding there was an immense traffic to be carried on in that country, he applied to the King for a charter. The charter was granted. It appears even that the King was glad that so little was asked of him from his nephew, to whom he owed many an obligation. The charter was granted, the holders of which were noblemen—I believe the King himself was a stockholder in the company. I will read the House a passage from the charter which pertains to the subject-matter contained in my proposition :

> To all to whom these presents shall come, greeting :
> Whereas our dearly beloved cousin Prince Rupert, &c., . . . have at their own great cost and charges undertaken an expedition for Hudson bay in the northwest part of America for the discovery of a new passage into the south sea, and for the finding some trade for furs, minerals and other considerable commodities . . . and whereas the said undertakers, for their further encouragement in the said design have humbly besought us to incorporate them and grant unto them and their successors, the sole trade and commerce of all those seas, straits, bays, rivers, lakes, creeks, and sounds, in whatsoever latitude they shall be, that lie within the entrance of the straits, commonly called the Hudson straits, together with all the lands, countries and territories upon the coast and confines of the seas, straits, bays, lakes, rivers, creeks and sounds aforesaid, which are not now actually possessed by any of our subjects, or by the subjects of other Christian prince or state.

That is the scope of the geographical privileges granted to the Hudson Bay Company. It is, as you see, unlimited. Prince Rupert and his associates immediately repaired to the new world and established their first forts on the Hudson bay. At the time of their coming over, there were maps published—I saw them myself—showing that the territories discovered and taken possession of by English sailors extended up and over the 82nd parallel north. According to the theory that the frontage of the sea-board carried with it the strip of land all the way across the continent, the Hudson Bay Company, from 1670 until their surrender to Canada, pushed their way west, and held that the whole of North America belonged to them by right of that charter. The Hudson Bay Company continued, as we have seen, notwithstanding some vicissitudes, uninterruptedly in the possession of Hudson bay territories from the time of their first establishment, in 1670, up to the surrender of their possession, about two million and a half square miles, more than half of the United States, almost half the size of the whole of Europe, to the Canadian government, for the sum of three hundred thousand pounds sterling. Therefore, Canada having, by purchase, acquired all the rights that were ever possessed by the Hudson Bay Company, can claim to-day possession of all the lands and islands extending north of the St. Lawrence up to the most hyperborean extremities—up to the north pole. That contention, I believe, cannot be very well disproved. I will add more; if England had followed out what were the pretensions, and the legitimate pretensions of the Hudson Bay Company, to-day a part of the territory claimed by and awarded to the United States would belong to Canada. Oregon would be Canadian territory, and possibly the lines which separate us from our neighbours would be much more to the south. But, at the time, these territories were deemed of little value, and England did not attach the importance to them that she might or should have. There was no one to plead in favour of Canada. The situation was such that we were, by the terms of the treaty of 1783, deprived of territories which should belong to us, but it was not the fault of the Hudson Bay Company, who, to the last, fought for their rights. Their rights to-day are our rights. When the Hudson Bay Company were called upon, in 1750, to lay before the Lords of Trade and Plantations a description of the limits of their territory, they stated that 'towards the north all the lands that lie at the north end on the north side or coast of said bay and extending from the bay northwards to the utmost limits of the lands towards the North Pole' were theirs. What were their possessions are to-day our possessions. We have a fourth claim, we can establish a fourth ground for ownership for all the lands and islands that extend from the arctic circle up to the north pole. Last year, I think it was, when our Capt. Bernier was in New York, a guest of the Arctic club, the question being mooted as to the ownership of Arctic lands, it was proposed and agreed—and this is not a novel affair—that in future partition, of northern lands, a country whose possession to-day goes up to the Arctic regions, will have a right, or should have a right, or has a right to all the lands that are to be found in the waters between a line extending from its eastern extremity north, and another line extending from the western extremity north. All the lands between the two lines up to the north pole should belong and do belong to the country whose territory abuts up there. Now if we take our geography, it is a simple matter. We find that going around the earth, at the latitude of say between 70 and 80 degrees parallel, all the lands and islands up towards the pole from the 5th to the 32nd degree of longitude east, belong to Norway and Sweden. From the western extremity of the Muskovite empire to its eastern extremity, across Lapland, Archangel and Siberia, that is from about the 32nd to the 190th east, and then overlapping the western hemisphere by ten degrees or 170 degrees west, coinciding with the Behring strait, all north of that tract which is equal to two-fifths of the whole world, is claimed by Russia, Franz Joseph Land excepted. The distance east and west of Franz Joseph Land is about ten degrees. Now, continuing easterly from the Behring strait 170 degrees west to 141 degrees west, we cross the territory of Alaska. That is claimed by the United States, and no one will venture to go up north between those two lines and take possession of any land, or any island that may be discovered between its borders and the north pole. From 141 to 60 degrees west we are on Canadian territory. That is the territory that has been discovered by the seamen of England, that has been traversed by MacClure and by Franklin. It is the territory that has been taken possession of by the Hudson Bay Company, and it is the territory that we claim, and I hold that no foreigner has a right to go and hoist a flag on it up to the north pole, because it is not only within the sphere of possession of England, but it is in the actual possession of England. This partition of the polar regions seems to be the most natural, because it is simply a geographical one. By that means difficulties would be avoided, and there would be no cause for trouble between interested countries. Every country bordering on the Arctic regions would simply extend its possessions up to the north pole. I may be urged, and it would have been more strongly urged some few years ago—that those regions are of little value. I need not say to hon. gentlemen that they are of great value and their possibilities are simply immense. We are now opening the Hudson bay; we are about diverting our trade towards Hudson bay. No less than eight railways now have charters to build up to Hudson bay. Not only is the fur valuable, but the possibilities in fisheries are very promising. It is suspected that the Hudson bay people, who are dealing with furs more especially, have not revealed to the world the riches of the Hudson bay fisheries. It is beyond a doubt that for mining purposes and for commercial purposes those northern territories, which were held not many years ago to be useless, have unlimited possibilities before them. Such ideas as were entertained in the past were the cause of our losing Alaska. All that ignorance and misconception has vanished since our late colleague, Governor Schultz, made that investigation which proved so fruitful, showing what had been until then unknown to the civilized world—that along Peace river cereals and fruits could be grown to maturity. That information is being supplemented by the researches of the committee of this House, presided over by my hon. friend from Prince Albert (Hon. Mr. Davis) which has revealed further possibilities for agriculture up north, just under the arctic circle. In the presence of those facts we are not justified in taking any other view than the one I take now, that the possibilities of our northern hemisphere are unlimited. I wish to recall a historical fact. Many hon. gentlemen, perhaps all of us, are aware that those northern latitudes were not very long ago the home of prosperous colonies. Why is Greenland so named? Because not later than the time it got its appelation, about the tenth century, it was a land where grass and other green things flourished. Referring to my notes, I found yesterday the names of not less than seventeen bishops who lived and prospered in Greenland and the land opposite Davis basin from the middle of the twelfth century to the fourteenth century. At that time Iceland was certainly one of the most advanced countries of Europe in point of civilization. Not more than five or six centuries ago those countries, which are regarded as uninhabitable, were the homes of numerous colonies. The Crusades were preached in America at the time and our people sent contributions to Europe. We have proofs to-day that they sent help to the European brethren to go to the rescue of Jerusalem. If five or six centuries ago those uninhabitable regions were settled, why should a recurrence of the same thing not take place? We do not know very much about our remote history. This earth of ours moves by cycles. There is no doubt about that. By going further into history of the world, it can be shown that once upon a time this earth was inhabited up to the north pole. We find to-day in the north remains of animals, contemporaneous with men, such as the mammoth that lived only in a hot climate. We find such remains in the Yukon and in Alaska. What is the meaning of that? Certainly, that at a certain time those regions were habitable. At that time it is proved that man existed; and, therefore, it is to be inferred that even at the north pole at that time, men lived and prospered. Glacial periods have come and have gone. Geologists to-day think that there are no less than three or four successive glacial ages traceable, ice-capping coming down as far as the 40th parallel. There has been a moving up and down of the ice. We have recorded no less than four of those occurrences. On the other hand we know historically that no later than 600 or 700 years ago there were prosperous colonies within the Arctic circle. Possibly in a thousand years Canada will be a well settled country up to the north pole. We will not see it, our descendants may and possibly we shall find out there the place where Eden was, because we are aware that some dreamers, serious dreamers—all dreamers are more or less serious—think that Paradise Lost was up at the pole, and that those four big rivers spoken of flowed from the pole. These are of course in the field of hypothesis; but a matter which is not in that field, is the recurrence of cycles of cold and cycles of heat. What is pretty certain is that polar ice will melt again and that civilization would not be slow in following up as the lands will become cultivable. We can, therefore, see by imagination, and without a great stretch of it, a time when those Arctic regions will be dotted with cities and villages, and fields tilled by the husbandman; when the civilization of Canada will extend from the Atlantic to the Pacific and from the present isothermal line to the north pole. Possibly hon. gentleman at that time it will be very necessary for us to have the north pole as a way out of our Dominion, because by the last arrangements we have been encompassed and so much so that we can hardly find a place now to locate the terminus of our Grand Trunk Pacific Railway on the Pacific. The United States people have got a slice of territory which confines us to a narrow exit on the Pacific, while, on the other ocean, Labrador claims all the coast line from Belle Isle up to Cape Chidley. On the south we are barred by the great line that separates us from our United States neighbours; in fact we have just the St. Lawrence on which to travel out of and into our own country. I cannot very well come to parliament without passing through United States territory. We are encircled all around. Civilization moves west. It has come to the last untried country, which is Canada. From being the last, our country will likely become the first. Let us lay the foundations for a glorious and everlasting empire, the empire of prosperity and peace. The question I now raise is a timely and proper one, because it is sure to arise later on. Hon. gentlemen know that when the United States people hold an inch by possession they claim to hold a yard. Since the question is to come up, now is the proper time to settle it. You know that the high commissioners who met in Quebec in 1898 and moved to Washington the following year, have left many questions that were in dispute undetermined. One of those questions is the whale fishing, which is pertinent to the question I raised to-day in regard to the Hudson bay. I would suggest that the Canadian government consider this question of possession by us of our territory up to the north pole, and settle once for all with the United States people all pending questions, so that what Sir Wilfrid Laurier said the other day may have its full application, and that there may be no possible ground for strife of any kind between Canada and the United States.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—Will the hon. gentleman allow me to put a question to him? He spoke of the declaration of war in 1618, if I am correct, by France against England. Can he cite me the words that were used in that declaration of war, especially in connection with the complaint that France had taken possession of certain forts or trading posts on Hudson bay?

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—I did not claim that France had no right there. I said they came in conflict; that Hudson was there before the French, but the territory at that time was undivided. These uncertain boundaries were the cause of many wars, especially between England and France. The Quebec Company came in contact with the Hudson Bay Company, and in time of peace, between 1682 and 1687, six forts were taken and retaken. The French militia was headed by the brilliant hero Iberville, and the English defence was no less valorous. It happened that the French had the upper hand, and by the terms of the treaty of Ryswick the forts were left in the possession of those who then occupied them. The occupiers of the fort were the French, and the Hudson Bay Company bitterly complained against that as being an injustice, having to suffer for the arrangement made between the Kings of England and France; but this only lasted from the time of the treaty of Ryswick, which was signed, I believe, in 1697, to the time of the treaty of Utrecht, signed in 1713. By the treaty of Utrecht the whole of Hudson bay—not exactly the whole of Hudson bay, but the southern part of it—was left to the French, but all the western and northern portions of Hudson bay, up to the north pole, were allotted to the Hudson Bay Company, that is to say, to England.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—We have had a very interesting disquisition by my hon. friend on a matter which is not altogether merely academic, but which, in some aspects, may become of practical importance. As to some of the points which he has raised, a good deal of doubt might exist were one to examine minutely all the records which have been handed down touching the matter of the original discovery of America, and I am not sure that our Scandinavian ancestors might not put in a very good claim. I am rather inclined to think that the original discoverers of North America were the Vikings, who originally colonized Iceland, and who appear afterwards to have made their way to Greenland, and from that to have certainly gone, at any rate, to Newfoundland and Labrador, if not to southern portions of North America. But waiving that question of original discovery, and coming down to more modern times, there is no doubt, I think, that Canada has a very reasonably good ground to regard Hudson bay as a mare clausum and as belonging to it, that everything there may be considered as pertaining thereto. Touching the other point my hon. friend has raised, whether we, or whether any other nation is entitled to extend its territory to the north pole, I would like to reserve my opinion. I am not aware that there have been any original discoverers as yet who can assert a claim to the north pole, and I do not know that it would be of any great practical advantage to us, or to any other country, to assert jurisdiction quite as far north as that. However, I may state to my hon. friend that the importance of having the boundary of Canada defined to the northward has not at all escaped the attention of the government. They have, as the hon. gentleman knows, sent out an expedition very recently to that region, and have established certain posts, and they have likewise exercised various acts of dominion. They have, besides establishing the posts I have referred to, levied customs duties and have exercised our authority over the various whaling vessels they have come across, which, I think, will be found sufficient to maintain our just rights in that quarter. I would think, however, that it was scarcely expedient for us, bearing in mind that a conference is now going on, to enter into any formal declaration, either on the part of this body or the House of Commons as to the exact limits that we possess thereabouts. I think my hon. friend may rely upon it that the government will take all reasonable precaution to guard against any territory being wrested from us, even if it does appear at present to be of a rather unproductive character. As the hon. gentleman says, nobody can tell what may be found in some of these northern regions. Very few persons ever believed that such discoveries as have taken place in the Klondike, in Alaska, and in other similar regions of late years, could by any possibility have occurred, and it is quite within the limits of possibility that further exploration in the Hudson bay, and northward of that, may reveal mineral deposits of very considerable value and importance. The only point to which I would direct his attention is this: That while negotiations are going on, and while the government are exerting themselves, it may not be the part of policy to formally proclaim any special limitation, or attempt to make any delimitation of our rights there; and, therefore, although I can assure the hon. gentleman that due attention will be paid to the matters he has brought before the Senate, and that due precautions will be taken to protect and enforce our rights, I think he will do well not to press this motion, and unless other hon. gentlemen wish to enlighten the House on this subject, I would move that the debate be adjourned for the present.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Adjourned sine die.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is not one of our sitting days.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (25) An Act respecting the Qu'Appelle, Long Lake and Saskatchewan Railroad and Steamboat Company. — (Hon. Mr. Ross, Moosejaw.)

Bill (56) An Act to incorporate the Quinze and Blanche river Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Watson.)

TELEGRAPHIC COMMUNICATION WITH PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to direct the attention of the House and my hon. friend the Secretary of State, to this question of telegraphic communication with Prince Edward Island. I asked my hon. friend yesterday when he told us that this communication was in operation, if he would be surprised to learn to-day that his information was incorrect, and my hon. friend said he would indeed be surprised. Now, I have a surprise in store for him, I have a telegram. It appears that the government of Canada is too poor to send a telegram to Pictou to find out whether the service has been restored. However, I did that at my own expense to-day, and I have a reply which has been put in my hands since I came into the House. My hon. friend very courteously placed in my hands, before the House opened, the authority under which he made the statement to the House yesterday, which shows that he made it in perfectly good faith, but it was nine days old. The telegram that had been received was dated the eleventh of February. My telegram is dated to-day and reads :

Marconi people handling telegraph business from steamers at shore. Office here will be fully equipped to-morrow. Some delayed material will arrive this evening.

This is from the station agent at Pictou, N.S.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Will the hon. gentleman be kind enough to give me a copy of the telegram ?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I shall be happy to hand the telegram to my hon. friend. That is just as I understood the matter yesterday when it was before the House. Nearly three weeks ago the hon. gentleman made a somewhat definite promise to the House, on the authority of some subordinates of some other department—I have no doubt the hon. gentleman did not make it without authority—that the service would be open on last Saturday week, the 9th inst. It did not open on Saturday week, but on the 12th—that would be the Tuesday following, a week from yesterday—a notice was inserted in the papers on the island to the effect that commercial messages would be sent over by the steamer while the steamer was in port. As I explained to the House yesterday, that is valueless. The steamer is not in port in Pictou for any length of time in the day. She is crossing one way or the other nearly all the time, and unless the steamer is in port, no message can be received. Therefore, up to the present time there is no commercial communication worthy of the name. It is only a chance to get a telegram through when the steamer happens to be in the port of Pictou. There is a promise here, coming from Mr. Webster, the station agent of the Intercolonial Railway at Pictou, that the system is expected to be in operation to-morrow. It is to-morrow, to-morrow, to-morrow. That is the way it has been since the 5th of January and we will have to wait now, I suppose, until to-morrow.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the second reading of Bill (76) An Act to amend the Northwest Territories Act. He said: I am advised that the object of this Bill is to arm the Commissioner of the Mounted Police with the same powers which have heretofore been vested in the Lieutenant Governor of Keewatin, that is to say, the Lieutenant Governor of Manitoba I presume. It also provides that officers of the Mounted Police shall have certain powers of justices of the peace. If hon. gentlemen desire further time to look into it I have no objection to postpone the second reading, but if not, I move the second reading now and hon. gentlemen can discuss the details of it in committee, if there are any details which appear to them to require special examination, or to which they may take objection.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at three p.m.

THE SENATE.

OTTAWA, Thursday, February, 21, 1907.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (X) An Act to incorporate the Reliance Life Assurance Company of Canada.—(Hon. Mr. Perley.)

Bill (Y) An Act respecting the Midway and Vernon Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Bostock.)

Bill (Z) An Act to incorporate the St. Leo Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Legris.)

Bill (AA) An Act to incorporate the Ottawa Life Assurance Company.—(Hon. Mr. Kerr.)

Bill (BB) An Act respecting the British American Assurance Company.—(Hon. Mr. Jaffray.)

FRENCH TRANSLATION OF REVISED STATUTES.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired :

How many persons were engaged in the translation of the Revised Statutes of Canada into the French language before the 1st day January, 1907 ?

How many additional men have been engaged since January 1, 1907, in the work of translation ?

How many days has each translater been engaged on the work, and the names of those employed in the work of translation ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The answers to the hon. gentleman's question are as follows :

1. Three persons, namely : Horace St. Louis, K.C. ; Antonio Perrault, advocate, Montreal ; Alma Grondin, amanuensis, Ottawa.

2. None.

Mr. St. Louis, in the course of year 1906, from January 15 to December 25 did all the translation which is now being revised and prepared for the printer, who has already for distribution 200 pages of printed matter all read and corrected.

NORTHERN CANADA INVESTIGATION COMMITTEE.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS moved :

That the special committee appointed to inquire and report from time to time as to the value of that part of the Dominion lying north of the Saskatchewan watershed, east of the Rocky moontains, west and east of the Hudson's bay, comprising the north parts of the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan and the Mackenzie territory, its extent of navigable waters, rivers, lakes and sea coast and Ungava and Keewatin Territories, be empowered to send for persons, papers and records and to report from time to time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is no object in passing this motion provided the original arrangement is observed. It was understood that the cost of this investigation was to be limited to a certain figure. I presume my hon. friend intends to keep within that sum.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—My attention has been drawn to the fact that we did not take power under the original motion to send for any person. We had to send for one witness, and the object of this motion is to cover that expense and any other that might come up. I might tell the hon. leader of the House, that as far as the committee have gone, up to the present time, there has been very little expense incurred beyond what it will cost for reporting and printing the evidence. We are trying to keep within the estimate if we can. I think we will be able to furnish valuable information to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

REFUNDING FEES.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr DAVID, in the absence of Hon. Mr. Béique, moved :

That the fees paid on (Bill J) an Act to incorporate the St. Joseph Transportation Company, be refunded to the promoters of said Bill less the cost of printing and translation.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Is that the practice ?

Some hon. GENTLEMEN—Yes.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. DAVID, in the absence of Hon. Mr. Béique, moved :

That the fees paid on (Bill K) an Act to incorporate the Stratford and St. Joseph Radial Railway Company, be refunded to the promoes of the said Bill less the cost of printing and translation.

He said : It was understood in the committee that the promoters of the Bill should be permitted to withdraw it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—This Bill is not exactly in the same position as the one that we have just dealt with. One Bill was withdrawn because of an arrangement made with the committee, but the other was thrown out as coming under the exclusive jurisdiction of the local legislature.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—I was told by some members of the committee that they consented to withdraw. It is true there was a disposition on the part of the committee to reject the Bill, but the promoters consented to withdraw it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The preamble was not proved, and the report states that the Bill is rejected because it is entirely within the jurisdiction of the local legislature.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—If there is any objection, I ask permission to postpone the motion until Mr. Béique is here.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It would be drawing a pretty sharp line between these two Bills to consent to one motion and reject the other. However, I would rather see the matter postponed, because we want to be sure that we are not making a precedent. If we establish a precedent of refunding fees to those who come here and fail to get their Bills through, it is one which may prove disadvantageous.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We should follow the precedent. It was made perfectly clear before the committee that this Bill was withdrawn, and the unanimous opinion of the committee was that the fees should be remitted, less the cost of printing. The usual practice, since I have been in parliament, has been to refund the fees in cases of that kind.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The second Bill, to which the present motion refers, was not withdrawn, because I asked the promoters who were sitting close by me to withdraw it as I was sure it would be defeated, and they refused ; but the refunding of the fee is not setting a precedent. It has been done repeatedly where Bills have been brought before the Commons, and also in this House, and the fee that has been deposited was refunded, less the cost of printing and translation ; there is no doubt about that.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is the almost uniform practice, and, with respect to this measure, although there is a technical difference between the way in which this Bill was treated and the companion Bill, substantially the treatment was the same. When the promoters saw that the Bill which has been dealt with just now was about to be rejected, they said they would withdraw it, and that statement was not made with respect to this one. But, to all intents and purposes, the two Bills are in the same position, and it might be urged that this Bill which is now under consideration was different from the other, inasmuch as the subject-matter of this Bill came within the provincial jurisdiction. The hon. gentleman will remember that this House, and the other House as well, have been in the habit year after year of passing Bills of just that character, and it would be unfair, I think, to the promoters of this Bill not only to refuse to pass that Bill, but to mulct them in the sum of $150 or thereabouts in addition, under such circumstances.

Hon Mr. LANDRY—I do not object to the motion. I only call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that the reason given was, in my opinion, not a good one.

The motion was agreed to.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (40) An Act respecting the Indian River Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Roy.)

Bill (13) An Act respecting the Dominion Central Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Frost.)

Bill (14) An Act respecting the Georgian Bay and Seaboard Railway Company—(Hon. Mr. McMullen.)

SPAIN DIVORCE CASE.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ADOPTED.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER moved the adoption of the first report of the Standing Committee on Divorce, to whom was referred the petition of Osprey George Valentine Spain, together with the evidence. He said: It is now a month since this report was presented to the House. Owing to the fact that delay in the Printing Bureau prevented the circulation of the evidence, it has stood from week to week, but thanks to the intercession of the hon. leader of the House, who succeeded in getting the Bureau to work, the evidence has all been distributed.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think the hon. gentleman should give us more time.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—It is a month since the report was presented.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I beg pardon. The rule says when the report is made, the evidence is to accompany it, and it is not a month since we have had that report. I think the chairman of the Divorce Committee should prove the case and make it clear that the divorce should be given. What I have read of the report does not prove at all that adultery had been committed, and I do not see why the report should be adopted by this House. There is no case at all made out, in my opinion. I think the case presented here would not be accepted by the courts if it had been referred to them.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—Why does not the hon. gentleman get on the committee ?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I do not want to get on the committee. I want peace and harmony.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I really do not see the necessity of my going into details of the matter. Last year this report was not concurred in by the committee, for the reason that there was a collusive agreement between the parties. This year, a Bill is brought in as a new Bill, and very complete evidence was given to the satisfaction of the committee that the respondent and co-respondent were living together in New York, and have been almost continuously since the time the last Bill was introduced. I do not see how any hon. gentleman who reads the evidence at all can for one moment say that there has not been proof that the parties are living in adultery now. The fact that the respondent abandoned her case and did not appear at all, shows that she did not think she had any justification for appearing. I do not think there is any necessity for having the matter delayed any longer .

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I deplore very much the decision arrived at by the hon. gentleman, of not proving the case he has brought before us. In the evidence now before us, the new facts that are brought before us are simply a visit to a flat on the top of a house by two or three parties looking one night through the windows of a house on the opposite side of the street and trying to find out who was in the house. They saw the shadows in the windows. They went afterwards down to the house, and when they reached the entrance they saw only the lady of the house; the other party they imagined they would meet was not there, and no one has sworn that any evil act took place. Witnesses were asked by members of the committee if they could swear that anything immoral took place, and not one of them could swear that. The rest of the evidence is a repetition of a part of the evidence given last year, upon which the committee passed and decided there was no case. Where are the facts ? That visit of two or three persons one night to the top of a house across the street, looking through the windows——

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Did they see them going to bed ?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—No they did not. I move in amendment, that this report be not now concurred in, but that it be concurred in this day six months.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—I will second that motion.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I have not examined the evidence for myself very much, and it is not on a matter of evidence that I wish to make an observation in connection with this case. Last year the committee found that there was a collusive understanding between the parties, and it was on the ground of collusion that they agreed to recommend that the divorce should not be granted. That was the ground which the committee put before the House, I heard legal arguments by the chairman of the committee and by the hon. gentleman from Calgary on that question, and they came to the conclusion that there was collusion, notwithstanding the fact that the respondent, Mrs. Spain, contested the case. She was present with her counsel and fought the case steadily, and notwithstanding that, the committee arrived at the conclusion that there had been collusion, and feeling the force of the arguments used I supported the report of the committee. Now, this year the case comes on, and Mrs. Spain does not appear at all. I do not know that there is any evidence whatever against the fact of their being collusion. To my mind the fact that she appeared last year was somewhat of a strong argument against the theory of collusion; but the fact that she does not appear this year would, as the original evidence of collusion remains, settle the question of there being collusion. I really would like to know how that is overcome ? If the committee came to the conclusion last year that there was collusion, notwithstanding the fact that Mrs. Spain appeared with her lawyer and contested the case, now that she does not appear at all, it would seem that if there was collusion at that time, there must certainly be collusion now. The fact of her remaining away would be a strong proof of that collusion. I have said repeatedly, and I say again, that where there is no evidence set up in defence there should be some intervention such as there is in England, where the King's proctor intervenes to settle this question of collusion. There should be something of that kind. I contend that the fact of collusion, if there is any, should be looked into.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—Before that motion is put, I desire to call the attention of the House to a fact in the same line as my hon. friend from Marshfield did. Last year he said it was shown that there was collusion ample and sufficient to prevent the divorce Bill being granted. We had Captain Spain's evidence stating that there had really been no collusion at all. The evidence of petitioner's solicitor shows that he had entered into an agreement with the respondent that if she would not appear against him when applying for a divorce Bill, certain charges would be dropped. That evidence was ample to prevent the committee granting the application. Now, what additional evidence have we? It may be said that we have the evidence of Captain Spain that there is no collusion, but we had his evidence to that effect a year ago, and it was proved later on that there was collusion. Mrs. Spain has not appeared before the committee this year, and that would tend to show that there was collusion between the parties. There is no evidence of wrongdoing proved on the part of Mrs. Spain. The petitoner has had detectives on the track of his wife and Captain Salmon, spying out where they were every day, and, not satisfied with that, had the Marconi system brought into operation to prove that there was some illicit connection between the two. After all this espionage the utmost they can prove is that they saw the shadow of two figures against the window curtain, but they could not swear whether one of them was Captain Salmon or the negro porter. Are we to condemn Mrs. Spain or Captain Salmon on such evidence? Detectives had been watching them day in and day out from the very moment the Bill was thrown out last year, and yet not a tittle of evidence has been produced to show criminality between the respondent and the co-respondent. It is only on the best possible evidence of guilt that a divorce should be granted. I have followed the proceedings in this case carefully, and have read the evidence, not only what was taken this year but of last year also and I fail to find anything to sustain the demand of the petitioner. If we are to condemn people on circumstantial evidence, we had better cease to be a Divorce Committee and let the courts, which would not do an injustice of this kind, act in divorce proceedings in future.

If we adopt this report, we recognize the principle of granting a divorce on circumstantial evidence, and when the Bill comes up, we cannot reject it because it is based on this report. I condemn the placing of spies on the track of people who are suspected of wrong-doing without cause, and we should receive with a great deal of caution the statements of detectives in such cases. They are employed to do a certain work, are paid for it and their aim is to prove what they suspect. The detective was a hireling employed by Captain Spain to injure the reputation of his own wife and blacken the character of his own son. If we had evidence of guilt, I should vote for the Bill, but, until we have reasonable evidence of the respondent's guilt, I am here to raise my voice and to vote against any resolution to condemn the parties until I am satisfied they are really guilty. I shall, therefore, support the amendment.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I happen to be a member of that committee, and I must express my amazement at the views stated by the hon. gentleman from St. Thomas. If ever there was a case before this House deserving of consideration in the matter of divorce it is the case of Captain Spain. If the evidence in this case is not sufficient to establish the guilt of the respondent, I should like to know how you are ever going to find satisfactory evidence in such cases. These things do not take place on the house top; they do not occur in such a way that they can be viewed. I contend that the evidence submitted is clear beyond all question. It was clearly proven that Mrs. Spain was seen and recognized——

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—From the house-top

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—That she and Captain Salmon were fully recognized by two or three witnesses, and the relations between them were seen. This is clearly shown in evidence, and any one who will read it carefully, unless he is opposed to divorce under any circumstances, must feel it is his duty to support the Bill. My hon. friend from St. Thomas has intimated that it would be better to try these cases before a court of law. It is not for us to say that. Under the constitution of the country that duty has been imposed upon us, and we are simply doing our duty under the law as it stands. I should be glad indeed if divorce proceedings could be taken out of the hands of the Senate; but so long as we have to deal with divorce we must discharge our duty faithfully. The members of the Divorce Committee are honestly desirous of doing their duty as a juror would discharge his duty in a case of life and death. We have been unanimous in our conclusion, with the exception of the hon. gentleman from St. Thomas, who appears to differ from us on almost every case. We have to put up with that. The House has placed him on the committee. I do not say that he is not conscientious in the course he takes, but I claim there never was a case before the committee, since I have been a member of it, in which the petitioner was better entitled to a divorce. I am not going to say that perhaps Capt. Spain in the early stages of the troubles between himself and his wife was not to blame. I believe there was a good deal of dissipation on his part that tended somewhat to interfere with the good feeling that should prevail between man and wife, but that has been all dropped. He has kept away from it completely and set a good example in abandoning bad habits. He is now discharging his duty faithfully as an honest citizen of this Dominion and an officer of the government. Under all the circumstances, and in view of that evidence, if the House does not grant this divorce there is no hope of getting a divorce Bill through at all.

The Senate divided on the amendment which was rejected by the following vote.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN.

The SPEAKER—The question is now on the motion for concurrence in the report.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I object to the report being concurred in. The evidence laid before us is not complete. At page 52, we find that exhibit No. 1 is given, but exhibits 2, 3, and 4 do not appear at all.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—The hon. gentleman concurred in the House dealing with the report, and he cannot move an amendment now.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I did not concur in the report. I made a motion expressly not to concur. I still have a right to make any objection at any stage. I raise the point of order that the report is not complete.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—There is no evidence that the report is not complete. The mere fact of the statement of the exhibits does not establish the absence of them, or that such exhibits exist.

The SPEAKER—Has the hon. gentleman any other objection?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The point is this; we have a report that is a public document, and I say it is not complete. There is only one exhibit given.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—There is no evidence of that.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—And all the theory of the committee is based precisely on the plans put in as exhibits 2, 3 and 4.

The SPEAKER—I declare the point is not well taken. The question is on the motion for the adoption of the report.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think when the Speaker gives his decision, he should state the reason.

The SPEAKER—For two reasons; first, I have no means of deciding the question of fact, and the second is that the motion has been put.

The motion was carried on the same division reversed.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (13) An Act respecting La Compagnie du chemin de fer de Colonisation du Nord.—(Hon. Mr. Thibaudeau, de la Vallière.)

Bill (24) An Act respecting the Orford Mountain Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Mitchell.)

Bill (29) An Act to incorporate the National Accident and Guarantee Company of Canada.—(Hon. Mr. Coffey.)

Bill (37) An Act respecting the Royal Victoria Life Insurance Company.—(Hon. Mr. Forget.)

Bill (38) An Act respecting the Klondike Mines Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Ross, Moosejaw.)

Bill (49) An Act respecting the Central Counties Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Edwards.)

Bill (53) An Act respecting the Dominion Fire Insurance Company.—(Hon. Mr. Davis.)

Bill (64) An Act to incorporate the Alsek and Yukon Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Ross, Moosejaw.)

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY AND BRITISH COLUMBIA ELECTRIC RAILWAY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved the second reading of :

Bill (52) An Act to confirm certain agreements between the British Columbia Electric Railway Company, Limited, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, Lord Strathcona and Mount Royal, and Richard B. Angus, and between the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, the British Columbia Electric Railway Company, Limited, the Vancouver and Lulu Island Railway Company, Lord Strathcona and Mount Royal, and Richard B. Angus.

He said : This Bill refers to certain agreements that have been entered into between the British Columbia Electric Company and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and the individuals mentioned in the Bill with reference to the operation of three or four roads. I am not familiar with all the details of the agreements, but they are set forth in a very lengthy document which is attached as a schedule to the Bill, which I presume can be scanned more readily in the committee.

The motion was agreed to.

ANNUITY COMPANY OF CANADA BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG moved the second reading of Bill (65)) An Act respecting the Annuity Company of Canada.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I would remark to my hon. friend that I think he would do well to change the title of this Bill. In calling it an annuity Bill, it is quite possible that it may conflict with some legislation which may be introduced at no very distant date by the government, and I think the title would require to be changed. It may be done in committee, and I do not want to prevent it going there.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—This is not a new Bill.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I know that, but it may be expedient to change the title.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Speaking from memory, I think there was some difficulty about the title, and this one was selected, not the original choice, but selected as the one which would least conflict with existing legislation. If it is necessary, the title should be changed, I would not take the responsibility of doing it.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—We can consider the matter when it goes into committee.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think the title of the Bill should be changed. We may hereafter have a great many annuity companies in Canada. We might just as well call a company the insurance company.

The motion was agreed to.

INTERCOLONIAL AND PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND RAILWAYS EMPLOYEES' PROVIDENT FUND BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the second reading of Bill (68) An Act to establish the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island Railways Employees' Provident Fund.

He said : This is a Bill for the purpose of providing a fund out of which aged employees of the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island railways may be pensioned. Something similar to this, I am advised, has been provided by the various great railway corporations in Canada. The important point in this is that the government will be asked to contribute a certain sum, not, however, to exceed $100,000 in any one year towards this fund, the remainder being provided by contributions of the employees themselves. The Bill is one of very considerable length, and I presume it will serve all purposes better to discuss the matter in committee, always provided that the House approves of the principle. I may add that my hon. friend the Minister of Railways is strongly of the opinion that no extra cost will be inflicted on the country, because, as he informs me, there are a very considerable number of aged employees who cannot very well be turned out into the streets, but whom it is designed to pension off at the earliest opportunity for the more efficient working of the railway. The House will note that due precaution is taken, at least all the precaution I think that can be taken, to prevent this privilege from being abused, and they will also observe, as I said before, that the railway employees themselves will be expected to contribute to this fund in certain fixed proportions. I do not want to press this matter if my hon. friends wish time to consider it, but if they prefer to adopt the details of it in committee I will move the second reading.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Can my hon. friend say to what extent this Bill is modeled after the Superannuation Act, or whether it is modeled after the form of some of the superannuation provisions of the railways referred to ?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I understand they have followed very largely the provisions which are actually used by the great railway corporations to which I have referred, the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk in particular. I have not got the exact details of these, but that is my information in a general way. It has but very little analogy to the superannuation as it now stands on our statute-book. It is intended to be a railway pension fund in accordance with the practice which prevails on other roads, and, as I have mentioned, it is recommended by the Minister of Railways more especially on the ground that it will permit efficiency, and really will save money to the country instead of losing it. Also my hon. friend will notice that the sum that the government may contribute is limited—strictly not to exceed $100,000.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Do the superannuation allowances closely approximate those allowed by the railways I have referred to ?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I understand so. I understand they have seen the model on which this is based, and I am also advised that this has been the result of long and very careful deliberation between railway authorities and railway employees themselves. In fact it is a Bill introduced, I may say, by both parties, or certainly with the consent of both parties.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I suppose the difference between this and the Superannuation Act would consist in the fact that under the Superannuation Act the clerk or employee of the government has to be in the service for a certain number of years, and then, if there is a difficiency in the sum itself, that is paid out of the general fund of the country. In this case, if I understood the hon. gentleman aright, the government proposes to limit the contribution to $100,000 ?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That, I suppose, would be paid in at once ?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—To enable the government to superannuate the older employees to whom they have referred, who may have been in the service for a great number of years, but who have never paid anything and could not pay anything on account of their age and the fact of their being superannuated at once. That is the difference I suppose ?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—A portion would go to that purpose, but I understood from the Minister of Railways that they did not expect in the first instance to require the amount here named, that that is the maximum amount that would be required, according to his calculations.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I regret very much that the condition of things on the Intercolonial Railway appears to be such it becomes necessary for the government to suggest a method of this kind to retire a number of servants. We know that the Intercolonial Railway for a number of years has been loaded down with many officials without whom it could get along just as well. That has been the case for many many years, and I have no doubt it is the case to-day.

Of course if we are dealing with this question along the lines that have been taken by the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway and other lines, it is not so bad as it might be if there was no precedent at all for it on any important railway. I admit that there ought to be some little sympathy for men who have been for many years in the public service and have nothing to retire with. However, on looking over the official list of the Intercolonial Railway and comparing the payments, with the payments made to men on other lines, I think hon. gentlemen will find that they are about as well paid as any ordinary class of individuals in Canada, and they ought to be required to find a resting place for themselves in their old days in place of being pensioned on the country. However, they may have accumulated and there may be so many old men now on the road that it may look harsh, as the minister said, to turn them out without anything. No doubt the country should deal charitably with men of that stamp under these conditions. The point raised by the hon. member from Belleville is one that is worthy of consideration ; that is, those people have not contributed at all to the fund and when immediately placed on the superannuation list will reap all the advantages of superannuation, without having contributed one dollar. It is a pity we should have to consent to the system being inaugurated with that feature to begin with, because if they are allowed to draw without having contributed anything out of their salaries towards the fund, others will say that they are not fairly dealt with, if they have to contribute for a number of years out of their wages, and then, perhaps, after all, get a very limited amount in the way of retiring allowance. But in all those things there are difficulties to be met with that, perhaps, are hard to get over. I hope this measure will prove to be advantageous. The minister says that he has the assurance from the Minister of Railways that it will. I hope it will tend to reduce the gross amount spent on the operation of the Intercolonial Railway. We are all looking forward hopefully to that road making some return to the people of this country for the very large amount that is sunk in it. We have a right to expect something of that kind. I notice that it has been said, on more than one occasion, that the canals of this country stand in about the same relation to the treasury, as the Intercolonial Railway is. I do not agree with that. The British government spent nearly five million dollars on the canals of this country before Canada got responsible government, and after that we expended millions in extending the canals. That is quite right, but the British government, through their representatives, stepped in and made a treaty with the United States with respect to our canals that virtually destroyed their earning powers. The British government has never stepped in to destroy the earning power of the Intercolonial Railway, and, if they had not destroyed the earning powers of the canals they would now be making a fair return to the country, but under the circumstances we have to bear the burden. It is therefore necessary to say that the canals are no offset to the Intercolonial Railway. They bear no relation whatever to one another in any shape or form. Canada has a right to expect a return for the eighty millions spent on the Intercolonial Railway. The accommodations and the privileges—I do not grudge them to the people of the lower provinces, are better than are provided for any of the people of this Dominion.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—No, no.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—Better and cheaper. The Minister of Railways admitted last year that the accommodation accorded was cheaper and better than that given to any of the other provinces. As you say, we should look for some better returns from the Intercolonial Railway. We have a right to expect it. I hope this will be a step in the right direction. I am not going to challenge the statement of the minister, and I hopefully express for the Minister of Railways that it will accomplish that end. I hope it will, but I have some doubts. I think it may inaugurate a method by which very large expenditures may be saved to the country in the management of the Intercolonial Railway.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I would just state to my hon. friend that the point which I took, that some parties will be superannuated without contributing anything to the superannuation fund is inevitable, when you ask for a superannuation system at all. My hon. friend, I think, was not in parliament when the first superannuation scheme was introduced in Canada, and I remember that that precise point was taken, but it was felt then, and it seems to be in the nature of the case, that a certain small number of the oldest employees must receive a little extra benefit in this way. I do not think, however, that the number will be enough to materially affect the treasury.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The calculation of the Minister of Railways is $58,000 for that purpose.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I think it is something of that kind. He did not expect to use the whole of the $100,000.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It is quite true, as stated by the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, that this question has been up for many years. I have had communications myself from railway men about it for many years back, although it is only now that a basis of agreement has been arrived at. I am very glad to hear that the government, and all concerned, have studied the system of pensions in vogue on the great railways of the country, and I think when they follow that system they will be very likely to arrive at a fair and reasonable basis. One point had been raised;—I have a letter myself from a railway man who is affected—that since the principle of this Bill was practically conceived by the Minister of Railways, but before the measure was ready for submission to parliament, some of the aged men have been retired, and retired against their will and that they are cut out while others have been retained in order to get the benefit of this superannuation. I hope that there has not been any wrong or injury done that way. However, when we get into committee, I have no doubt the hon. minister, being aware that this point has been raised, will be able to make explanations to the House with reference to it. My hon. friend from Wellington never allows an opportunity of this kind to escape without entering on a sectional argument that some other part of the Dominion is reaping very great advantages at the expense of the part from which he comes. I am not going to discuss here, and I do not think this Bill properly calls for such a discussion, whether the rates on the Intercolonial Railway are very low or otherwise; but I am ready to make this statement very emphatically, that if the rates are low, the people of the upper provinces benefit from them very much more than the people of the lower provinces do; and for this reason, that the Intercolonial Railway has opened the markets of the lower provinces to the manufacturers of the upper provinces. They have taken advantage of it, and have established there a trade that they never could have got without the Intercolonial Railway. The freight furnished by the maritime provinces for the west, with the single exception of coal, bears higher proportionate charges as compared with the freight sent to the maritime provinces from the west. My hon. friend, and his friends in the upper provinces, have gained enormously ever since the opening of the Intercolonial Railway and the establishment of confederation, by securing a market in the lower provinces which they never could have got without it, and if the rates have been low they are the principal gainers.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (74) An Act respecting the Athabaska Northern Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Davis.)

Bill (W) An Act to incorporate the Travellers Indemnity Company of Canada.—(Hon. Mr. Edwards.)

Bill (48) An Act respecting the Canadian Northern Quebec Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Choquette.)

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (85) An Act to amend the Criminal Code. He said : This is a short Bill of four lines, which proposes to amend section 432 of the Criminal Code. In that part of the Code provision is made for certain marks of the Militia Department. For instance, candles are marked with blue and red cotton threads in each wick. In this case the mark is to be the broad arrow within the letter C.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Are all the militia stores indicated by particular marks ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—And are those marks indicated in the Act ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They are. For convenience I suppose, and for the sake of brevity, certain articles are named by a letter instead of by a number of words.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read a second time.

NATIONAL TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committe of the Whole on Bill (86) 'An Act respecting the National Transcontinental Railway.'

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The object of this Bill is to apply what is known as the Wages Liability Act to the National Transcontinental Railway, giving powers to the commissioners to assume the same prerogative the minister exercises. The Wages Liability Act makes this provision, that if a contractor on a public work carried on by the government of Canada fails to pay the labourer, the labourer may file his claim in the department with the minister, and, if it is found that the claim is a just one, it is deducted from the contractor's payment whenever payment is due. It is applying the same principle to the National Transcontinental Railway. It is to provide that contractors cannot deprive labourers of their wages.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Does it apply to sub-contractors ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

NAVIGATION OF HUDSON BAY.

DEBATE RESUMED.

The Order of the Day being called :

Resuming the further adjourned debate on the motion of the Honourable Mr. Ferguson : That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General ; praying that His Excellency may be pleased to lay on the Table of this House, copies of all reports and communications in possession of the government not already submitted to parliament, regarding the navigation of the Hudson's bay and the resources and climate of the territory contiguous thereto, also copies of all grants of fishing, mining and lumbering rights, given at any time, by the government, in the said bay and territory ; also copies of all reports of surveys received by the government from either engineers, surveyors or geologists, on the feasibility of railway routes, connecting any existing or prospective railway with any port on Hudson bay or James bay ; in aid of such railways. Also, copies of all reports received by the government in relation to the establishment of lights or other aids to navigation of Hudson bay and Hudson straits, and also a statement showing what action, if any, has been taken by the government regarding the establishment of such aids to navigation.—Hon. Mr. Talbot.

Hon. Mr. TALBOT said :—I was very much pleased when the hon. member for Marshfield introduced the motion that is now under discussion. Such a motion could not have been in better hands, and I congratulate him on the able manner in which he has dealt with the subject. He has furnished us with a mass of very useful information regarding an interesting and important part of our country. We Canadians have, in the past, been very slow in learning facts regarding Canada. It is only recently that we have begun to realize the enormous resources of our own country. In the past, we knew more about the rivers flowing into the Mediterranean sea than of those flowing into the great Canadian sea. We knew more of the rivers flowing into the Gulf of Mexico than of those flowing through our own country into the Arctic ocean. We knew more of the Nile, the Amazon and the Mississippi than of the mighty Mackenzie and Saskatchewan.

So, I was pleased when the hon. member introduced his motion, for I knew the discussion would lead to the dissemination of information regarding Hudson bay and the country around it.

The lack of reliable information regarding our country in the past has greatly retarded its development. I suppose every hon. member in this House remembers the time when it was thought that the only part of northwestern Canada in which wheat could be produced was the valley of the Red River. But year after year for the past 25 years, the settlers of the west have proved beyond any doubt by actual 'delivery of the goods', that the wheat producing area is very extensive. At the present time that area may be defined as extending from the eastern boundary of Manitoba to the foot hills of the Rocky Mountains, a distance of 1,000 miles, and from the American boundary to township 60, a distance of 360 miles, or 360,000 square miles.

That does not include the great Peace river country which, in parts, is also capable of producing splendid wheat; but as I do not know what extent of the Peace river country is capable of producing wheat, I have left it out of consideration. Now that area extending 1,000 miles from east to west, and 360 miles from north to south, or 360,000 square miles, is certainly an enormous tract of territory. I do not want to be understood as saying that the whole of that area is a good wheat country, but I do say that a large percentage of it is capable of producing splendid wheat and other cereals. It is difficult to realize what an area of that size really means. Perhaps a few comparisons would help us. That area then, containing 360,000 square miles, is 180 times the size of Prince Edward Island; 17 times the size of Nova Scotia; 13 times the size of New Brunswick; 12 times the size of Ireland; 2 times the size of France; 4 times the size of England, Scotland and Wales combined; 2 times the size of Spain; 24 times the size of Denmark. The portion of western Canada we are speaking about is being rapidly settled. Its resources are becoming known. The remakable fertility of the soil is attracting much attention. The increase in population in the last five years is remarkable.

Population of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta: 1901, 419,512; 1906, 808,863.

That is, the population of that part of the country we are speaking about has almost doubled in the last five years. Some years ago agriculture there was in what has been called the experimental stage. The farmers did not grow a great deal of wheat. Each farmer would have perhaps a few acres. They were testing the conditions of the country. They found that it could produce wheat, and they had enormous yields. The result was that they went more extensively into it. With the increase of settlement and the increased acreage under cultivation we are now producing enormous quantities. It is quite a common thing at the present time to find farmers who have hundreds of acres in wheat, and this last season it was easy to find farmers who had threshed from 25,000 to 50,000 bushels of wheat. The total yield of wheat in 1906 in the area described was between 85,000,000 and 100,000,000 bushels, and there is no doubt that if we should have a fair season in 1907 the yield will be a great deal more than that, as we will have a much larger area under wheat. The difficulty that we in the west now experience is in getting our products to market. The railway companies have for many years been, no doubt, making vigorous efforts to handle the products of the west; but it must be admitted that they have not succeeded very well. For several years in succession we have had grain blockades. The railway companies could not take the grain to market. This year the condition of affairs is what the people of the west consider practically unbearable. It has been stated, and I believe it is the fact, that not over 25 per cent of the wheat grown in those provinces during 1906 has yet been handled, and it is doubtful if the crop of 1906 will be marketed before the crop of 1907 is threshed.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—What proportion is now handled ?

Hon. Mr. TALBOT—About 25 per cent I believe. Now, if you take into account the loss to the farmers on account of this, it is something very serious indeed. The farmers are unable to take their grain to the railway stations in winter time. They are thus forced to do it in the summer when their men and their teams should be employed at the farm operations. The hon. gentleman from Wolseley expressed that very well a few days ago in speaking on this same question. But the wheat growers are not the only ones to suffer. The cattle growers and others, in fact all farm produce is in the same position. A rancher will go to the expense and trouble of rounding up thousands of cattle, and selecting perhaps 1,000 steers which he wishes to send to market. He will drive them many miles to the railway station, only to find that he will have to wait there for, perhaps, weeks before he can get a train to take the cattle away. The result is, he either has to let them go and be at an enormous expense in again collecting them, or he has to hold them in a range to which they are not accustomed, and they lose flesh there, and are much lighter in weight when shipped than they would have been if he could have got the cars when he was ready for them. Then the merchant will order manufactured goods, &c., from the east, and he finds he does not get them for many months after they are ordered. I personally know instances of merchants ordering Christmas good last summer. They got the invoice for the goods in October, but the goods did not reach their destination until Christmas day had gone by. So that the loss to the wheat growers, the ranchers, the farmers in general, the merchants and to the general public is very great indeed throughout the entire west, on account of the inability of the railways to handle the produce of the country. The people of the west have been looking for relief. How are they going to get over this difficulty ? For many years some of them have been discussing what is known as the Hudson Bay route. Many who have given the question a great deal of consideration, consider that the route is quite practicable, and believe that it should be opened up. We are not so very far indeed in that part of the country, from the Hudson Bay. The most northerly railway we have is the Canadian Northern Railway. That company has a line running from the city of Winnipeg to Edmonton ; then from the town of Warman in the province of Saskatchewan they have a branch to Prince Albert. From the city of Prince Albert they have a branch running southeast to lake Winnipegosis. On this branch, at a point near the northwestern corner of the province of Manitoba, is what is called the Hudson Bay Junction. In a northeasterly direction from that the Canadian Northern Railway people have started building a road towards Port Churchill. That road has almost reached—in fact is partly constructed to what is called the Pas on the Saskatchewan river. Now from the Pas to Port Churchill is only 400 miles. The nature and character of the country from the Pas to Port Churchill is well known. The Canadian Northern surveyors have gone over the ground carefully. Members of the geological department of the Dominion of Canada have also been over that proposed route, and report that there is no serious obstacle in the way of building a line between those two points. In fact, it is said to be remarkably easy, considering what they expected it to be. The character of the country through which the road would run is not, on the whole, good from an agricultural standpoint. There is a certain area, about 10,000 square miles which would make fairly good agricultural lands. The remainder of it is not good for agricultural purposes. But it has other resources. Through 40 miles of that distance there is a vast bed of limestone, which is said to be one of the best samples of building stone that we have in the western part of Canada, and, no doubt, when that road is built vast quarries will be established there, and the people of the west will use the limestone for building purposes.

The port at Churchill itself is admitted by all who have seen it to be one of the best in Canada. It could with very little expense be made a capital port. I will not say a great deal about the climate in that locality, but I would like to repeat some figures given by the hon. gentleman who made this motion. He has gone to a great deal of pains, and the figures will bear repetition.

The temperature of the water in Hudson Bay during July, August and September, is 53° F.

The average temperature of five streams flowing into Hudson Bay was during July, August and September, 61° F.

The average temperature of the air during the same three months was 62½° F.

Now those who have taken the pains to find out the average temperature in other places which are considered as having a splendid climate, will be surprised to know that the climate in parts of Hudson Bay district will compare favourably with those of other places that are considered much better. I have mentioned that Churchill harbour was an excellent one. The approach to it is deep and wide. The harbour itself is a mile long and half a mile wide, and its depth from 24 to 30 feet.

The average date of opening the harbour from years 1824 to 1894 was June 19.

Earliest date of opening, June 5, 1863.

Latest date of opening, July 2, 1866.

Earliest date of closing, November 1, 1837.

Latest date of closing, December 4, 1861 and 1885.

There is no doubt that as far as the harbour is concerned or as far as the bay is concerned, very little difficulty would be experienced in using them for nearly six months of the year.

The southern part of the bay is not very favourable I suppose, even in a good part of the summer for navigation, but it is a part that we would not require. From the mouth of the Nelson river to Cape Henrietta Maria, near the entrance to James Bay, the shore is very flat and level, and the water is shallow. When the tide recedes it leaves bare a shore of some six miles. The storms of winter force the ice from the northern parts down there, and it is piled up in immense masses and remains there for a long time; but the character of the bay is entirely different north of the mouth of the Nelson river. There it is deep water, or in other words the shore is abrupt from the mouth of the Nelson north, and they are not troubled with summer ice the way they are in the south. Unfortunately, however, the Hudson strait itself is probably the most difficult part to navigate; but taking everything into consideration and from all the reports I have been able to find, the navigation of the strait would be safe, or comparatively safe, for at least four months of the year.

The people of the west would like to see a railway constructed from the Pas on the Saskatchewan river to Port Churchill. It would be about 400 miles in length. They would like to see erected at Port Churchill elevators for the storage of grain. Some hon. gentleman in speaking of this road said it would be used for only three or four months of the year. Now, that would not be the case at all. We now have elevators at Fort William, where wheat is stored for the winter, and we can just as well have them at Port Churchill; then the railway from the Pas, or from the area I have mentioned, to Port Churchill, could be run the entire year and store the grain there. I believe that a certain portion of each season's crop could be moved to Liverpool the fall in which it was grown, for we would have at least two months of the season in which the ships could manage to get through the bay and strait before the close of navigation, and then in the winter time the farmers could take their wheat to the stations and the train could take it on to Port Churchill to be stored in the elevators for the next year. We expect as a result of this that we would be sure of getting our produce marketed before the spring work begins. This would give people more confidence in the country, some are already asking 'what is the use of growing grain if it cannot be disposed of?' The opening of this route would give such an impetus to the development of the west that our past record would be as nothing to it. We think that the prosperity of the whole of Canada depends on the development of the west. If the farmers of the west have not proper shipping facilities, then the development of the west is interfered with and the prosperity of Canada is checked. We believe that the prosperity of Canada for the last ten years was caused chiefly by the development of the west, and we would like to see this prosperity continued.

By the proposed route, a haul of our grain for a distance of over 1,000 miles would be dispensed with. Churchill is as near the centre of the western wheat belt as is Fort William, and Churchill is as near Liverpool as is Montreal. We would thus save the haul from Fort William to Montreal or a distance of 1,000 miles. The rates charged by the railway companies on grain for the distance are as follows :

Wheat from Saskatoon to Montreal, in carload lots, lake and rail—39 cents per one hundred pounds.

All rail, 44 cents per hundred pounds.

From Saskatoon to Fort William, 24 cents per one hundred pounds.

Lake and rail, Fort William to Montreal, 15 cents per one hundred pounds, or 9 cents. per bushel.

All rail from Fort William to Montreal, 20 cents per one hundred pounds or 12 cents a bushel.

Now if we can save 11 cents a bushel by this route it would be an enormous saving to the people of the west. Suppose that we have this year one hundred million bushels of wheat, and that the proposed route were now available, and that we sent half of it by that route, then the farmers of the west would have the snug sum of $5,500,000 more than they have now to spend in the eastern provinces on your manufactured goods, &c. All the eastern part of Canada would gain by that increase. But wheat is not the only product on which there would be a saving.

It costs $13.20 to ship an average steer from Saskatoon to Montreal, or about $8 to ship it from Fort William to Montreal. The proposed route would save this $8 per head, and increase the purchasing power of the western farmer by several more million dollars besides saving a thousand miles of a rough, hard trip, which is the severest part of the journey between the west and Liverpool. In conclusion, I may say, the opening of this route would be an immense benefit, not only to the western part of Canada, but to the whole Dominion.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS moved that the debate be adjourned until Tuesday next.

The motion was agreed to.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (DD) An Act respecting the Alberta Central Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Talbot.)

FRENCH TRANSLATION OF MILITIA ORDERS.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired of the government :

Do the military authorities intend to give the militia soon a consolidated edition of the regulations known under the name of 'The King's Regulations and Orders for the Militia of Canada' ; and, if so, will the militiamen of French origin have the benefit of a French version of those regulations ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The King's Regulations and Orders for the Militia of Canada are being revised by officers of the headquarters staff as expeditiously as possible, and, as soon as possible after the revision is completed, copies of the Regulations and Orders in French will be issued.

QUESTIONS OF PRIVILEGE.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I ask permission to make a few remarks on a personal matter. When the vote was taken yesterday on the Spain divorce Bill, the moment my name was called a jeering cry went up from the hon. member from Stadacona, which was sustained in chorus by some others, and, after the sitting had closed, some hon. gentlemen were speaking about my relations to a church. I am a Catholic, and I understand the doctrines of the Catholic Church. I am not in favour of granting divorce, and I am in accord with the church and its doctrines on this subject. Ever since I have been in the Senate, I have decided, on reflection, that it was the duty of every Catholic in the Senate to be neutral in these cases ; that inasmuch as a Roman Catholic cannot give an impartial vote, by reason of his conscience and the doctrines of his church interfering with the exercise of his judgment, that he should abstain from voting. I have steadily pursued that course ; I have never read a line of the divorce cases, nor of the case which came up yesterday until a few hours ago when I looked at one page of it. I have never been present at a sitting of the committee ; so that I have tried to carry out the rule of conduct which I have laid down for myself. I consider this divorce tribunal is one of the bulwarks of the morality of this country, and that it would be a grave and serious matter if it were abolished. People say there should be a divorce court. Well that would only multiply the evil, tenfold. It would be a temptation to people who do not think of such a course now to apply to the courts if they were at hand. They talk about poor people, and say that they cannot procure a divorce, that it is a relief only for the rich. I do not believe in that complaint. Divorce is a luxury, in a sense and luxuries are only for the rich, and it is for the good of the people that they cannot obtain it. It only increases their morality and their chances of heaven if they have not an opportunity to go to a divorce court. Holding these opinions, I voted yesterday, not in favour of divorce. I draw the line as definitely as I can. If I voted in the same way as the hon. gentleman from Stadacona, and some other Catholics here did, against the report of the committee, I would be doing what I would consider wrong, and my conscience would reproach me, because I would be doing an act which would be one of the means of destroying or helping to destroy a tribunal which I say is one of the best possible safeguards of the morality of the people. Therefore, I voted to sustain this committee on that ground. I did not vote for or against divorce ; I ignored the question altogether, but I voted to sustain the committee, because I believe they have done the best that could possibly be done under the circumstances. Apart from that altogether, I do not want to do anything that would in the slightest degree tend to destroy the Committee on Divorce. The gentlemen who compose that committee have a laborious and disagreeable duty to perform, and I have always expressed myself that they ought to get a special remuneration for the large amount of time and thought, and the disagreeable, I may say unclean, duties which they have to perform. These are my sentiments, and I take this occasion to state them, because wrong was attributed to me, and I thank the House heartily for this opportunity given me to set myself right.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—As my name has been mentioned in the explanation given by the hon. gentleman, I wish to say a few words to accept the explanation of my hon. friend. If this were a matter of science or reason we might discuss it, but since it is a matter of conscience with the hon. gentleman I cannot interfere. It is a matter of conscience with me also, and he must allow those of us who differ from him to hold another view. It is a question of principle for us, that principle being by any means to defeat divorce. I never thought the best way to defeat it was to vote for it. It is a strange way to prevent divorce.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—I rise to a question of privilege. I want to call the attention of this House to an article which has been published in the Galt 'Daily Reporter', and reproduced in the Montreal 'Gazette', It is proper to refer to such accusations before the House, in order that other papers may not do equal injustice. After reproducing part of an article in the 'Globe', the Galt 'Reporter' says :

It is not unfair to say that Quebec is almost entirely out of sympathy with the progressive, self-reliant and well-informed parts of the country. That province has few men who have any conception of the duties appertaining to honest and purposeful municipal life. Its representatives in parliament are mostly the tools of corporations. They read corporation organs. They represent constituencies with a deadened sense of public responsibility. They live in an atmosphere of graft and they kowtow to the rich men who control franchises. It will not be admitted for one moment that our municipal interests, any part of them, are safe in their hands. The doctrine of provincial rights was never more in need of an emphatic declaration in Ontario than at the present time.

I am not called upon to defend the representatives of the province of Quebec in the House of Commons, but as regards the action taken by the senators from Quebec in connection with municipal and provincial rights, I think I have a right to say that this article is unfair, unjust and untrue. I appeal to hon. gentlemen to say whether those accusations are justified by the record of the proceedings of this House. I have even a right to go further and to say that if our rules have been modified to protect municipal and provincial rights, it is due in great part to the efforts of the representatives of Quebec, and, especially, the hon. gentleman from De Salaberry. I will add only one further remark, and it is, that such articles do not tend to promote good-will, peace and harmony between the different nationalities of this country.

INSPECTION OF ELECTRICITY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (P) An Act respecting the inspection of Electricity.

He said: We have already an Act on our statute-book authorizing the inspection of electricity. Some changes are required to be made in the Act, and it was thought better, instead of amending it, to embrace what was law and what is intended to continue as law, in one measure, allowing the amendments to come in that way rather than having a short Bill with the amendments only. The object of the Bill is to enable the Department of Inland Revenue to appoint inspectors wherever elctricity is used. Heretofore the inspection of electricity has been limited to light, but electricity is now so much used for power that it is thought proper to extend the inspection to power also. I shall be happy, when the House is in committee on the Bill, to point out the changes in the law. It makes no changes in the mode of inspecting meters, nor in the units nor in a variety of details; the only important particular is in the extension of the Act to meters for power.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved that the Bill be referred to a committee of the whole House on Tuesday next.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—May I ask my hon. friend to obtain information why this inspection should not extend to the wires used in the transmission of electricity. It deals with almost every phase of equipment except the most dangerous one, that is, the covering and insulation of wires. The government should give a little more consideration to the character of the inspection. It should be much more comprehensive than this Bill provides for.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am advised by an hon. senator that that portion is rather under the inspection of the insurance companies. They have an inspector also; because they require not only the wires and meters, but the connections between the instruments outside and those inside to be verified.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I can say to my hon. friend that is not the case. In some of the provinces it may be so, but it certainly is not obligatory on the insurance companies, nor would it be on the part of consumers to permit insurance companies to make any inspection of the wires. In perusing this Bill, it impressed me very deeply that it is lacking in not making provision for comprehensive inspection so as to insure protection of life and property. It simply deals with the minor factors which go to make up electrical equipment, and neglects the major one.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Feeling that questions would arise in the discussion of the measure, I asked the inspector in charge of the Bill to be present when we reach the committee stage, in order to give explanations asked for by hon. gentlemen. He will be here on Tuesday to give explanations.

The motion was agreed to.

COLD STORAGE WAREHOUSES BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committe of the Whole on Bill (20) An Act to encourage the establishment of Cold Storage Warehouses, for the preservation of Perishable Food Products.

(In the Committee.)

On clause 2,

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Can my hon. friend say to what extent there is an absence of facilities for warehousing products of the kind in contemplation ? I understand the building of cold storage warehouses has become fairly general, and that it is being made an advantageous investment throughout the provinces. I may be wrong in that conclusion.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman is quite right. For instance, in Ottawa they have one, and in Toronto, Montreal, Hamilton and Galt I think, and some of the larger towns, but a demand has been made in the villages, in productive districts where apples, grapes and fruits of various kinds are produced, and where the storage for the cheese factories is limited to the quantity passing through. There is a general demand for them in such places. Of course it is only where proof is given that they are wanted, and that there is no private enterprise equal to the construction of the building, that the department will feel justified in extending aid and assistance.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Who is to be the judge ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The department.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Is it intended the provisions of the Act should be extended to those larger warehouses in the centres of distribution ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, no. Wherever they exist, none will be aided as rivals.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It seems to me that it will not be a difficult matter to bring the necessary influence to bear on the government in regard to the large distributing centres. It will be difficult to say that there is good reason for subsidizing a warehouse in a rural locality, and not in an urban district. There seems to be no principle laid down upon which the Governor-in-Council is to act with reference to the distribution of the subsidy.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Clause 2 reads :

2. The Governor in Council may enter into contracts with any persons for the construction, equipment and maintenance in good and efficient working order, of public cold storage warehouses equipped with mechanical refrigeration, in Canada, and suitable for the preservation of all food products.

They will not aid any new warehouse where one already exists.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Will the government aid the ones that exist ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, no, certainly not. They are there, and probably have gone through the experimental stage, and are now looked upon as paying concerns. I think there were a great many of them under serious difficulties for two or three years, until they became established on a permanent basis. I have in my eye some that were embarrassed for a limited period, but are now doing better.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The hon. gentleman will recognize the inequality of giving the 30 per cent to a rival institution and withholding the subsidy from one that is doing fairly well at the present time. It seems to me that it will necessarily give rise to dissatisfaction, and it must necessarily be of advantage to the rival just starting. There should be some well defined principle running through the Bill by which no injustice would be done to existing enterprises.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have already said there can be no rivals. There will be no competing building put up where there is already a cold storage in existence or in the locality. That is perfectly clear.

Hon. Mr LOUGHEED—It is not clear in the Bill.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is only where there is no enterprise, or where there is not capital enough to put up a building, where it is shown conclusively that a building is needed. The farmers are slow in taking stock in a building of that sort. They think aid should come from outside. It is regarded that cold storage, as a business, cannot be made a success for two or three years, and that is the reason there are not more such enterprises in the country. Of course, in the large centres there is always capital, and men with means will take the risk and put them up. In those places were they exist, there is nothing to be aided by the government.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Where is the limitation to prevent them from giving aid ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In the announcement of the government policy, it is to aid cold storage warehouses for the preservation of perishable products. If there are warehouses in existence they will not be aided. It applies entirely to warehouses in prospective. There is no building already completed that will receive any aid under this Bill.

Clause 4 provides :

4. The Governor in Council may, out of any moneys appropriated by parliament for the purpose, grant towards the construction and equipment of any such warehouse a subsidy not exceeding in the whole thirty per cent of the amount expended or approved of in such construction and equipment, and payable in instalments as follows : upon the warehouse being completed and cold storage at suitable temperatures being provided therein, all to the satisfaction of the Minister of Agriculture, a sum not exceeding fifteen per cent of the amount so expended ; and at the end of the first year thereafter seven per cent of the said amount, at the end of the second year thereafter four per cent of the said amount, and at the end of each of the two next succeeding years two per cent of the said amount; provided the warehouse is maintained and operated to the satisfaction of the Minister of Agriculture.

That is all prospective. It does not apply to the past at all. They have to file a plan and obtain the sanction of the department before they erect a building, and it has all to be done under inspection.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—My hon. friend has not met the question. There is nothing in this Bill to prevent the government from subsidizing a cold storage building being erected in Montreal or the city of Ottawa. The hon. gentleman says it is a question of policy. That may be, but if there are certain influences brought to bear on the government, and the government feel inclined to grant that subsidy for the erection of a building in Toronto or Ottawa, there is nothing in this Bill to prevent it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What I take exception to is the arbitrary principle laid down by my hon. friend. I doubt very much when the Bill is brought into operation that that arbitrary principle will be observed. My hon. friend says if a warehouse is in existence it will receive no subsidy. Let me point out the manifest injustice. A warehouse is just completed before the Bill is brought into operation. The financial results of the operation may not be known. Possibly in an adjoining street, or in an adjoining town, a similar warehouse is about to be erected. The Act comes into operation regarding that new warehouse, and the government gives them a subsidy payable in instalments of not less than 50 per cent, a substantial percentage.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is 30 per cent in all.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Well payable in instalments. Thirty per cent upon the entire cost on such an undertaking is certainly of such manifest advantage to the rival concern it may be quite possible that a gratuity of that amount would succeed in destroying the other. The government should exercise some fair discretion in the distribution of the subsidy, and therefore I say that to lay down an arbitrary principle such as my hon. friend has just stated is manifestly unfair to rival concerns.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In all matters of this kind, you have to trust the government to do what they start out to do. You cannot limit it in the Act itself. One of the clauses which shows the beneficial results is clause 7 which reads as follows :

7. The rates and tolls to be charged for storage in such warehouses shall be subject to the approval of the Governor in Council.

They have no such control over houses that have already been built, and the cold storage warehouses now in existence have been entered upon as an investment. It may turn out to their advantage. No doubt it will, to parties who should invest their money in them.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Supposing it should not ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The tendency to place perishable goods in cold storage has been increasing by leaps and bounds. Cold storage accommodation where perhaps one-tenth of the space only was occupied five years ago is to-day crowded. I was in the Ottawa warehouse two or three years ago.

It was comparatively empty. I went in perhaps a month ago, and it was absolutely filled, every room occupied in all directions. The company are now going to build an addition to it. That is the experience everywhere. It takes some time for the people to appreciate the value of it, and the object of this Bill is to stimulate the growth of cold storages in those localities where they do not now exist, and where there is no chance of capital being induced to invest, because the investment will not be remunerative for two or three years. The people have begun to appreciate the advantages of cold storage warehouses.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 6,

6. The Minister of Agriculture may order, and cause to be maintained, an inspection and supervision of the sanitary conditions, maintenance and operation of such warehouses, and may regulate and control the temperatures to be maintained therein in accordance with the regulations to be made as hereinafter provided.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—How is he going to regulate the temperature ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is not done by ice. It is mechanical cold storage. They regulate it automatically.

Hon. Mr SULLIVAN—How could the minister control the temperature and regulate it ?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It is done very easily by thermograph. The record would be there.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 9,

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In regard to clause 9 of the old Act, I have some information to give to the House. The Act passed in 1897 has been exhausted long since. For the information of the House, I desire to say that the bonus was for three years and was paid only to Quebec and Charlottetown. No other city claimed that bonus. The bonus was paid to a large number of steamships for a number of years. This resulted in the establishment of practically universal cold storage on most of the Canadian routes. The bonus was not continued after the service was once established. I think in the subsidies made to the various steamers crossing the Atlantic, consideration is always given to the extent of the cold storage. It is simply an element in any aid that may be given. That is the condition of it.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The hon. gentleman is no doubt absolutely correct in the statement that he has made. The contracts with steamship companies made some years ago expired, and I know the claim of the department is that the work having been set in motion it could be left to take care of itself. The interest both of the owners of the steamships and of their customers was so great that they might be left to take care of themselves. I had a conversation to-day with a gentleman from Ontario, a very large exporter of fruit with regard to this subject. There is this weakness in the practice as it stands to-day : that with regard to the ventilation of steamships and the cold storage that is alleged to be provided, there is no means of holding the steamships up to their professions, or their contracts with their customers. Thermographs should be maintained on board of all boats carrying perishable products, automatically working, so that the inspectors at London or Liverpool would have access to these instruments and find what temperature had been maintained in the chambers of these ships during the passage across the Atlantic. If that were done, there would be a perfect means of compelling the owners of these steamships to live up to the contracts which they are making with those who trust their perishable products to their care during the voyage. Take a shipper who is sending over a few thousand barrels of apples, for instance ; he entrusts these apples to the steamship company, who allege that they will maintain a certain temperature in the storage chamber during the voyage. He finds his fruit is damaged through excessively high temperature during the voyage. He knows that as a fact but he has no means of proving it. It would be a simple matter for the government to provide that all ships carrying perishable products should not only supply proper ventilation, but that they should be prepared to submit evidence that they had lived up to their contracts. I am told by large shippers that there is still room for improvement. No doubt, a great improvement has taken place, especially, I think, in Halifax, where the Furness line, the Canadian Pacific Railway line of steamers, and the Allan line, have made improvements by the erection of mid-ship decks, so that there will not be a large quantity of apples stored on top of one another. A great improvement has been effected; still instances occur where these perishable products are destroyed during the voyage, and there is no way of proving how it happened. If thermographs had been maintained in the chambers of these ships carrying these products, working automatically, they would tell the story, and the government inspector at London or Liverpool could have reference to them, and he would not require to listen to any story from the crew of the ship, because he would have a record independently of that.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I may say to my hon. friend that that matter is under the consideration of the Department of Agriculture at this present minute. Certain powers are reserved in several of the subsidies to the companies which would enable the department to enforce some such regulation as my hon. friend desires. I might add that the evidence in the possession of the Department of Agriculture, particularly in the matter of apples, goes rather to show that the great bulk—I do not say all—of the cases in which injury was done to the fruit arose from the apples being delivered to the steamship companies unduly heated. My hon. friend will note that when the apples have been allowed to become unduly heated, the mischief is done to a very great extent, and this Bill we are now considering is for the express purpose of enabling the fruit, from the moment it comes into the storehouse, until it is shipped, to be kept in a proper temperature and delivered in good condition; but the point is deserving of serious consideration, whether some such apparatus as he speaks of should not be introduced in, at any rate, the case of subsidized steamers.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The usual plea of the ship-owners is just what has been stated by my hon. friend, that the trouble does not occur with them, but previous to the shipment. Now, we know with regard to fruit, there is only a month, or perhaps a little more than a month of the year when there is any danger of overheating on the cars.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I am not speaking of the case of cars.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The bulk of the apples going forward in the autumn and winter are put on board the steamer cool, nevertheless you will find the steamship agents almost always contend that the fault was not theirs. It is the most natural thing in the world for them to do so, and that is why there should be means taken to know where the blame rests.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I shall take very good care to bring the matter to the attention of the Department of Agriculture.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Can my hon. friend say why a partial system of inspection is being adopted? Why is it not extended to other warehouses? The inspection provided for in clauses 6, 8 and 9 extends only to subsidized warehouses. It seems to me that the absence of uniformity would not be conducive to helping the export interest of Canada.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We have not aided the commercial ventures in any way, and it would be monstrous for the government to interfere with them.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The government has been very active in passing inspection measures with reference to all classes of export goods. It is clearly within the right of the federal government to pass the most comprehensive inspection measures. The very exercise of the powers mentioned here, would probably be in pursuance of that power which has been given them; but it seems to me while dealing with the subject of inspection it should have been carried out in a very much more comprehensive manner than is here indicated. In fact it should be extended to all warehouses handling produce for export.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Our apples, cheese, butter and so forth, are all inspected by officials before they are exported, but it would be manifestly unjust to introduce in a measure which deals with subsidized warehouses, a provision for imposing conditions on commercial ventures which must stand according to the credit they deserve in the community. They are quite independent of the government. We have not aided them in any way, and we would scarcely be justified in putting them under the same regulations as subsidized warehouses.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Could you not set the machinery of the general Act in operation ?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I was going to suggest that I think there is power under the general inspection Act. Of course the hon. gentleman will see that in a special Act of this kind it would not be desirable to introduce a general provision. If there is not sufficient power, it had better be supplied in an amendment to the general Act.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—Seeing that this measure is to go back to the Department of Agriculture, the suggestion made by my hon. friend from Marshfield might be considered. Many of the conditions which he has pointed out might be averted if all perishable goods shipped from warehouses, whether subsidized or not subsidized, were inspected by a qualified officer at the point of exportation. It would prevent a conflict between the steamship and railway companies.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (56) An Act to incorporate the Quinze and Blanche River Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. McMullen.)

Bill (25) An Act respecting the Qu'Appelle, Long Lake and Saskatchewan Railroad and Steamboat Company.—(Hon. Mr. Ross, Moosejaw.)

THIRD READING.

Bill (85) An Act to amend the Criminal Code.—(Hon. Mr. Scott.)

TELEGRAPHIC COMMUNICATION WITH PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Before the House adjourns, I wish to ask the hon. Secretary of State if he can inform us whether telegraphic communication with Prince Edward Island has been restored ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have had no answer to the communication I sent to the department, and I have been unable to see the minister. He was not in council to-day. I shall make further inquiry.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I wish to enter a very solemn protest against this treatment. Since the 5th of January, telegraphic communication with Prince Edward Island has been interrupted, and it would seem that the government will not incur the expense of sending a telegram to find what is the real state of affairs. Two days ago I sent a telegram at my own expense and got a reply which I placed in the hands of the hon. Secretary of State, and he referred it to the Department of Marine and Fisheries. Yesterday I told him I would not say anything that day, and I thought he would be in possession of information on the subject to-day. It would appear that the department is so indifferent that they do not think it worth while, or do not want to incur the expense of sending a telegram to Pictou to find out whether telegraphic communication with the island has been restored.

Hon. Mr. LOVITT—Hon. Mr. Yeo had a telegram from the island to-day.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That does not prove that the line is established. We know that since the 12th of this month casual messages are put through by catching the steamer in the port of Georgetown, and the telegram received to-day may have been obtained in that way. It may be the line is established, but if so the government ought to know it. If we had the information that this message came through the Marconi tower at Pictou instead of being brought by steamers, we would know that it was not a mere chance, but that we had regular telegraphic communication restored.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday next at Eight o'clock p.m.

THE SENATE.

OTTAWA, Tuesday, February 26, 1907.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Eight o'clock p.m.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

GRAND TRUNK RAIWAY, OTTAWA, TERMINAL BILL.

PETITION PRESENTED.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—It has been pretty well known for some time past that the Grand Trunk Railway has been trying to make arrangements for the construction of a station and hotel at Ottawa. It has only been very recently that negotiations have proceeded sufficiently far to enable the company to ask for legislation which they desire with regard to that construction, and it is the wish of the company to obtain a special charter dealing with these terminals, for various reasons. One reason is that the bonds, &c., can be more easily dealt with than would be the case were the railway dealing with them otherwise. The time has expired for presenting petitions to the Senate, but, with the consent of the House, I would like to be permitted to present this petition after the explanation that I have made. There may be apprehension on the part of some hon. gentlemen that this is for a general Bill enabling the company to deal with terminals in various portions of Canada, but I can state authoritatively that there is no such desire on their part, and that the Bill which will be introduced will be one solely and wholly for the purpose of these terminals at Ottawa.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the petition is presented, I would draw the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that in such cases a petition is presented to obtain leave to present a petition.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—I quite admit that.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—And not the petition for the Bill itself. I take the word of the hon. gentleman when he says this petition is merely to obtain permission for the company to construct work in Ottawa. If that be the case, I think there would be no objection at all, but I should not like to have a company incorporated for general purposes to construct terminals at Ottawa, Quebec or Halifax or elsewhere. If it is confined simply to Ottawa, the people of Ottawa only are the ones to object.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—I may say in reply to my hon friend, that that is absolutely the case; this Bill will apply only to the construction of terminals at Ottawa, and I am quite aware that it will be necessary to present a petition asking for leave to present a petition. But, in order to facilitate matters, and proceed with the Bill, if there is no objection, I move the suspension of the subsection (a), of rule 24, and the suspension of rule 112. If these rules are allowed to be suspended, I shall then present the petition.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I suppose the suspension of those rules is to enable the hon. gentleman to present his petition immediately ?

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If there is urgency, I do not think we would have any objection to suspend the rules. If there is no urgency I do not see why we should adopt this course.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—If there is any objection whatever I cannot present the petition.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The urgency is that the Bill originates in the Senate and it is too late in the session to proceed without a suspension of the rules.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That may be a reason, but not a reason for urgency.

The motion was agreed to.

FRONTAGES ON CHURCHILL HARBOUR.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr FERGUSON inquired :

1. Has any survey been made by the government, of lands fronting on the harbour of Churchill, in the Territories of Keewatin ?
2. Is the government aware that the Hudson Bay Company lays claim to most of the land fronting on the western side of the harbour of Churchill ? If so, has any step been taken to delimitate the boundaries of such land?
3. Has any application been made to the government for a grant of any portion of the land fronting on the eastern side of said harbour ?

4. If so, by whom has the application been made, and what quantity of land, and what frontage on the harbour, have been applied for ?

5. Has any grant been made of said lands or frontage ?

6. If so, what are the conditions of the grants ?

7. What is the policy of the government in respect to lands at or near Churchill harbour ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The answers furnished to me are :

1. No survey has been made by the government of lands fronting on the harbour of Churchill.

2. The government is not aware that the Hudson Bay Company lays claim to most of the land fronting on the western side of the harbour of Churchill, but the Hudson Bay Company has applied for two parcels of land on the western side of the harbour of Churchill, with frontages of 1,700 and 1,200 feet respectively. The boundaries of the said parcels have been delimitated by a surveyor employed by the company.

3. Yes.

4. By the Canadian Northern Railway Company, 4,700 acres, about 5 miles frontage ; A. J. Norquay, about 2,500 acres, about 4 miles frontage, and by the Hudson Bay Company 7 62 acres, about 1,300 feet frontage.

5. No.

6. Answered by answer to fifth question.

7. In so far as the Hudson Bay Company is concerned, the government is bound by the terms of the deed of surrender from the company to the Crown to convey to the company a block of land containing ten acres, in the shape approximately of a parallelogram, of which the frontage shall not be more than half the depth.

No policy has yet been framed respecting the disposal of other land or water frontage at Churchill.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Can my hon. friend say whether the application of the Hudson Bay Company deals with the particular land which, under the terms of the Act, they would be entitled to—that is the land surrounding their post ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I presume, from the way it is referred to, that it would be part of the original arrangement, because it describes an area, the depth being so much and the frontage so much.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Can the Hudson Bay Company lay claim to more than one post at Churchill, or can they claim several posts so as to acquire a large frontage on the harbour ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—My recollection is, the area is defined and the limitation defined. Of course, it would depend upon what they are occupying. Some places they get larger blocks, some places smaller. I have not read the arrangement for a long time, and I cannot tell from memory.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think they are entitled to only ten acres at one post.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, no, they are entitled to larger areas at some posts than at others. They are defined.

SENATOR GOWAN.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the orders of the day are called, could we know from the government if there is any truth in the statement that one of our colleagues, the Hon. Sir James Gowan, has tendered his resignation and that it has been accepted?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, he has tendered his resignation and it has been accepted.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (EE) An Act to incorporate the Winnipeg and Northwestern Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Ross, Middlesex.)

Bill (FF) An Act respecting the Algoma Central and Hudson Bay Railway Company. —(Hon. Mr. Ross, Middlesex.)

Bill (GG) An Act respecting the St. Mary Bridge Company.—(Hon. Mr. Ross, Middlesex.)

Bill (HH) An Act respecting the Lake Superior Power Company.—(Hon. Mr. Ross, Middlesex.)

Bill (II) An Act respecting the Manitoulin and North Shore Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Ross, Middlesex.)

Bill (JJ) An Act respecting the Ontario, Hudson Bay and Western Railways Company.—(Hon. Mr. Ross, Middlesex.)

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (86) An Act respecting the National Transcontinental Railway. — (Hon. Mr. Scott.)

Bill (20) An Act to encourage the establishment of Cold Storage Warehouses for the preservation of perishable Food Products.—(Hon. Mr. Scott.)

JORDAN LIGHT, HEAT AND POWER COMPANY BILL.

THIRD READING POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being called :

Third reading Bill (N) An Act to amalgamate the Jordan Light, Heat and Power Company and the Erie and Ontario Development Company, Limited, into one corporation under the name of the Jordan-Erie Power Company.—(Hon. Mr. Casgrain, de Lanaudière.)

Hon. Mr. POWER—In the absence of the hon. gentleman from Lincoln (Hon. Mr. Gibson) I move that the said Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be further amended by adding the following words to section 7 as amended, 'to an amount not exceeding $8,000,000 being $1,000,000 less than the combined authorized issue of the two amalgamated companies'. The amendment of which the hon. gentleman from Lincoln gave notice was to increase the amount to ten million, and this amendment that I present to the House will provide for a less amount, namely, $8,000,000. With the permission of the House I move this amendment instead of the amendment of which notice has been given. It is substantially the same amendment, only the amount of bonds and debentures is to be two million dollars less.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Is that a motion made in the name of the hon. gentleman from Lincoln ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is, yes.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think we should have that as a notice of motion.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is the same motion substantially except——

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Except it is not the same.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Except the amount has been reduced by $2,000,000, and the House would not object to that change, I think.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I do not know—a change of $2,000,000 in a private Bill. The rules of the House require a day's notice, expressly for those cases. Where a change of importance is made in a Bill at its third reading, and we are asked to change $8,000,000 into $6,000,000.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, it is a reduction from $10,000,000 to $8,000,000. The House surely can have no objection to a reduction of the capital.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I do not say anything about that. That is not the question at all. The House may have objection to permitting that amendment to pass immediately, because no notice has been given of it, and that change has been made by a party who is not the promoter of the Bill and who gives that notice.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I may say on behalf of the promoter of the Bill, that I have been instructed to accept the amendment, and that the amendment reduces the amount and brings it in accord with what is stated in the Bill to be the fact. The capital stock of the company should be $8,000,000, being the present capital of the two companies, so it would really be in accord with that.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The point raised is not whether this amendment is a right and proper one to pass, but is it according to the rules of the House to adopt it?

The SPEAKER—The hon. gentleman who moved this amendment, did so with the consent of the House. If any objection is taken, the amendment of course can only be made according to notice.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I object to a member rising to move an amendment by simply saying, 'With the leave of the House'. If he wants a suspension of the rules, let him name the rule he desires to suspend.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think we should proceed according to the rules of the House when we can do so without inconveniencing any one. The hon. gentleman might move the amendment of which notice was given by the hon. gentleman from Lincoln, and it would be perfectly in order. We might act accordingly.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There are a great many awful things which might happen, and I sympathize with the nervous condition of my hon. friends opposite, when they become afraid that this House is going to allow something very improper to be done at this stage. The fact is, here is a Bill of which notice of the third reading had been given some days ago, and notice had been given that it was proposed to move an amendment which would fix the amount at $10,000,000, and then the promoter of the Bill was willing to accept a less amount, and it was suggested that the House might be willing, with the concurrence of the promoters, to do that. Then a number of hon. gentlemen suddenly discover the most fearful danger of wrong and mischief being perpetrated in this House. With the consent of the hon. gentleman who moved the third reading, I would ask that the notice which I have given be considered as a notice of motion for to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—There is not an hon. gentleman in the House who sticks so fast upon little technicalities as the hon. gentleman himself.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman never sticks himself.

The SPEAKER—The motion and amendment will be allowed to stand as a notice of motion.

The Order of the Day was allowed to stand.

GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into :

Committee of the Whole House on Bill (50) An Act to amend an Act to confirm an agreement entered into by Her late Majesty with the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada for the purpose of securing the extension of the Intercolonial Railway system to the city of Montreal.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Will the hon. Secretary of State be good enough to give the House some explanation of this Bill. I would submit that the preamble is quite misleading. It would lead one to the conclusion that a clerical error had occurred in the schedule of the Act of 1899, whereas it is quite apparent, under clause 1 of the Act, that very material alterations are being made to the schedule or to the agreement between the government of Canada and the Grand Trunk Railway Company.

Hon. Mr. POWER.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is no change. It is purely correcting typographical or clerical errors, I do not know which.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It seems to me to be an extraordinary statement to make, that all those mistakes would be simply typographical errors. It is quite apparent, from the perusal of the clauses, that what is now proposed to be introduced into the schedule will make a very substantial difference. They are not typographical errors ; that is quite manifest.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If there is any question about it, I had better let it stand until I can bring the original out of the office.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I am not doubting the good faith of the government, or of the Grand Trunk Railway, but, it seems to me, some explanation is due to the House why those material changes should be made. Has my hon. friend the original agreement, or can he explain how this Act passed parliament receiving three readings in both branches, without such a very serious mistake having been discovered ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No ; my hon. friend must know that those schedules are never read by anybody. They are copied in the office at Montreal or somewhere else, and no one ever looks at them afterwards. It is the result of carelessness in making the first copy.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—They must have been very carefully perused by the company's solicitors before being brought here, and, certainly, officers of this government would be very much at fault if they permitted a schedule embodying such a very important undertaking as that dealt with in the agreement to become law without thoroughly scrutinizing it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have not time now to analyse the Bill, and it is difficult to detect just what the changes are. I therefore move that the committee rise and report progress.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Would my hon. friend, before we go into committee again, bring down to the Chamber information as to what legal proceedings have been taken? From the second clause of the Bill, one would think legal proceedings had arisen between the government and the Grand Trunk Railway Company, possibly arising out of this agreement. The clauses are not sufficiently explicit to show how those legal proceedings have originated, and it is important that we should understand what we are doing.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, I quite appreciate the importance of it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—At the last session of this House, a Bill was introduced to enable the government to refer to arbitration some differences which had arisen in reference to the interpretation and true meaning of the agreement into which they had entered. Should we not have the agreement before us, and also the result of the arbitration, if an arbitration took place as provided for in the Bill of last session? The House will remember the long discussion which took place when the agreement was originally entered into, and that after some concessions were made by the representatives of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, the Bill was accepted by this House. It was when Sir Oliver Mowat was leading the House the agreement was entered into. How far will these amendments affect that agreement which the House accepted and the concessions made by the Grand Trunk Railway Company and accepted by the government of the day? That will require a good deal of consideration, a good deal of comparison with the agreement itself, and, also, a full explanation on the part of the government as to the reasons why these amendments are suggested.

The CHAIRMAN—I think the only motion before the chair is that the committee rise and report progress.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We have a right to discuss the Bill on that motion if we please.

The CHAIRMAN—The only question that can be discussed is whether the committee should rise and report progress.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I beg to call the attention of the House to another matter which seems to be just as important, and that is in clause 1——

The CHAIRMAN—The hon. gentleman is certainly out of order. Until this motion is decided, I object to the hon. gentleman proceeding.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I only want to call attention to something which is either a misprint or——

The CHAIRMAN—The motion is that the committee rise and report progress.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. WILSON, from the committee, reported that they had made some progress with the Bill, and asked leave to sit again on Friday next.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

ORDER POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being called:

Committee of the Whole House on Bill (76), An Act to amend the Northwest Territories Act.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT, in the absence of hon. Sir Richard Cartwright, moved that the Order of the Day be discharged and that it be fixed as an order for to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I notice in the newspapers, some communications from the Yukon Territory to the effect that public meetings have been held there, demanding that full representation be given to the people of that territory and that the antiquated system of a nominated government be abolished. I would ask my hon. friend to obtain information whether such representations have been made, and whether a request has been forwarded to the government to extend full representation to the people of the Yukon Territory.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I shall inquire about it.

The motion was agreed to.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (X) An Act to incorporate the Reliance Life Assurance Company of Canada.—(Hon. Mr. Perley.)

Bill (Y) An Act respecting the Midway and Vernon Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Bostock.)

Bill (AA) An Act to incorporate the Ottawa Life Insurance Company.—(Hon. Mr. Kerr.)

Bill (BB) An Act respecting the British America Assurance Company.—(Hon. Mr. Jaffray.)

THE SPAIN DIVORCE CASE.

SECOND READINGS.

Hon. Mr. WATSON moved the second reading of Bill (CC) An Act for the relief of Osprey George Valentine Spain.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—I intended to make some remarks on the motion for the second reading of this Bill, but as a desire has been expressed to take up another matter to-night for discussion, I shall defer making any remarks on this Bill until the third reading.

The motion was agreed to on a division.

THE NAVIGATION OF HUDSON BAY.

Debate continued.

The Order of the Day being called :

Resuming the further adjourned debate on the motion of the Hon. Mr. Ferguson :

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General ; praying that His Excellency may be pleased to lay on the table of this House, copies of all reports and communications in possession of the government not already submitted to parliament, regarding the navigation of the Hudson's bay and the resources and climate of the territory contiguous thereto, also copies of all grants of fishing, mining and lumbering rights, given at any time, by the government, in the said bay and territory ; also copies of all reports of surveys received by the government from either engineers, surveyors or geologists, on the feasibility of railway routes, connecting any existing or prospective railway with any port on Hudson bay or James bay ; also a statement of grants of land or money which have been proposed, or asked for, in aid of such railways. Also, copies of all reports received by the government in relation to the establishment of lights or other aids to navigation of Hudson bay and Hudson straits, and also a statement showing what action, if any, has been taken by the government regarding the establishment of such aids to navigation.—(Hon. Mr. Davis.)

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I do not know, since the announcement has been made by the premier with reference to this question, that it is necessary for me or any body else to say much on the subject. However, as it has been debated here and in the House of Commons, and certain statements have been made by members of the Senate as to the advisability of building a railway to Hudson bay, and doubts have been thrown on the practicability of the project it will not be out of place for me to make a few remarks on the question, seeing that I come from a part of the country that would be greatly benefited by the opening up of this route. I claim that it is a great national undertaking, and I wish to discuss it from a national standpoint, not from a sectional point of view, because I am bound to say we have too much sectional spirit in this country at present. There is a feeling in our part of the country that certain portions of this Dominion are opposed to the construction of this road, for the reason that, perhaps, it might divert trade which now goes through the older provinces into another channel. I want to impress on hon. gentlemen the fact that, as time goes on, they will find not only all the routes we have at present, but the Hudson bay route when built, as built it will be, will have all they can do. I claim that the opening up of the Hudson bay route, by the building of this road, will be a national advantage. Instead of taking away trade from the older provinces, it will increase their trade. If this route were opened up and we had steamboats plying between Nova Scotia and Hudson bay, it would furnish facilities for transporting heavy materials and would build up a great trade, because everybody knows that transportation by water is very cheap as compared with transportation by rail and I see no reason why a large trade could not be worked up in that way. I want to refer to a fact alluded to by the hon. gentleman from Marshfield, with reference to a land grant given to a certain company for the purpose of constructing that road some years ago. I do not wish to speak of it in a political sense, because I should like to discuss it on its merits, but I consider that a great blunder was made by the government of the day at the time the contract was entered into with the predecessors of Mackenzie & Mann for the building of that road to Hudson bay. They gave an enormous subsidy of 12,800 acres of land per mile from the boundary of Manitoba to be selected out of the arable belt as far as the Saskatchewan river, and 12,800 acres of land per mile for the portion of the line extending from the Saskatchewan to Churchill. That was the bargain for the construction of the complete line, and the railway company had no right to be allowed to construct half that road through the part of the country they knew would pay at once and draw a land grant of 12,800 acres per mile. They should have been obliged to construct the whole of the road ; but it appears that in drawing the contract or making the bargain, the government of the day at that time left a loop hole open, and what do we find ? We find Mackenzie & Mann building the road to the Pas on the Saskatchewan, where it will pay, without doubt, and they have drawn their land grant from the boundary of Manitoba at the rate of 12,800 acres per mile, and in the province of Manitoba 6,400 acres per mile. It reminds me of the story of Mr. Dooley and Hennessy in reference to the war with Spain. Hennessy asked Dooley what he would do with the fruits of victory, if he were president, and Dooley replied : 'I would eat the ripe fruit and hand the green fruit back to the enemy.' That is what Mackenzie and Mann have done in this case : they have taken the ripe fruit and handed the green fruit back to the government. They have taken that 12,800 acres per mile as far as the Saskatchewan river and dropped the line there. I wish to say to the hon. member from Marshfield, that while I do not want to speak of this in a political sense, it was stupidity on the part of those who drew that contract or made the bargain that they did not draft it in such a way that whoever came to build that road, before getting the enormous land subsidy, should have been required to construct it the whole way through to Hudson bay.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—What contract is the hon. gentleman speaking about ? I have asked for these papers, and papers have been brought down, but I cannot find any contract of the kind he refers to.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—If the hon. gentleman's friends, at the time they entered into the bargain to hand over that enormous land subsidy to Mackenzie and Mann, did not enter into a contract it is very strange.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—There was no contract; simply a statutory offer that so much land should be given in the province of Manitoba and so much outside of Manitoba, but I cannot find a contract of any kind. It was an offer of not more than so much land per mile, and it was open to the government to make the grant as much or as little as they pleased within that limit, but they could not go above it.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I will leave the point at that. Now with reference to the opening up of the route. I claim if a line of properly constructed steamers is put on the Hudson bay route, as I hope in the near future will be done, it will be of great benefit to the trade of the older provinces. We raise wheat and cattle and make money in the west, but most of that money finds its way into the coffers of the people of the eastern provinces. We manufacture scarcely anything in the western provinces, but import from the older provinces as far as they can supply us. It is true, we purchase some agricultural machinery from the United States, but we would not do so if the manufacturers in the eastern provinces could supply us. Since they cannot do so we have to go across the line. What I want to emphasize is the fact that the greater portion of the money we receive for our products finds its way to the eastern provinces to build up great industries and cities and employ great numbers of men ; building up your banking institutions because every bank in the west is simply a branch of some eastern bank. Now let us deal for a moment with what we in the west consider the opening up of this route will do for us. I live in the city of Prince Albert, on the Saskatchewan river. If that route were opened up, the people of Prince Albert would be about as near to Liverpool as are the people of Montreal.

Now everybody knows that it is a long haul by rail from Prince Albert to Winnipeg. The distance is 600 miles. Then you have a rail haul from Winnipeg all the way down to the head of Lake Superior. Then you have the water haul again, the transhipment, and all the cost which arises from the transhipment to other lines. We have to pay for all that, I might say practically for nothing. It has been estimated —and I think correctly—that we would save by the construction of the Hudson bay road at least 11 cents a bushel on every bushel we raise, and not less than $8 on every steer we raise. I had not time to go into the figures, but we would save more on the crop of wheat and the cattle this year in the west than would build the road twice over. Because, after all, it is only a small piece of railway, not a terrible undertaking, 400 miles, and we have proven that 270 miles of that road should be constructed as a colonization road. We have proved by gentlemen employed by the government in the Geological Department that there is along that route something like ten thousand square miles of agricultural land, a country rich in minerals, fish and timber, and it would therefore pay to build a road for 270 miles, so we pare the project down to less than 200 miles of unprofitable railway.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not wish to interrupt unduly, but it is not regular for the hon. gentleman to refer to proceedings before a committee that has not yet reported.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—The transactions before the committee are public property. We do not exclude the reporters. They can report the whole proceedings in full, if they desire to do so. A great many people of this country have not studied, and have no idea of the vast area of agricultural lands we have in the Northwest. I shall submit a few figures which will give an idea of about the amount of land that we have in that country capable of sustaining a population.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—Where does the hon. gentleman get the figures ?

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I took them from the blue-book. 'Statement of lands under cultivation in 1905 and 1906.' In Manitoba, Alberta and Saskatchewan we had something over seven million acres of land under cultivation. We produced on that seven million acres of land one hundred and sixty-two million bushels of grain, divided as follows: We had sixty-eight million bushels of oats. The yield is forty bushels to the acre ; we had eleven million bushels of barley, the yield being thirty bushels to the acre ; wheat, eighty-two million bushels with an average yield of twenty-one bushels to the acre, or, taking the three classes of grain together, we had an average yield of thirty bushels to the acre. That is the average on the seven million acres of land that is under cultivation. I want to draw my hon. friend's attention to the fact that we have one hundred and seventy-five million acres of arable land in the Northwest territory that we know of. Supposing we bring that all under cultivation—and I desire to say that it is within the bounds of possibility. We who are standing here at the present time may not see it, but there is no doubt that in the course of time every acre of arable land in that country will be brought under cultivation. So that if you had that 175,000,000 acres of arable land under cultivation, taking the same average of thirty bushels to the acre, what would you find? You would produce five and one-quarter billion bushels of grain. A great many people have only a hazy idea of the magnitude of the country west of Lake Superior, the greatest territory that any people have on the face of the earth. There is no doubt in my mind about that. And what do we find ? Of that vast territory we had this last year only 7,000,000 acres under cultivation. We produced this season, of all kinds of grain, something like two hundred million bushels, and with all our boasted railway facilities, over two-thirds of that grain has yet to be taken to market. We have not got sufficient transportation to take the produce of seven million acres of land to market, and two-thirds of it is still in the hands of our farmers in the west. They have to go, as a consequence, to the banks and borrow money on this grain stored, in many cases, as some of my hon. friends here know, in small warehouses on the prairie. It is subject to great damage, and the owners may suffer serious loss. With two great railways we are unable now to carry out more than one-third of this crop. With seven million acres under cultivation, and a possibility of 170,000,000 acres more to cultivate, we are still dickering about the means of transportation. I desire to say now that before the Grand Trunk Pacific is constructed, and before it is in a position to carry grain from the western prairies, that it will not be able to carry half the produce that will be offered for transport to the seaboard. We will need that road, and the Hudson bay road and every other road that we can possibly construct in order to carry our products to market. I was going to point to some of the advantages that will accrue to the people of our part of the country, and incidentally to the whole Dominion, if that railway was built. The following table of distances is taken from a report made by E. P. Leacock, a gentleman in Manitoba who went into this proposition exhaustively some years ago, and arrived at these figures.

|---|---|
| New York to Liverpool.. | 3,040 miles. |
| Montreal to Liverpool .. | 2,990 " |
| Churchill to Liverpool.. | 2,926 " |

With sea freight distance saved is not an important matter and it is on the saving perhaps by land that we must rely for our strongest argument.

| | Miles. |
|---|---|
| Winnipeg to Montreal via Chicago... | 1,703 |
| " " C.P.R..... | 1,434 |
| " Churchill by west side Lake Winnipeg.. .. .. .. .. | 650 |
| " Liverpool via Chicago and Montreal.... .. .. .. .. | 4,693 |
| | Miles. |
| " Liverpool via C.P.R..... | 4,424 |
| " Liverpool via Churchill.. .. | 3,576 |

Winnipeg then is 1,117 miles nearer Liverpool via Churchill than via Chicago and Montreal, or 848 by Canadian Pacific Railway. This saving all rail excepting the 64 miles saved by sea. Other countries are greatly affected by this saving:

|---|---|
| Port Moody to Liverpool via Montreal.. .. .. .. .. .. .. | 5,896 miles. |
| Port Moody to Liverpool via Winnipeg and Churchill.... .. | 4,779 " |

Which again gives 1,117 miles which British Columbia would save in going to and from Great Britain.

|---|---|
| Yokohama to Liverpool via New York.. .. .. .. .. .. .. | 12,038 miles. |
| Yokohama to Liverpool via Montreal.. .. .. .. .. .. .. | 11,019 " |
| Yokohama to Liverpool via Churchill.. .. .. .. .. .. | 9,902 " |

Showing that Japan can send her goods to Liverpool with a saving of 1,117 miles.

San Francisco equally becomes tributary to the Hudson bay line, as Hudson bay route triumphs over New York route to the extent of 2,126 miles.

I have here a report of Mr. Lindsay Russell, Surveyor General, who is well known to everybody,

Mr. Lindsay Russell in his calculation of distances finds that even the city of Winnipeg, situated in the extreme southeastern part of these territories, is at least 500 miles nearer to Liverpool by Hudson bay route than by the St. Lawrence; while the difference in favour of the former will be increased continually as we advance northward into the interior. He says:

If we take a central point of the whole of the agricultural lands from Northwest Territories say in the neighborhood of Lac La Biche, longitude: 11° west latitude 55° north, we shall find that the distance from it to the city of Winnipeg is about the same as to Churchill. The distance from the latter to Liverpool is about the same as from Montreal so that between the above named centre and Liverpool, by Hudson bay route, the whole distance from Winnipeg to Montreal is saved. This amounts to 1,291 miles by way of Lake Superior and 1,698 miles by the Chicago route. The distance by way of New York is still greater than by Montreal. The advantage of this route over all others are numerous. Grain, cattle and other products of the Northwest Territories reach a European market through Ontario and Quebec or by way of New York. A large proportion of their value is consumed by the long land carriage, whereas if they can find an outlet at Churchill there will be a saving of at least 1,291 miles as compared with Montreal, and upwards of 1,700 miles as compared with New York and this without increasing the length of the voyage ; owing to the short land journey grain from the Saskatchewan and Peace river regions could be exported by way of Hudson bay 'the same year in which it is harvested.' For the transportation of grain and fresh meat as Colonel Dennis has pointed out, the northern route besides shortening the distance, would have great advantages, owing to its 'cooler and more uniform temperature'.

We have heard a great deal in this House about the navigation of Hudson bay. We have heard inside and outside of this House that a great many believe this route to be impracticable, but I think I have figures here to prove, if figures prove anything, that the route can be navigated at least four months in the year, and that is all we claim for the route. If that route can be navigated for four months in a year, and operated up to the middle of November, it is going to be a great boon to the people of this country, because that is the time, in the fall of the year, we can get our products to market. Some hon. gentleman made a statement as to the employment of the rolling stock. He said we could only utilize the rolling stock and roadbed of the Hudson Bay Railway for a part of the year, and that we would be paying interest on idle property. The company could only operate the road four months in the year. What do Mackenzie & Mann do with the rolling stock they bring down from Winnipeg, hauling grain to Port Arthur? That is about the distance the rolling stock would have to be moved. That rolling stock could be brought down in a day and a half, perhaps in a day, possibly less. The canals of the Dominion cost millions of dollars, and they are only used part of the year. The St. Lawrence channel improvements and all the steamboats that navigate that channel cost millions, yet they are only used part of the year. A portion of this road will be used as a colonization road, and the rolling stock that is required on the 400 miles can be used on the prairie country when it is not employed on the Hudson bay route, carrying wheat in another direction over the Grand Trunk Pacific. Then, with regard to the navigation of the straits, Mr. Erastus Wiman took a great interest in Hudson bay, and I will refer to his report. Mr. Erastus Wiman, a gentleman of continental repute, has obtained reports from all the captains of whalers he could, and finds them all agreed that the navigation of Hudson bay is open all the year. He says :

I cannot understand why so much question is raised as to feasibility of going in and out of the straits when we find that these vessels, averaging 320 tons, have fearlessly navigated it so long and so profitably. The Hudson Bay Company, had made prior to the year 1883 about 730 voyages, in and out of the straits, and we find few losses mentioned—The one that is most spoken of is that of two vessels lost on Mansfield island in the year 1864, but we find the captains had been visiting on board an American whaler, and it is to be feared the hospitality of our American cousins had overcome the skippers' knowledge of navigation. York Factory has kept its record of voyages for 92 years and Moose Factory for 146 years and a few blanks which occur in these records show that the voyages were continuous, and that loss and danger never interfered with the navigation. It is even to be wondered that Hudson Bay Company did not lose more vessels ; their vessels always came in through the straits as early as possible, very often arriving about July 15, which on all hands is agreed to be about the worst time of the year for navigation, when the ice flow was most prevalent, they escaped with so little loss. The difficulty which is most presented is the harbours being closed for six months in the year.

But I would ask are not Quebec and Montreal ice bound for almost a like period? If Cabot, in 1498 ; Hudson, in 1610 ; Gibbons, in 1613 ; Baffin, in 1614, and hundreds of others since, felt no fear, and were able to venture through the Hudson bay, then the twentieth century, with its steam, iron ships, its thousand modern appliances, cannot be afraid to venture where men went fearlessly so many years ago.

Professor Hind, before a committee of the Commons of Canada, 1878 stated :

For more than two hundred years from two to five sailing vessels on an average, frequently with war-ships convoying them have sailed annually from Europe and America to Port Nelson or other ports in Hudson bay and returned with cargoes the same season via the only available route, Hudson straits. (Page 103, C.S.R. report, 1878.

Appendix No. 2, 1878, vol. XII., Journals.

Professor Henry Y. Hind says in 1814 :

Lieutenant Edward Chaffell, R.N. of H.M.S. 'Rosamond', visited Hudson bay and in the narrative of his voyage 1817, pointedly adverts to advisability of merchants sending strongly built brigs into Hudson straits early in the month of June——

Here is a gentleman who visited that country in 1814, and he thought it could be navigated in the month of June with good strong ships. I do not think there were any ships built at that time that would compare with the steamships we are building at the present day. Here is another report from the same gentleman. He says :

It is not to be expected that ships during their return to Europe from Hudson bay will ever meet with loose ice—that is flow or pan ice. (Infall F.D.)

The great rise and fall of the tides in such a narrow strait gives colour to the statement that ice never forms entirely across it, for it is well known that no agent is so powerful in preventing the formation of ice in the northern latitudes as strong and continued tidal currents. Churchill, mean tide, 8 feet, spring tide, 15½ feet, F.D.

The only hindrance to an entrance into and through Hudson straits early in June arises from the obstruction presented by the two ice streams coming from East Greenland and Baffin's bay down the west coast of Davis straits. It is reasonable to suppose that these ice streams are less cumbered in May or early in June than in July.

The straits, once entered, the chief difficulty is over, and if entered before the ice comes down, as alleged from Hudson bay, Bluff head may be reached and a new departure taken.

In a tide way, where the tides rise at neaps 30, and at springs 40 feet, and where the daily swing of the tides is from 12 to 20 miles, carrying ice backward and forward through that space twice every day, fresh channels are constantly opening which a steamer can avail herself of, but which are useless to a sailing vessel except with a fair wind.

It was said that passages have been made through the straits late in October. If that is the case there would be no difficulty in moving the crops the same year. From all accounts there seems to be no difficulty in the fall of the year in getting through the straits. (Sessional papers No. 39, Appendix 1883.)

The great width and depth of the straits and the strength of its tides probably keep it open all winter. From all I could learn or observe there appears reason to believe that the strait and bay may be navigated and the land appoached by steamships during an average of over four months in each year, or from the middle of June till near the end of October. (Sessional papers No. 39, Appendix 1883).

The strait and bay might perhaps be navigated by steam vessels earlier than the middle of June, but nothing would be gained in going out before an open harbour could be reached. Much has been recorded in favour of the above opinion from the days of the Danish captain, John Mouch, who wintered in Churchill 261 years ago (1619-20) to the present time, Churchill harbour does not freeze up until November and the sea is open close to it during the whole winter.

Appendix to the 'Journal of Commons,' 1884.

From tables given to government by Hudson Bay Company in 1880, it appears breaking up of the Hayes river at York Factory for a period of 53 years, took place mean average on May 15, the mean of the formation of ice on November 20.

May 1 is usual date of opening of Montreal harbour, November 25, that of its closing.

Dr. Bell considers the straits open for navigation to the extent of four and one half months in each year, and possibly more,—from what is already proved, known to be open for four and one half months at least, save from middle and certainly from end of June until the middle of November.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—That is not from his own experience. He was never there four and one-half months.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—He spent a good deal of time on this question, and no man in this country knows more about it than he does.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—He was there half dozen times.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Then I refer to a lecture by E. P. Leacock, to be found in Canadian Pamphlet No. 735, and I shall read from it the following :

Sir Arthur Dobbs tells that a vessel leaving Hudson bay late in fall went into an inlet for water and whilst there a floating iceberg blocked exit; the crew prepared to winter, but a change of wind towards middle of December moved the iceberg and the vessel sailed through the straits on Christmas day without meeting any ice to impede her passage.

A record has been kept by the Hudson Bay Company at Hayes river for 50 years and that record shows that the river has been open an average of 6 months in the year.

There can be no doubt the Hudson Bay Company did not keep this record with any view of its ever being as evidence in the future of the fact that the navigation of Hudson bay was good. No one can accuse the company of having ever been anxious to open up trade into this region, and therefore, the record kept by their employees evidently for their own information and without any view to the purpose for which it is and will now be used must be taken as best evidence possible.

The United States have not neglected the Hudson bay region—Official returns of years 1863-4-5-6 show their whalers took out more than $1,000,000 whale oil and whale bone. In 1874 and preceding years 50 voyages of United States vessels had been made, and the profit to the United States, $1,371,000.

I remember reading the report of the committee of the House of Lords, which took the evidence of the Hudson Bay officials, and before that committee they stated that the province of Manitoba, with the exception of a little strip along the bank of the Red river, was a swamp, and that Alberta and Saskatchewan which are producing all this wheat, were not fit for anything but Indians ; that a white man could not exist there. I am an old pioneer in that country. I have been there 28 years, and we have had to fight every inch of our way.

We have met with the same old story about ice and snow and frost; we have stayed with it and we have established the fact that our country is not the frozen region which a great many in this eastern part of the Dominion lead you to think. We have had more trouble fighting the opinions of the people in our own country than those of strangers; but I am glad to know that that is all over and that every man in Canada has come to the conclusion that the best part of our heritage is that western country. I desire to refer to a few remarks made by the hon. gentleman from De Lanaudière (Hon. Mr. Casgrain). I am very sorry I had not the pleasure of listening to the hon. gentleman when he was making his speech. I was told by an hon. gentleman who was present, that he treated the House to a beautiful description of a naval battle on Hudson Bay. The hon. gentleman told me that you could imagine you heard the guns booming, and could see the smoke and between each of the flashes of the cannon, he generally observed an iceberg. He took a great deal of time to picture the terrible icebergs floating around the bay. I do not think any hon. gentleman from the province of Quebec or any hon. gentleman from any other province would thank me if I were to rise in this Chamber and describe the icebergs floating through the Straits of Belle Isle, nor would I receive any thanks if I described the icebergs on the Straits of Northumberland, or along the Labrador coast. I do not think we should describe these icebergs in such terrible pictures as my hon. friend did the other day.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—The hon. gentleman does not dispute his account of the battle?

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I am not as well posted in ancient history as my hon. friend from De Lanaudière seems to be.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—It is not a matter of ancient history. Does the hon. gentleman contradict him?

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I will not contradict him when he says there was a battle. If 54 gun ships could go into Hudson Bay, and treat the aborigines along the shore to the excitement of a fine naval battle, I think it goes to prove our statement that the bay is navigable. If they could go in there one hundred years ago with an old frigate, surely you could go in there now with a modern steamship in which you could steam around the ice. In the debate the other day, Hon. Mr. Power said:

Can the hon. gentleman give me a little light on this same subject he has been dealing with. Are there not statistics showing at what season the Hudson bay ships have been in the habit of coming into the bay and at what season they left?

Then Mr. Casgrain said:

I may say, offhand, that for the last 200 years the average time for these ships going in has been about September 2. They were sailing vessels; of course steamships would go faster.

Wherever the hon. gentleman got his information I do not know, but I have extracts from the log books of the Hudson Bay Company's steamers that have run for years and years, and it might not be out of place to read from them. The hon. gentleman from De Lanaudière further stated.

Now, if a steamer not specially constructed to meet such conditions were caught in such ice, it would be crushed like an egg shell. There are no commercial steamers that could possibly live between an iceberg and field ice travelling in opposite directions. The ships navigating those waters must be specially constructed. The 'Neptune' was especially constructed.

Again Senator Casgrain says:

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—I said I would not take stock in such a railway. I believe there is an application before parliament for a charter to build to Fort Churchill, I would have no fault to find with such a road, but I do not think it would pay for some time to come.

We have heard this story before when the Canadian Pacific Railway was built. Always blue ruin and song birds. He also says:

The people from Quebec have contributed to build railways in the Northwest, that they have been badly treated. I think the farmers of the Northwest are well treated, and will still be well treated.

What do we find from Mr. Low's report of the cruise of the 'Neptune,' page 39? He says:

The northwestern part of the bay was free from ice and none to obstruct navigation was found in Fisher and Evens straits. Large quantities of ice was encountered between the mouth of Evens strait and Diggs, at the western end of Hudson's strait but with little trouble safe passage was found through it and there is no doubt that an ordinary unprotected iron steamship would have passed through it at that time without trouble or danger. On the western part of Hudson's strait, the ice was heavier but there was open water on the north side of the strait through which the whaler 'Active' had already passed into the bay.

The important point to be noted is that during all the times the 'Neptune' was beset with the ice during the passage east along the south side of the strait there was never any sign of the surrendering ice rafting by the pressure occasioned by the change of tides and never was the pressure about the ship sufficent to cause damage to an unprotected ship.

There is little doubt that if a more northerly course had been taken in the passage eastward much more open water would have been found, including an unobstructed passage from at least the western end of Charles island, while to the westward open lanes probably have extended to the neighbourhood of Nottingham island.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—What was the date of that?

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—It is the cruise of the 'Neptune.' This gentleman cruised around that bay and the hon. gentleman from De Lanaudière never was in the locality. Mr. Low says, 'you can go in there with unprotected vessels.' The hon. gentleman from de Lanaudière said you could not; that it was the 2nd of September, before the Hudson Bay Company's steamers could get into the bay. I shall now refer to the following extract from the log-book from the steamer 'Ocean Nymph':

Left London, June 12; Stromness, July 1; July 25, ship to eastward of Cape Chudleigh; saw the land; come up with ice, took in light sail courses up; 26, in Hudson strait, clear water.

August 7, passed through some thin ice; 10, arrived at Churchill.

September 1, sailed from York Factory for London; 9, in Hudson straits, one iceberg in sight; 14, crossing Davis strait, passed one iceberg.

October, arrived of North Forelands.

Remarks: the ship entered the strait July 25, and arrived at Churchill August 10, without meeting any detention by ice; a steamer could have passed the strait as early as July 1, this season.

Then I will read an extract from the log of the ship 'Prince of Wales' 1877:

Sailed from London June 12, 1876; sailed for Stromness July 3.

August 5, latitude 61 degrees 22 minutes north, longitude 61 degrees 16 minutes; in ice; sighted an iceberg; foggy. 6th, made Cape Resolution. 17th, entered Hudson bay. 30th, arrived Moose Factory; sailed from Moose Factory September 20th; entered Hudson strait 26th September; left strait October 3.

Arrived Gravesend November 6.

An extract from the log-book of the Hudson Bay Company's ship 'Prince of Wales' from London to Moose Factory:

Sailed from London June 12, 1876; sailed from Stromness July the 3rd, 1876. August 5, latitude, 61 degrees 22 minutes north; longitude, 61 degrees 16 minutes west; sighted an iceberg to the westward; foggy weather. 6th, made Cape Resolution, north by west; several icebergs in sight. 8th, hove to in fog; ship entered Hudson bay, no ice. 17th, arrived at York Factory, 30th; sailed for London September 20th. 26th, entered Hudson strait. October 2, icebergs in sight. 3rd, left Hudson strait. Arrived Gravesend November 6

Then Captain Jacob Tabor of New Bedford, who made two voyages to Hudson bay in 1862 and 1863, remarks that the entrance to the bay can be made from the 11th to the 15th of July. Steamers would have a great advantage over sailing vessels, as they could steam inside of all obstructions from ice, water being held close in shore tides strong six to seven miles, but quite regular and no trouble going out up to the 1st of November.

Hudson bay is open all winter and what little ice makes on the shore breaks up with every gale of wind; about 30 feet rise and fall in the tide in the straits and north part of the bay and the currents are swift.

Captain St. Cair, of the ship 'A. Horton' of New Bedford, remarks June 17, 1877: Entered into the bay; came out September 15 to 25, 1878. Captain St. Clair lost his log books, but was of the opinion that a steamer could go in by July 1, and come out as late as in the year 1878, in which year the ice did not appear until November 12.

Captain Nathan B. Fisher made eight voyages to Hudson bay, covering sixteen years. He says a steamship can enter and go through the straits some ten days sooner than a sailing vessel, say by 1st of July, and some seasons sooner. Whalemen never had any trouble coming out.

It has been stated by some hon. gentlemen that insurance rates by this route would be very high, but I want to point out that such would not be the case. The Hudson Bay Company have navigated this route for years, with so very little loss that now I understand they do not insure their ships at all.

The following is a synopsis of the dates on which the Hudson Bay Company's ships entered and passed through the Hudson straits during years from 1870 to 1883 inclusive:—

The hon. member from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power) asked:

Whether, on the whole, it is a desirable thing, an absolutely necessary thing, that this road to Hudson bay should be opened. It is very well to say that this is a selfish view for the people of the east to take, but after all the east has been, until very recently at any rate, paying for most of the work that has been done, and that work has been chiefly for the benefit of the west. I do not think the west should expect us to be over anxious to spend money for the purpose of taking away from this part of the country the advantage that may arise from the great expenditures that have taken place.

question, which I do not claim to do—I have no doubt the hon. gentleman from Marshfield does though—that as a rule the local traffic is the traffic that makes a railroad pay. But there cannot be any substantial local traffic on a road located from near the mouth of the Saskatchewan to Fort Churchill. There will be very little local settlement. There may be, perhaps, a certain amount of fish carried over the road, but that would not account for a great deal, and I do not understand myself how you are going to make a railway pay which will have business for not more than four months of the year. That is one of the questions that has to be considered.

Suppose that we are generous and build this railway; and say that to Fort Churchill it may be used for four months in the year. What is going to become of the railway during the other eight months?

The hon. gentleman from De Lanaudière (Hon. Mr. Casgrain) made a statement to the same effect. We in the west are getting tired of such statements. I can prove that instead of the west getting rich at the expense of the east, the reverse is the fact.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Dispense.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—No, I will not dispense. I want to prove that the east is getting the best of the bargain. They talk of the vast expenditures in the west, but what about the expenditures in the east? You have $80,000,000 of the public money tied up in the Intercolonial Railway, and the people of the west have to pay their share of the interest on that investment. The road does not earn a cent above its expenses. The day will come when the people of the west will pay 90 per cent of the principal. What about the millions of money spent in building the canals? How many millions have been shovelled into the channel of the St. Lawrence? I am not complaining—nobody hears a complaint from the people of the west because of these vast expenditures in the east. We believe that we are building up a great nation, and we have a national spirit and do not grumble; but when hon. gentlemen tell us that the west is profiting at the expense of the people of the east, I am obliged to show that it is a mistaken view. Take the debts of Ontario and Quebec.

They entered confederation with a debt of $30,000,000 each, contracted in making public improvements in those provinces. Alberta and Saskatchewan came in with a debt of $8,000,000 each. The time is not far distant when the people of Alberta and Saskatchewan will be paying $4 interest on the debt of Ontario and Quebec, while the people of Ontario and Quebec will be paying $1 on our debt. Yet we are told that the west is benefiting greatly at the expense of the east. There has been no large amount of money spent in the west for the benefit of the people of the west. The Canadian Pacific Railway was constructed, and it was good policy to build it, but it was not alone for our benefit. I venture to say that there was a great deal of grumbling when it was undertaken, not only among the Grits, but amongst the Conservatives. The statement was made that it would not pay for the grease to lubricate the axles of the trains. When the war cry was sounded, the Conservatives voted for it, because it was the project of the Conservative government; but, no doubt, they grumbled in secret; they did not like it. That road was built to keep British Columbia in the confederation, and how was it built? The company received 25,000,000 acres of our lands and a small subsidy in cash of $25,000,000. You will find the people of Manitoba, Alberta and Saskatchewan got very little out of it. How much money was put in the Canadian Northern Railway? Not one cent. You give a guarantee of bonds that you will never be called upon to pay. How much do you give for the Grand Trunk Pacific? Is that being built altogether for the benefit of the west? Certainly that portion from north of Lake Superior to Moncton is not for the benefit of the west.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It was imposed by the west upon us.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It was imposed as much on the east as on the west.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—What do we find here now? When a very important question like this, affecting the whole of that western country—because the opening up of that route is dear to the hearts of the people of the west, and 95 per cent of them have absolute faith in the future of that road—we find that there are but fifteen representatives from Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia on the floor of this House to stand up for their rights, while Ontario and Quebec have each twenty-four representatives, and the group of maritime provinces twenty-four. Does any reasonable man believe we are not entitled to as much representation in the Senate as Ontario or Quebec or the maritime provinces? It is not population on which our representation should be based. It is a question of interest, and we have not our proper representation either here or in the cabinet. We have but one minister from all Manitoba, Alberta and Saskatchewan in the cabinet, while Nova Scotia has two, New Brunswick one, Quebec five and Ontario five; still we are told we are getting more than we are entitled to.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Why don't you kick?

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I don't believe in kicking. I do not believe in this sectional spirit which is displayed. I do not think sectionalism ought to be brought into the discussion of this question.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Then you take back part of your speech.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—No, I did not introduce it. It was introduced by Senator Casgrain, Senator Power and others.

The SPEAKER—The hon. gentlemen should abstain as much as possible from mentioning names.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I beg the Speaker's pardon; I do not remember the constituencies which these hon. gentlemen represent. I have shown that the Hudson bay route is feasible for four months of the year with properly constructed steamships, and, if opened up, we could export with its assistance all the surplus products of the Northwest. If we had that route this year, we would not have two-thirds of last year's grain held in the Northwest as we have to-day. I do not think the opening up of the Hudson bay route will interfere with any of the existing lines of railway. I have great faith in the future of the west; I believe it will produce sufficient freight to give all the railways more than they can do. The line proposed for construction is only 400 miles in length. Of that 270 miles is a colonization road, through a good agricultural country; so practically, it means the construction of 200 miles of road. It is a national undertaking, and we expect the nation to build it. If it will not, Manitoba, Alberta and Saskatchewan are big enough to construct it themselves. But it is a project that will benefit the whole country; it will increase our wealth in the west, and you in the east will get the benefit. It is a very small matter, when you take into consideration that there is only 200 miles of road which is not a colonization road, and that part can be constructed at a very low cost, just as low as some of the prairie roads that are being built at present. I think, therefore, the route should be opened up at once. Hudson bay has been navigated for 200 years, and it is a shame that such a feasible route to the west has not been opened up before now. I believe in the west. I am not the only one who believes in it. Two of the greatest statesmen this country has ever produced have believed in it. Sir John Macdonald, one of the greatest minds this country has ever produced, had faith in the west. Sir Wilfrid Laurier has wonderful faith in that great country, and he demonstrated it the other day when he said that something would soon have to be done towards the opening up of this route. Let us bury parish politics; let us gauge the future by the experience of the past. No one should expect to get all the trade of the west carried through his back yard. Trade will follow the lines of least resistance. You might as well try to empty the Ottawa river with a teaspoon as prevent the Hudson bay route being opened up and used for the transportation of the products of the western country to the markets of the world.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved the adjournment of the debate until Thursday next.

The motion was agreed to.

SECOND READING.

Bill (D D) An Act respecting the Alberta Central Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Talbot.)

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at 3 o'clock.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS.

THE SENATE.

OTTAWA, Wednesday, February 27, 1907.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

TEMISCOUATA RAILWAY BILL COMPANY.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN, from the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, reported Bill (V) An Act respecting the Temiscouata Railway Company, with two amendments. He said: The first amendment consists in adding to clause 1, the words 'pending the issue of the said consolidated mortgage income bonds'. That was put in so that there could be no misunderstanding as to the fact that a person could have either the scrip certificates or the bonds, to make it clear that they must have one or the other. The next amendment was to leave out the word 'unregistered', so that at times of election none of those holding unregistered certificates would be entitled to vote. As this Bill has to go to the Commons, and as the amendments are only formal amendments, I would, with the leave of the House, move that they be concurred in now.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I want to follow the regular course. If the hon. gentleman wishes to suspend a rule, he must cite the rule which should be suspended.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Will the hon. gentleman give me the number of the rule?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—No, I will not.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Then I move that the amendments be taken into consideration to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

QUINZE AND BLANCHE RIVER RAILWAY COMPANY INCORPORATION BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN, from the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, reported Bill (65) An Act to incorporate the Quinze and Blanche River Railway Company, with one amendment. He said : The committee has amended this Bill by adding clause 15, which has been considered in this House a standard clause, and is intended to protect provincial rights, and to enforce any provincial legislation which might affect the said railway. I move that the amendment be taken into consideration to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

THE COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS AT ST. JOHNS, P.Q.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired of the government :

1. Was Dr. D. H. Wood, recently collector of customs at St. Johns, P.Q., in the course of last autumn called to occupy a position in the Department of Customs at Ottawa ?
2. Has he been replaced as collector of customs at St. Johns, P.Q., by a person named Gedeon Fredette, jr.?
3. Has this Mr. Gedeon Fredette undergone the examinations prescribed by the Civil Service Act ? When ? If this new holder of the office has not complied with the requirements of the law, does the government intend to see that he conforms therewith immediately by passing the requisite examinations ?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I am advised as follows :

1. Dr. H. W. Wood, recently collector of Customs at St. Johns, P.Q., was transferred to a position in the Customs Department at Ottawa last autumn.

2. The vacancy arising at St. Johns, P.Q., through Mr. Wood's transfer to Ottawa, has been filled by the appointment of Mr. Gédéon Fredette, junior, as collector of customs.

3. A collector of customs is not required to pass a qualifying examination under the Civil Service Act.

SPECIAL TRAINS ON THE INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired of the government :

1. What are the explanations given to the superintendent of the Intercolonial Railway by that train despatcher who, in consequence of a misunderstanding, according to the statement of the aforesaid superintendent, took upon himself without any authority to have run, on the night of December 26-27 last, a special passenger train between St. Léonard Junction and Nicolet, on the Intercolonial Railway ?
2. By way of what misunderstanding did he manage to act in violation of the regulations of the Intercolonial Railway ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No explanations other than what was stated in answer to question of 30th January.

The despatcher was instructed to allow the branch train to proceed to Nicolet with the passengers, and to return for connection with No. 153, as the latter train was late.

Instead of doing as above described, he held No. 146 until No. 153 arrived, and then proceeded to Nicolet. Later in the day ran a special trip.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—We might let it stand a few days more in order to get a complete answer from the hon. gentleman.

GUNS FOR THE BEAUMONT BATTERIES.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired :

1. How many rounds of ammunition has the government bought for the guns of the Beaumont batteries ?
2. At what price ?
3. When and from whom was this purchase made ?
4. Is there in this country, under the direction and control of the government, or otherwise, a manufactory of warlike material and munitions of war, capable of furnishing all the warlike material required, and all the munitions of war necessary for our siege guns and field pieces, in the event of an enemy's fleet cutting our communications with England ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The same price which the contractors charge the War Office for the same materials, plus proof and inspection charges. This has not yet been settled. In reply to the third question, from Vickers Sons & Maxim, Limited. In answer to the fourth question, no.

THE STEAMER 'MONTCALM'.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON inquired :

1. How many men are now or have been employed on the government steamer 'Montcalm', giving the name of each, the date of his employment, the nature of his duties, the amount of his remuneration, and stating in each case whether the employment has been permanent or temporary ?
2. What service or services has the said steamer been engaged in, since her construction? If there have been different services the statement to show definitely the time devoted to each service?

3. At what places in the St. Lawrence or elsewhere has the said steamer operated in ice-breaking, and to what extent has such operation resulted in opening passages for ordinary shipping?

4. What has been the total cost of maintenance of said steamer, including wages, fuel, repairs, board of crew, and other expenses, from the time she commenced service (the date to be stated) up to the 25th instant?

5. And showing the tonnage, horse-power, and original cost of said steamer?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Would the hon. gentleman allow that to go as a return? The department tell me that they cannot answer it catagorically.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I have no objection.

W. T. R. PRESTON IN SOUTH AFRICA.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—As I observe the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce is in his place, I wish to call his attention and that of the House to the rather remarkable conduct of an officer of his department, in the pay of the government of Canada, in putting forth the superior claims of South Africa over those of Canada in the matter of immigration. I have an English paper on my desk, in which Mr. W. T. R. Preston, a man whose name we are tolerably familiar with in Canada, in a letter to the London 'Express', of the 11th instant, makes use of the following language:

South Africa can more readily support millions of population in its agricultural possibilities between Table Mountain and the Zembezi than Canada can between Winnipeg and the Rocky Mountains.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Has the hon. gentleman a copy of the paper?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I have an English paper in which this extract is republished.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Has the hon. gentleman the paper in which it originally appeared?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—This is in quotation marks, and is an extract from a letter from Mr. Preston published in the London 'Express' on the 11th of this month, and the words he uses, according to the 'Canada Gazette', are those which I have read to the House. I have no doubt my hon. friend will tell the House that his department has not instructed Mr. Preston to set forth the claims of South Africa or of any other country as being superior to those of Canada. If he has those instructions, my hon. friend will say so and assume the responsibility for them; but I take it for granted that Mr. Preston has been doing what he has often done before, taken upon himself to say things without authority. As representatives of the tax payers of Canada who are finding the salary for Mr. Preston to do some work, whether in South Africa or Japan, we do not expect he will set forth the claims of South Africa or of any other country as being a field for immigration in preference to those of Canada.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I may say to my hon. friend that I shall cause inquiry to be made with regard to this matter. But what he has sent me is a statement in the 'Canada Gazette', purporting to be copied from the London 'Express'. I think it would be necessary to get the London 'Express' to see what Mr. Preston actually did say.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That paper is not taken here.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I should doubt extremely if he made the statement herein contained, and, undoubtedly, if he has done so, I shall call on him for an explanation; but I should like to have the original document, before I express a further opinion on his conduct.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It is quite true that I am not in a position to produce the London 'Express'. The paper does not appear to be taken in Ottawa, and, from inquiries that I have made, I feel almost certain that it is not taken in Canada at all. It does not appear in any of the public libraries in an official way, but my hon. friend will readily admit that the 'Canada Gazette' is a very excellent authority, and when it quotes these words and places them within quotation marks, my hon. friend will not, I am sure, cherish the thought for a moment that they have not been written by Mr. Preston, and that they are not contained in the letter in question. I think the 'Canada Gazette' would surely be above the suspicion of garbling the letter.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—My hon. friend knows it is very dangerous to accept hearsay evidence, no matter how good the intention of the party may be. I should say, on reading that paragraph, that it was excessively unlikely that Mr. Preston had used the language there imputed to him, but I shall make inquiry. If necessary I will send expressly to London, and I have no doubt I will be able to obtain the actual paper and the actual letter which he may have sent.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—This is an exceedingly important matter. If Mr. Preston has dared to use the language that is attributed to him by a London paper, he not only deserves a sharp rebuke, but he deserves to be dismissed. We cannot afford to keep officers in this country drawing a good salary and pocketing Canadian money and at the same time advocating the cause of other colonies against our own. I think this matter should be probed to the bottom, and if Mr. Preston has dared to do what the hon. gentleman from Marshfield has said that he did——

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Oh no, the hon. gentleman did not say he had done so. I beg to correct my hon. friend. I think it is very unfair and unjust to absent men that on a hearsay statement they should be condemned in this fashion, and no officer of mine, while I hold a portfolio here, will be condemned in that way until I have had an opportunity of ascertaining what was actually said, and getting his defence.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I am not assuming that he did it at all. I said 'if he is guilty'——

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I prefaced my remarks with that statement—if he is guilty of conduct such as that, he deserves to be dismissed, and I say it should be probed to the bottom.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I suppose the hon. gentleman does not know that the government is putting in force a rule of this House that no preamble shall be given to any remarks?

COMMONS BILLS NOS. 3 AND 4.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I would like to ask the leader of the government what has become of Bills No. 3 and No. 4, which have passed the House of Commons, but which have not been taken up in this House.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not keep tally of the Bills. I am not equal to that effort. When Bills come from the House of Commons, if no hon. gentleman is prepared to move them, they lie on the table, and probably these Bills will be found in that position. The members of the Commons are rather negligent in regard to asking hon. senators to take charge of their Bills, and very often they are taken up by volunteers. If they are not so taken up, of course they lie on the table.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think in a case of this kind hon. gentleman would be entitled to make a motion that they be placed on the order paper without being required to give notice.

OTTAWA LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY BILL.

REFERRED TO BANKING AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. KERR moved :

The suspension of rule No. 119, so far as it applies to Bill (AA) intituled : 'An Act to incorporate the Ottawa Life Insurance Company,' so that the said Bill may be considered at the next meeting of the Standing Commitee on Banking and Commerce.

He said : This Bill received its second reading yesterday, and was referred to the Standing Orders Committee; but, at the moment, it occurred to me that that committee would be meeting this week and may not be sitting next week, and as the Bill will have to go to the House of Commons, I think it would not be unreasonable to ask for the suspension of the rules in order that the Bill may go to the Standing Orders Committee at its next meeting. The Bill is, in my opinion, a proper one, and one which, as far as I know, is not likely to be opposed.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (79) An Act respecting the Great West Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. De Veber.)

Bill (58) An Act to incorporate the Western Rivers Improvement Company.—(Hon. Mr. Watson.)

Bill (78) An Act respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Young.)

Bill (80) An Act to incorporate the Prudential Financial Society.—(Hon. Mr. Watson.)

Bill (54) An Act to incorporate the Edmonton, Dunvegan and British Columbia Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Bostock.)

Bill (59) An Act respecting the surveys of the Public Lands of the Dominion and the surveyors entitled to make such surveys.—(Hon. Mr. Scott.)

Bill (28) An Act to incorporate the Residential Fire Insurance Company.—(Hon. Mr. Sullivan.)

Bill (15) An Act respecting the Joliette and Brandon Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Thibaudeau, de la Vallière.)

Bill (71) An Act to incorporate the Burrard, Westminster Boundary Railway and Navigation Company.—(Hon. Mr. Riley.)

Bill (46) An Act to incorporate the Manitoba Radial Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Young.)

JORDAN-ERIE POWER COMPANY BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. KERR (in the absence of Hon. Mr. Casgrain) moved the third reading of :

Bill (N) An Act to amalgamate the Jordan Light, Heat and Power Company and the Erie and Ontario Development Company, Limited, into one corporation under the name of the Jordan-Erie Power Company.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I beg to move the amendment of which I gave notice yesterday.

The motion was agreed to and the Bill as amended was read the third time.

SPAIN DIVORCE BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN (in the absence of Hon. Mr. Watson) moved the third reading of Bill (CC) An Act for the relief of Osprey George Valentine Spain.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—When the motion for the second reading of this Bill was made yesterday, I mentioned that I should call the attention of this House to statements made by the hon. member for Wellington in the debate upon the adoption of the Divorce Committee report. I now call the attention of the Senate to what he then stated, and, in doing so, I regret exceedingly to refer to any personal matter. It is something which, I think, we ought to avoid as far as we possibly can, but when we are deliberately misrepresented, I think it is our bounden duty to defend ourselves and to protect the Senate. On that occasion the hon. gentleman said :

> We had been unanimous in our conclusion, with the exception of the hon. gentleman from St. Thomas, who appears to differ from us on almost every case. We have to put up with that. The House has placed him on the committee. I do not say that he is not conscientious and so forth.

What I have to say here is that I defy that hon. gentleman to say that I opposed almost every Bill. I opposed one Bill last session, the Hadley Bill. I agreed with the Divorce Committee last session upon the report in the Spain case. My hon. friend from Wellington sent in a minority report on that occasion. This session I have opposed the granting of a divorce to Spain. From the evidence submitted I thought I was justified in so doing, and I have not had an opportunity to express an opinion in this House upon the Hadley case this session. Therefore his statement that I, on almost every occasion, oppose these Bills is not well founded. I challenge him to mention any instance in which I have opposed divorce Bills with the exception of the ones I have mentioned. I have no hesitation in saying that his statement is absolutely incorrect, and I cannot imagine why he made it. I might use a stronger term to express my views on the subject, but I merely say his statement is inaccurate in every particular. Last year I conscientiously opposed the Bill now before us and a majority of the House agreed with me. I would not have this honourable body imagine that I would remain on the committee if I were deliberately and consistently acting against the majority. It is the duty of any individual member, who cannot agree in a general way with the committee, to withdraw from that committee. However, I do not ask or desire the hon. gentleman from Wellington to dictate to me what my conscientious convictions should be. I shall not oppose the third reading of the Bill.

The motion was agreed to on a division, and the Bill was read the third time and passed.

INTERCOLONIAL AND PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND RAILWAYS EMPLOYEES PROVIDENT FUND BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (68) An Act to establish the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island Railways Employees Provident Fund.

(In the committee.)

On clause 2, subsection (c) :

(c) 'Employee' means and includes any male officer and employee of His Majesty employed upon, and duly appointed to, the staff of the railway and giving his entire time to the service of the railway, to whom this Act applies, and includes any person employed by His Majesty upon the government official cars.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Why is 'employee' limited to male employees in the Intercolonial Railway service ? I apprehend there are women who are practically doing the same work as men—clerical work, office work, and other important branches of duty in connection with the railway. It seems to me it is drawing a distinction which is really not warranted, provided the duties be the same ?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—My hon. friend is a gallant gentleman, and I am glad to see he stands up for the rights of the fairer sex.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I am sorry my right hon. friend does not look at it in the same way.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The clause struck me, when I was reading the Bill. I rather think it will be found on the Intercolonial railway that with the exception possibly of a few clerks, the employees are male. As my hon. friend knows, the lady clerks frequently have a habit of changing their name and condition, and I am rather inclined to think this fact was pretty fully considered by the hon. minister. I will ascertain if he has any special reason for it. There are very few, if any, in the employ of the Intercolonial railway who would be affected by this clause.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If they change their names in the way indicated by my hon. friend, the government will not be called upon to pay for their superannuation allowance, unless they remain a number of years in the service of the government. I understand there is a clause requiring that there must be service covering a number of years.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Further on I see that the term 'includes any person' is used. Will that include male and female employees ?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I do not think so. I think this subclause (c) will govern. However, I shall make further inquiry as to that particular point.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Perhaps my right hon. friend would allow this clause to stand. I have received a couple of letters in connection with the Bill.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—With respect to subclause (c) ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—The definition of employee.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Relating to the same point that has been raised by the hon. leader of the opposition?

Hon. Mr. POWER—No.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I have no objection to let the clause stand. I do not want to press any clause to which objection is taken or respecting which explanation is desired. We may as well dispose of those clauses to which the House takes no objection, and reserve only those concerning which further explanation is desired.

Subclauses (c) and (h) were allowed to stand, and the remainder of the clause was adopted.

On clause 4,

4. His Majesty shall contribute annually to the fund, out of the gross earnings of the railway, an amount at least equal to the total monthly contributions by the employees, but not exceeding in any one year one hundred thousand dollars, in such sum or sums as the Governor in Council from time to time determines to be necessary for the maintenance of the fund.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Might I ask my right hon. friend if this is in the proportion of contributions made by the other large railway systems of Canada to their superannuation funds ?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—If I remember right, I stated to the House at the second reading that this Bill, I understood, was modelled on the Grand Trunk Railway superannuation scheme. I am now advised by the department that it was rather modelled on the provisions of the Baltimore and Ohio Railway and not the Grand Trunk Railway. As to the exact amount of the contribution, I think this is not precisely similar.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I presume that the Government will be contributing somewhat more generously to the fund than the other railway systems ?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—No, I rather think it will be the other way. I do not think they levy on the wages of their employees as heavy a percentage as we propose to do.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—What is the contribution this year ?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—About $60,000. I believe.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 5,

5. Every employee shall contribute to the fund monthly one and one half per cent of his regular monthly salary and wages, which percentage shall be deducted by the minister each month out of the said salary and wages, and so long as he remains in the service he shall in like manner continue to contribute to the fund upon the said basis, or upon such other or new basis as is established or provided for in this Act ; but, in order to provide for the payment of allowances to be provided under this Act to persons who become entitled thereto immediately or soon after the coming into force of this Act, the first monthly contribution by the employees shall be three per cent instead of one and one-half per cent.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—May I ask my right hon. friend if this contribution is based on actuarial tables, or in what way the percentage is arrived at ?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I understand from the department, that this is based on actuarial calculations that they have made, which I believe were revised by the Finance Department.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That would only apply to those who have been paying into what might be termed the superannuation fund. How is it with those who retire, having paid nothing to the fund ? If I understand, the reason of the Minister of Railways and Canals for introducing this Bill was to enable him to retire a number of officials and employees who had been in the service for a number of years, with a view to economy in the management of the road, but who could not pay anything into the fund. Is it proposed to superannuate them, or give them a retiring allowance out of the $100,000 to be set aside under this Act for the purpose of retiring those who have never put anything into the fund ?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—And the monthly allowance only applies to those continued in the service, or who may hereafter be employed?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Yes. It is almost of necessity that the aged employees who are being retired at once will receive a benefit to which they have not contributed. The position taken by the hon. Minister of Railways is this : He stated to the House of Commons, when introducing the Bill, that he found a very considerable number of employees on the rolls receiving full pay, who were practically inefficient, who had outlived their usefullness altogether, but whom he could not and would not turn adrift into the streets, and no doubt a considerable part of the contribution which the government are to make will go to provide for these people. The minister expressly stated, however, that it would really be a saving to the country, because, unless he did something of the kind, these men would continue on secula seculorum to draw their salaries and receive a good deal more than the superannuation allowance for doing nothing. My hon. friend's experience will tell him that this Superannuation Bill, and all Superannuation Bills, have been introduced in large measure on that ground. You cannot expect that any minister or government will turn old employees, who have served the country for many years, adrift on the streets. The result in my experience—and

I have no doubt my hon. friend's experience is the same—if you do not provide a superannuation allowance or pension, is that you keep your office full of gentlemen who become too old to be of any service, and the state loses doubly. It has to pay these men full salaries and has to pay others to do their work.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 10,

10. A secretary of the board shall be appointed by the minister.

2. The secretary shall be paid out of the fund such salary as the minister, on the recommendation of the board, determines.

3. The secretary shall be subject to the board, and shall obey all orders and directions of the board touching his duties and the conduct of his office.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I notice that this clause gives the whole power and authority to the minister, without any reference to the council, of which he forms a part. I have noticed in most of the Bills introduced by the government that they give much greater power to the minister of a department than has ever been given before. In most Acts of parliament on the statute-books there is a provision that the minister shall report these things to council, thereby the council becomes responsible as well as the minister himself. I can understand that though a minister may act individually in his own department, whatever he may do the government is responsible for it, but under this clause the cabinet is in this unfortunate position: the minister may do that which his colleagues would not confirm if the report were made to them. On one or two occasions, I have pointed out this departure from the old principle which has prevailed in the past, of compelling each minister to report any important event or action in connection with his department to the government, in order that they, as a cabinet, might become responsible. We have seen lately, in investigations which have taken place, that directors have paid very little attention to the management of the companies of which they have been directors, leaving it exclusively to the manager or some other person in connection with the company, with the result that there has been a good deal of departure from that which is correct and proper. I merely mention this to point out that a minister may, in his own opinion, do what he thinks is right for the time being, but if it were brought under the notice of the cabinet he might be checked, or the action which he proposes to take or confirm, as it would be in the case of the exercise of this power, might be rejected or modified, and, for that reason, I cannot say that I approve, from what little experience I have had, of putting too much power in the hands of any minister. Whatever he may do of an important character should be done with the concurrence of the cabinet, of which he forms a part.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—There is a good deal to be said for the view my hon. friend has expressed, and, as I have already stated, if any questions were raised which required further consideration, I would reserve the clause for consultation of my colleagues. I shall therefore reserve clause 10, in order that I may confer further on the subject.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—I would direct the attention of the hon. member from Belleville to subsection 2 of this clause, which provides that the secretary shall be appointed and paid on the recommendation of the board.

On clause 12,

12. The following classes of persons shall, upon the recommendation of the board and the approval of the Minister, but subject to this Act and to the rules and regulations of the board, upon being retired by the minister from service, be entitled for the remainder of their lives to monthly allowances as provided for in this Act:—

Class A. Those who have attained the age of seventy years after being fifteen years in the service;

Class B. Those who, after being fifteen years in the service, becomes physically or mentally incapacitated from following their usual occupation in the service;

Class C. Those who have attained the age of sixty years after being fifteen years in the service, and request to be retired from the service;

Class D. Those who are permanently disabled from following their usual occupation in the service as a result of injuries received while on duty and actually at work in the service;

Class E. Those who, previous to the coming into force of this Act, entered the service at such an advanced age as to cause them to reach the age of seventy years before fifteen years in the service; provided that on attaining the age of seventy years they have been at least ten years in the service.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—I would ask the right hon. minister with regard to the effect of this clause upon persons who may be retired after a year or two, but who do not come within the time specified ? Will they be called upon to contribute to the fund if they are not within these specifications from class (a) to class (e) ?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—That point is dealt with a little later, I think, in one of the clause that we shall come to subsequently. I think my hon. friend will find, if he refers to classes 19 and 20, that provision is made for such cases as he refers to.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—Might I ask the hon. minister, if there is any clause in this Bill to provide for employees who have served the Intercolonial Railway faithfully for a number of years during their life, and retired at 60 or 70 years of age, who have been retired for one or two years ? Is there anything provided for these men who have paid into the fund for some little time?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I do not think they could have paid into this fund.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—But into the insurance fund ?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—They could not have paid into this fund.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 13,

13. The allowance to be paid under this Act shall be a monthly pay allowance of one and one-half per cent of the average monthly pay received by the employee for the eight years immediately preceding his retirement for each year of his service, and shall be paid monthly from the fund upon retirement for the remainder of his life.

2. In ascertaining the average monthly pay received by an employee for the said eight years, if in any month the employee did not received an amount equal to one-half of his then regular monthly salary or wage, such month and the amount received by him for such month shall not be included; and in the case of an employee in the service at the time of the coming into force of this Act whose salary or wage has been reduced for a period at the end of his service on account of inability from old age, or mental or physical infirmity, to perform the duties required of him, the average monthly pay, in the discretion of the board with the approval of the minister, shall be reckoned for the eight years immediately preceding the date at which his salary or wage was so reduced.

3. In no case shall the monthly allowance to any person be less than twenty dollars per month, or more than two-thirds of the said average monthly pay.

4. The monthly allowance shall be payable from the first day of the month next succeeding the date of retirement under this Act, and thereafter shall become due and payable on the first day of each month.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Might I direct the attention of the minister to what seems to be an inconsistency between the first portion of this clause and subclause 3 ? My hon. friend will observe that the allowance is one and one-half per cent, practically, of the salaries received during the year by the employee. In the case of an employee receiving say $1,000 a year, the superannuation allowance, on the basis of one and one-half per cent, would be $1,500.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—It would be a little more than that.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—He would only receive $15 on every $1,000. One and one-half per cent would be $15 on a thousand.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—One and one-half per cent per month would be 18 per cent per year.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If he receives one and one-half per cent of the average monthly pay, he receives practically one and one-half per cent upon his allowance for the year. It is immaterial whether you compute it by the month or the year. I am taking the average allowance of salary of an employee for the eight years referred to in the first portion of the clause. The minimum sum that could be paid him is $20 a month, which would be substantially an advance of one and one-half per cent. Therefore the employee receiving only $400 a year would be in receipt of a superannuation allowance very much in advance of one and one-half per cent.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I think that was done after consultation with the men themselves. They seemed to have been willing to give a very considerable advantage to those receiving a smaller salary, over the others.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The minister will observe that $20 a month would be $240 a year, which, on a salary of say $1,000 a year, would represent a very much larger percentage; and the question arises whether, if the fund is based upon a 1½ per cent basis, as is seemingly the case, this amount could be realized.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Supplemented with a grant from the government.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I apprehend this takes into consideration the grant from the government. Clause 13 takes into consideration what the entire fund is, and proceeds to make that distribution of the entire fund.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—And there is this interest accumulating.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That is only 3 per cent.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Three per cent compounded over a number of years amounts to a considerable sum.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—But you must take into consideration that this fund will be drawn upon from time to time, so that even with compound interest the amount will not be very substantial. But if those two clauses are taken into consideration, the inconsistency between the two, I think, will be at once observed.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I think my hon. friend is right in saying that the amount has to be supplemented. The question would rather be whether the amount that the government grants in aid is sufficient to warrant the statement that they will be able to pay these sums. That is an actuarial calculation, and it would depend largely upon the salaries and the number of employees.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Then wherein is the wisdom, or wherein is the service, of placing this on a 1½ per cent basis? It seems to me it is also open to this comment, that the employee, no matter what salary he is receiving, should know what his superannuation is to be. If it be allowed to remain in this way, that the minimum allowance is simply mentioned, and the employee is receiving $240 a year, then it is idle to fix it upon a 1½ per cent basis, because one can scarcely conceive a case where the limit of 1½ per cent would satisfy the superannuation allowance. It is 1½ per cent per month on that monthly allowance, so that it is immaterial whether you take it by the month or the year.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I trust the minister will allow the clause to stand to consider the question raised by the hon. leader of the opposition. I do not understand the allowance of 1½ per cent. The monthly allowance is to be 1½ per cent of the average monthly pay, and the allowance for the year is in the same proportion. Supposing an employee is receiving $500 a year, 1½ per cent of that is only $67.50, and evidently it could not be the intention——

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—No; $75.

Hon. Mr. POWER—No; not as much as that. I think there must be some error in the clause. Subclause 3 says: 'In no case shall the monthly allowance to any person be less than $20.' This Bill does not show how you are going to get up, from the ridiculously small amount of 1½ per cent on $30, to the $20. The minister will see that it is desirable to let this clause stand.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—It is quite easy to understand. That one and one-half per cent is given by every employee, and this $20 a month is the retiring allowance. There may be one out of 500 retiring, but every employee contributes one and one-half per cent of his wages. I think it is plain enough.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is not plain enough, because there are two or three members of this House of ordinary intelligence who do not see it. I understand this word 'allowance' at the beginning of the thirteenth clause to mean the amount to be paid to the employee. Why is the same word 'allowance' used in subclause 2? It says 'in no case shall the monthly allowance to any person be less than $20.'

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Section 5 provides what the employee shall pay into the fund, and section 13 provides what shall be paid out to him.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—In all these cases there are a considerable number of men who die in harness in the service, and there are also a considerable number of men who retire from the service from time to time. All insurance companies I know anything about find considerable profits accruing to the survivors, so to speak, from those two causes, and something of the same kind has been allowed for in the calculations on which this Act is based.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—But the minister will appreciate, I should say, not only the value but the necessity of the employee knowing what his superannuation allowance shall be, whereas if we are to rely upon clause 13 for the purpose of ascertaining what that amount is to be, it will be utterly impossible for him to make a calculation as to what his allowance would be in the event of his retiring. There should be no uncertainty about it. The employee is going into this fund with a view of making preparation for his advanced years, and it would be a lamentable thing if he were to discover that the allowance would not reach by 50 per cent what he was counting upon.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Really, unless the allowance in the first subsection of section 13 is increased to at least 15 per cent, I do not see how you are going to get any respectable retiring allowance.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The government have to contribute in the first place, and I think the question raised by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition is met by the statement that the average monthly pay shall be reckoned for the eight years immediately preceding the date at which his salary was fixed.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That is simply to arrive at what the average monthly pay has been, so it is immaterial whether you take it by the year or month.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Don't you see that the statement is made that the allowance shall be a monthly allowance of one and one-half per cent of the average monthly pay for the last eight years, but that it shall not in any case be less than $240 a year.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My right hon. friend will observe that an employee receiving $500 a year and paying into the superannuation fund upon that basis would receive as large a superannuation allowance at the time of his retirement as an employee who had been receiving $1,250 or $1,500 a year and paying upon that basis.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—He could not receive a larger superannuation.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Well, proportionately.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—My hon. friend will see he could not do that, inasmuch as the minimum is fixed at $240.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I can conceive of no case where only one and one-half per cent would be the amount fixed. If $240 a year or $20 a month is to be the minimum then it is quite manifest that it is idle to use the factor one and one-half per cent, because an employee to receive $240 a year on the basis of one and one-half per cent would have to receive a salary of something like $1,800 a year; therefore the employee who had been receiving $1,800 a year and paying in upon that basis to the fund would really not enjoy any larger superannuation allowance than the employee who had been paying in on the $500 basis. That is manifestly inequitable.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—It is quite true that the men having smaller salaries would, under such a clause, derive considerable benefit, though not to the extent that my hon. friend supposes. I have no objection to holding it over if the hon. gentleman wishes. But he will observe in the same sentence that not more than two-thirds of the average monthly salary must be paid to any one.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—An employee receiving $1,600, on a basis of one and one-half per cent superannuation allowance, might be entitled to $240 a year; therefore my hon. friend will see that the employee receiving $1,600 a year, and paying upon that basis during the whole term of his employment, would not receive more at the end of that year——

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Let the clause stand.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before we pass from that clause, it seems to me that the basis upon which it is founded is simply this : that on the retirement of any of the employees of the Intercolonial Railway, the superannuation allowance shall be based upon one and one-half per cent of the average monthly pay received by the employee for the eight years immediately preceding the retirement. Now, if that principle were applied to an ordinary employee of the road, receiving $200, $300 or $400 a year, he would scarcely get enough to keep him in bread. The third clause is a proviso to this effect ; that in no case, no matter what wages a man may have been receiving at the time of his retirement shall his allowance be less than $20 per month. It is just what the hon. leader of the opposition says, that if a man was getting $400 a year, or a dollar a day, he would pay more in proportion to his salary than the man who was in receipt of a larger salary. But the object of the government, I take it, is that on the retirement of an old employee of the government, who was only a labourer, getting a dollar, a dollar and a quarter or a dollar and a half a day, he shall receive enough to keep him alive; therefore they give him $20 a month, and no smaller allowance shall be made. That seems to me to be the equitable basis upon which this clause is framed.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I think the hon. gentleman is quite right as to the object of the minimum allowance. The point taken by the hon. leader of the opposition is a little different from that. He was under the impression, if I followed him correctly, that this clause would limit largely the amount that could be paid to the men receiving a better salary.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes, he would not be entitled to more than one and one-half per cent.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—That certainly was not the intention of the minister. He proposed to give a liberal retiring allowance in all cases, and his intention is manifest, from adding the words 'Not more than two-thirds of the said monthly pay. In our Superannuation Act, we do not allow any man to receive more than about two-thirds ; thirty-five fiftieths, is the maximum ; and this provision is, to a certain extent, based on the superannuation service.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—One of the benefits of that fund is that the employee knows exactly what he is to receive on retiring.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—The superannuation fund did not fix the minimum sum to be paid to any person retiring under the Act. In the inception of the superannuation fund, the sum deducted from the officers was, I think, for $600 and under, 2½ per cent, and over that amount it was 5 per cent. Afterwards that was amended by making the 2½ per cent, 1¼ and the 5 per cent 2½. Now, the fund, by the application of this Act, ran very seriously behind under that deduction from the salaries of civil service officers, and I contend that the amount here deducted, if you are going to aim at administering the Act so as relieve the country of a very heavy amount of annual payment, should be largely increased. One and one-half per cent is not at all sufficient to form a fund for a retiring servant. Supposing he has been receiving $500 a year, 1½ per cent of that is $7.50. That would be deducted from his salary. He becomes eligible for superannuation when he has been in the service twenty years. He will have paid $150 into the fund, and he commences by receiving $240. It cannot be less than that. I think that is a serious objection. A man serving twenty years, having 1½ per cent deducted from his salary each year, that amount forms a fund of about $150, without compound interest. At the end of that time he retires and he receives $240 a year. Virtually he draws, in about eight months, the sum he has put in, and he becomes a burden on that fund for the remainder of his life. I think it is an unwise basis on which to create a superannuation. The man who receives $2,000 a year pays $30 a year into the fund. He pays 1½ per cent annually, just the same as the other man. If he continues for twenty years, he will have paid in $600, but after superannuation he is permitted to draw two-thirds of his salary for the remainder of his life. Two-thirds of $2,000 would be close to $1,400 a year. He has not then contributed into the fund a sum sufficient to pay the first six months of his retiring allowance—not quite six months, unless you compound it. I think this is going to be a serious matter, if you are going to allow a minister and a board to superannuate a grist of officers from the line every year who have paid in so small an amount to the fund, and permit them to draw a comfortable allowance, in the one case the minimum being not less than $240, and in the other up to two-thirds of his allowance. In the working out of the measure, I think it will become burdensome. I do not consider that an appropriation by the government of $50,000 a year will provide a sufficient sum. Certainly $50,000 will not be enough. I think if you are going to equalize it between the employees and take the balance from the Dominion treasury, share and share alike, admitting the Dominion shall pay $50,000, the effect will be that you will have to collect out of those who have not retired something in the neighbourhood of $50,000. You will never collect that amount on the principle of this Bill. You will have to more than double the rate, if you wish to get the full amount. I think these are points that deserve the consideration of the government. I do not think the deductions proposed in the Bill will permit the government to superannuate a large number of employees every year.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Would my hon. friend keep in view the fact of the payment under clause 5, in going into the matter with the department, to illustrate the employee who had been receiving during his whole term of office $1,600 a year would really contribute to the fund $240 a year?

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—How many years?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—During the whole time. The clause says 'every employee shall contribute to the fund monthly one and one-half per cent of his regular monthly salary and wages.

Hon. Mr. POWER—He only contributes $24.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I was basing it on the other proposition. However, there is that disparity to which I wish to direct attention between what the two men would contribute.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—There would not be much disparity between what they contributed in proportion to their salary. The disparity would be the other way.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I cannot see that there is any disparity at all. My hon. friend surely does not understand—possibly he understands better than I do—that there is one and a half per cent deducted from the salary of every employee whether his salary is $2,000 or $500. One and a half per cent of $2,000 would be $30, and one-and a half per cent of $500 would be $7.50 a year. That is the deduction that is made. You cannot increase or decrease that. It makes no difference whether a man is getting $500 a year or $50.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 15,

15. Every person entering the service after the coming into force of this Act shall, although he contributes to the fund as provided by this Act, before being entitled to participate in any of the benefits to be derived therefrom, work at least six months in the service on probation, and at the end of such probationary period pass a medical examination satisfactory to the board and obtain from the general manager a certificate in writing that he considers him competent to perform the duties required of him. Upon any such person failing to pass such medical examination or to obtain such certificate he shall no longer be a contributor to the fund, and shall be refunded the whole amount of his contributions to the fund, without interest.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—I desire to move a slight amendment to this clause by adding after the words 'of him' in the thirtieth line the following:

Such medical examination will be passed before a physician of the company, a graduate of a university of Canada or of Great Britain or of Ireland, and having the right to practise in Canada.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is no thirtieth line in the clause.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I would suggest to my hon. friend that if he will give notice of that amendment we can consider it when we come to the third reading. I do not know that I would particularly object to the amendment, but I should like to confer with the minister who originated this Bill before making an alteration in it.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—I will give notice of this amendment for the third reading.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 18,

18. This Act shall not apply to any employee who is subject to the provisions of the Civil Service Superannuation Act, nor to any person entering the service after the coming into force of this Act, and after having attained the age of thirty-five years, if inexperienced in railway work, or of forty-five years, if experienced in railway work or professionally employed; and the question as to whether such person at the time of his entry is a person experienced or not in railway work, or professionally employed, shall be for the determination of the minister on the report of the board.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I would ask the right hon. minister to let this clause stand, on this ground: This clause says 'this Act shall not apply to any employee who is subject to the provisions of the Civil Service Superannuation Act.' As I understand it, there are men at Moncton, and I think at other places, in the employ of the Intercolonial Railway, who have been there for twenty, twenty-five and in some cases thirty years, and these employees who have been paying into the superannuation fund during all these years, though they will not fare any worse than they do now, will not fare as well as the employees who have been outside the civil service and have not contributed anything. An employee who has paid for a number of years into the Civil Service fund should be allowed the option of coming in under this Bill when it becomes law. At any rate I should like to argue that point, and I hope the right hon. minister will permit the clause to stand.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I do not object to the clause standing, but I do not say that I would agree with the hon. gentleman.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I did not expect that.

The clause was allowed to stand.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Although we have passed clause 17, I should like to call attention to the power given the minister in that clause. It provides as follows:

17. The following employees, notwithstanding anything in this Act, shall not participate in any of the benefits of the fund under this Act, nor be entitled to a refund of any portion of the contributions made by them to the fund, that is to say:

(a) those, except as in this Act provided, who voluntarily retire from the service;

(b) those who are discharged from the service on account of wilful default, misconduct, negligence in the performance of their duties, drunkenness, fraud or dishonesty, and are not reinstated.

I cannot conceive it possible that the government should reinstate an employee who had been discharged for fraud or dishonesty, and I am very much afraid that the tenderness of heart of some ministers might induce them to reinstate persons who ought not to be in the service, particularly if they have large political influence. The right Hon. Minister of Trade and Customs knows very well the pressure that is brought upon a minister when a man who has been discharged for any of these three crimes has a family depending upon him, to have him reinstated. Pressure is brought by the family and friends, political and otherwise, and I am very much inclined to think that, unless the minister had a great deal of stamina, he would be apt, under the latitude given in this Bill, to yield to those influences for the purpose of giving the discharged employee a retiring allowance when he was not entitled to it, simply in order to enable him to support his family.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The hon. gentleman does not object to the first half of the clause.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Oh, no.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—But to their being reinstated where they had been guilty of drunkenness, fraud or dishonesty?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—A man who had been in the habit of drinking too much might really reform; but for fraud and dishonesty, if a man has been dismissed, the minister should not have power, under any circumstances to reinstate him. We know of many men who have been dissipated a great part of their lives, and who have become sober and industrious and good members of society later in life.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I agree largely with the remarks of the hon. gentleman from Belleville. The minister in charge of the department will relieve himself of a great deal of trouble and annoyance if he will only strike out the last four words of this clause. If you leave them in, a man who may be discharged for any of the offences named will get his friends to exert every possible influence to have him reinstated in the service, and the minister will be pestered continually for his reinstatement. In order to avoid the trouble that inevitably will follow from leaving this gate open, the latter part of this clause should be expunged. Let these employees understand that if they are to look forward to a superannuation allowance they must avoid getting drunk or committing offences of any kind that would lead to their dismissal, and that once dismissed for cause the minister will have no power to reinstate them. If you start that way you will have a good force; if not you will have any number of applicants for reinstatement who will bring every influence, when an election is near, to bear on the minister to have them reinstated, on pain of losing every vote they can influence.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I speak from an experience of 17 years.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I entirely endorse the views expressed by the hon. gentlemen from Belleville and Wellington, only I would not make an exception of drunkenness. Fraud and dishonesty will not kill, but drunkeness may cause loss of life. I approve of the suggestion that the last four words of this clause should be stricken from the Bill.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I will consider the matter and be prepared to give an answer when we resume the discussion on this point in the committee again.

Subclause (b) of clause 17 was allowed to stand.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN, from the committee, reported that they had made some progress with the Bill, and asked leave to sit again.

PATENTS OF THE NICHOLS COPPER COMPANY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. KERR (in the absence of Hon. Mr. Watson) moved the second reading of Bill (U) An Act to revive certain patents of the Nichols Copper Company.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We ought to have some reasons given why we should pass this Bill. We all know that there is a good deal of laxity shown by parties who have patents. They allow their patents to rest for some time, and the moment they find some one else about to manufacture the patented article, they come to parliament for special legislation to restore whatever rights they may have possessed. Unless there is good reason given for extending the time within which the patentee may commence to manufacture the patented article, the legislation should not be granted. The law as it stands is almost a farce.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I quite agree that in many of those cases explanations should be given at the second reading. The Bill is not in my charge, and I know nothing about it, except that in the absence of the hon. senator from Portage La Prairie, an explanation was given to me of its provisions to-day. The explanation was given in the presence of the hon. senator from Toronto (Mr. Jones) by Mr. Osler. Our law with reference to patents differs from that of most countries in this respect, that in Canada patents are liable to forfeiture for non-manufacture, within a certain period of time. That is a condition which is not required in most countries. In this particular case, there is a question whether or not the law in that respect had been complied with, and counsel, who had been consulted in the matter, as I was instructed by Mr. Osler a few moments before the Senate met this afternoon, advised that what has been done has been a sufficient manufacture to comply with the law, and that if a case arose, the evidence was sufficient, in his judgment, to satisfy a court that there had been a bona fide manufacture of the article within the Dominion.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—By this company?

Hon. Mr. KERR—By this patentee; and there had been a considerable expenditure in doing that work, but that the latter being so open to question as to whether the manufacture would be deemed sufficient to maintain the patents, he had advised that before any larger expenditure was incurred in the matter they should get the question determined in the only place where it could be determined, here in parliament, by this Bill. There was no conflict of authority apparently, and he was not aware of any conflicting interest existing. He did not know of any other person who had engaged in the manufacture of this article, or whose business would at present be interfered with by this legislation.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What article is patented?

Hon. Mr. KERR—It is a process for roasting ores for the extraction of sulphur. The explanation was very short and given in the presence of the hon. senator from Toronto, because he wanted to know if there was ground for opposing the application. In the absence of the hon. senator from Portage la Prairie, I was asked to move the second reading, because further delay might endanger the passing of the Bill, and they are anxious to bring it before the committee, where evidence could be given to establish these different points. I do not know that I need to enlarge, further than to say that it is a bona fide application made in support of patents, where the party believed he had complied with the requirements as to manufacture, and that he could establish that there had been, at all events, a reasonable effort made to do that, because we know that for years past there has been no demand for that process. The committee would be advised of the facts and know whether a sufficient case had been made out for reporting favourably on the Bill. It is not convenient to go into details here as to what the manufactures were, or to explain the process. In view of this conversation to which I have referred, and of the statements that were made by the hon. gentleman who had asked for an adjournment until to-day, in order that he might make inquiries, I did not deem it necessary to make this statement, because I believed my hon. friend from Toronto could make the statement for both sides; but as the hon. senator from Belleville has asked for an explanation, I have given it as I understand it. The applicant appears to have made out a prima facie case to go to the committee, and if he establishes it before the committee, I think he would be entitled to his Bill on the lines that we have been recognizing up to the present time. I did not anticipate that it would be necessary for me to make this statement, because I knew that the hon. gentleman from Toronto was in a position to state the case fully so that both sides of it could be understood.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is evident there must be doubts in the mind of the eminent lawyer to whom the hon. gentleman referred, and we all know that when an application of this kind is made and lawyers give their opinion, they give an opinion as nearly as they can in accordance with the wishes of those who employ them.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I do not think that.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—They may not give the opinion, but one thing is very certain, they will work in the interest of those who employ them from the moment they accept a retainer. The fact that the firm to which the hon. gentleman has referred has recommended an application to parliament, is the best evidence to a layman that the terms of the patent have not been complied with. Otherwise, they would scarcely put him to this trouble, unless they think that the expense of obtaining an Act of parliament to extend the right to manufacture is less than it would be to go into a law court and fight it out, even if he did succeed. There was one remark made by my hon. friend which occurred to me while I was speaking; this is an invention or an improvement in ore roasting furnaces. The fact that the mining industry of the country in the past has not been sufficient to justify the investment of money necessary to establish these furnaces, may have caused delay in manufacturing, but now that new developments are taking place they may wish to tie up for a long time in the future their process and prevent anybody else from utilizing it.

Hon. Mr. JONES—Every one will admit that this is practically retroactive legislation. If there is any legislation coming before this House that we should be careful in passing, it is legislation of that nature. I had hoped that a full explanation of this Bill would have been given to the House, because it seems to me where extraordinary legislation of this nature is asked for, the House should be put in possesion of very excellent reasons why it should give it favourable consideration before permitting the Bill to go to committee. There are four patents which this Bill seeks to revive. The first of these was taken out eleven years ago. If there is any question about the validity of that patent, because of non-manufacture, then that question must have arisen nine years since. It is a good while to go back to consider whether we should revive that patent or not. When it was taken out, payment was made upon it for a period of six years. Whether further payments have been made or not I do not know, but, from the wording of the Bill as introduced, I should infer probably that no further payments had been made. It will be evident to every one that the patents which refer to the roasting of ores and the erection of furnaces for that purpose, could not have been used to any extent in this country until recently. Now, however, the situation is materially different. We have, at least in one case, gone to a very considerable expenditure, at least one million dollars, in the preparation of furnaces at Port Arthur for the treatment of an ore that it is necessary to put through a process somewhat similar to the process apparently provided for in this Bill, to enable us to use the ore at all. Whether that or other industries which are now springing into life involving plans for the roasting and handling of ores, have influenced the patentee in this case to apply for the legalization of his patents which lapsed so long ago, I do not know; but it would appear that that was the condition. It would appear also from the statement made by the hon. senator from Toronto, that one of the reasons why the Bill comes to the House is because there is a doubt in the mind of the owner of the patents, or of his solicitor, whether he is legally entitled to enforce them or not. It would appeal to me, if that is the case, they ought to go to the courts. The matter ought not to come to this House to be considered, because a committee of this House is not likely to be in a position to judge whether the claims of the applicant, of having manufactured these patented articles during the earlier years of the patents, can be made good, and that what he has done during the earlier years of the patents have been such as to maintain his position as the bona fide owner and controller of the process which he now desires to have put beyond question by a special Act of parliament. It is true that our laws with regard to manufacturing differ from those of other countries, and doubtless in the earlier years, when this provision was enacted, it was thought necessary to meet the conditions of the country. We have alongside of us a great manufacturing country where many patents are taken out, and which are patented in Canada also, just as this, apparently, was at that time, by people in Boston and New York, who were interested in the treating of ores and where experiments had been going on for some time, and doubtless they were being used in that country, but not in Canada. It was a simple matter for them to come into Canada and take out this patent. That would not cost them $100. Unless they could show they had in Canada made considerable experiments and spent considerable money bona fide, there would be no reason why we should bring into life and validate these various patents. I find that the first of the patents is eleven years old, the second eight years, the third seven years, and the fourth four years old. One of the four, the third, refers to an entirely different matter from the articles patented in the other three. The first, second and fourth refer directly and indirectly to furnaces and the roasting and treatment of ores; and the other refers to a pneumatic harness saddle, a special kind of harness of pneumatic nature for use on horses. I do not know how it comes in here, but it does not appear to have much to do with the roasting of ores, unless it is a patent harness used in drawing ore to the furnaces. Doubtless that is a mistake, and may be explained in the committee. It only shows how easy it is to get patents validated by parliament without that thoughtful consideration that ought to be given to such legislation. I do not propose to object to the second reading of this Bill, because, possibly, it is desirable that it should go to the committee, where those interested will have an opportunity to give explanations; but I do hope that when it gets to the committee, every care will be taken to protect the many interests that are growing up in Canada to-day which may be affected by this particular measure. I am impressed to say that, because one or two of the clauses of the Bill appear to me to indicate that they are conditions out of the ordinary, and that this House is asked to do rather more than put the patentee where he would have been if the question of the patents for these articles had not been invalidated. Surely we should not go beyond that. Possibly it is not the intention, but that is the way it appeals to me. The applicant asks in clauses 1 and 2 that:

1. Notwithstanding anything in the Patent Act as amended by chapter 46 of the statutes of 1903, or in the patents mentioned in the preamble, the said patents are declared not to have become null and void and not to have ceased and determined under paragraph (a) of section 4 of chapter 46 of the statutes of 1903; but any of the said patents shall become null and void and shall cease and determine, if within six months after the passing of this Act the manufacture of the inventions patented under that patent is not commenced and after such commencement is not continuously carried on in Canada in such a manner that any person desiring to use it may obtain it or cause it to be made for him at a reasonable price at some manufactory or establishment for making or constructing it in Canada.

2. Notwithstanding anything in the Patent Act as amended by chapter 46 of the statutes of 1903, or in this Act, or in the patents mentioned in the preamble of this Act, the Commissioner of Patents may, within six months after the passing of this Act, receive petitions for the making of, and, if in his discretion he thinks proper, may grant orders under section 7 of the said chapter 46, that such patents, or any of them, instead of being subject to the conditions set forth in paragraph (a) of section 4 of the said chapter 46, or in this Act, shall be subject to the conditions set forth in paragraphs (a), (b), (c) and (d) of the said section 7.

And in the last clause provision is very properly made that:

3. If, in the period between the expiry of two years from the date of each of the said patents and the twelfth day of January, 1907, any person, other than any licensee, has commenced to manufacture, use and sell in Canada any of the patented inventions covered by the said patents respectively, such person may continue to manufacture, use and sell such invention in as full and ample a manner as if this Act had not been passed; provided that this exemption shall not extend to any person who, without the consent of the holder of such patent, has commenced the construction and manufacture of the said invention before the expiry of the patent.

That is rather an extraordinary clause to be inserted in this Bill. It seems to me that if conditions have arisen making it necessary for the patentee to hold in his own right these patents which he seeks legislation to vest in him beyond question, that right is a matter which should come before the courts to decide, just as the courts would decide with reference to rights under any other patent if this House had not legalized it by an Act of Parliament, as they suggest that we should do here. These are questions that will, no doubt, be carefully considered by the committee, and the House will be given the fullest possible information before we are asked to pass the third reading. It will be understood, I hope, that in passing the second reading the House will in no sense be committed to the principle that this Bill is one which we ought to pass.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—The hon. gentleman, holding the decided views which he has, and having expressed them on every occasion on which this question arose, should attend the committee himself and avoid any difficulty afterwards. If he were to attend that committee he could place these views before them. The committee know nothing about these points.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I cannot follow everything which has been said by the hon. senator from Belleville or the hon. gentleman from Toronto, who has just spoken, as to the necessity and propriety of these matters being the subject of inquiry. The only way in which they can be investigated is to refer them to the committee where evidence can be offered to establish the facts. It is not for me to discuss the measure in advance. I was only asked to take charge of the Bill in the absence of the hon. senator in whose name it appears, and only partial instructions on the subject were given me; but the facts will be established before the Bill proceeds further.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Three p.m. tomorrow.

THE SENATE.

OTTAWA, Thursday, February 28, 1907.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

ROYAL VICTORIA LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE ON BANKING AND COMMERCE.

Hon. Sir GEORGE DRUMMOND, from the Committee on Banking and Commerce, reported Bill (37) An Act respecting the Royal Victoria Life Insurance Company.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—I move that this Bill be read the third time to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH—I have received letters from some of the shareholders of this company, inquiring with regard to this Bill. I only heard of the measure last night, and I sent copies of the Bill to these parties. I ask the hon. gentleman if he will postpone the third reading for Wednesday next, to enable me to get replies from these parties ?

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—I shall not be here on Wednesday next. When a Bill is passed unanimously by a committee, as this one was, there is no reason why it should be delayed.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH—In the face of that, I move, in amendment, that the Bill be read a third time on Tuesday or Wednesday next. I should like to meet the convenience of the hon. gentleman, but I should also like to have an opportunity to hear from the shareholders, who asked me to have the consideration of the Bill delayed until they could see a copy of it. I would fix some day convenient for the hon. gentleman, but it would have to be some day later than to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—I would like to comply with the hon. gentleman's wishes, but as I am not to be here next week, the matter would be in an awkward position. Besides that, the shareholders and everybody else have had plenty of time to look over the Bill. It has been before this House and before parliament for a very long time, and it is somewhat surprising that the shareholders should ask for the postponement of a third reading after the Bill has passed through all the other stages.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I think the request of my hon. friend from Lindsay (Hon. Mr. McHugh) is a reasonable one. He stated that certain individuals have written him with regard to the Bill, and he has only been able to procure copies and send them by yesterday's mail. He cannot possibly have an answer before Monday or Tuesday, and cannot know what the views of these gentlemen are. We will promise the hon. gentleman from St. Boniface, if he has to go west, that we will see that his Bill gets a third reading on Wednesday next, unless there are some very cogent reasons why it should not receive its third reading. He need not be afraid to go away. I have pleasure in seconding the motion of the hon. gentleman.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—I am surprised at such a request at the present time. The Bill has been before parliament for a long time, and nobody seemed to have taken any particular interest in it; but at the last moment it is requested that the third reading should be postponed. I consent on the understanding that on Wednesday next no advantage will be taken of my absence.

THE BATTERIES BELOW QUEBEC.

INQUIRY WITHDRAWN.

The notice of motion being called :

By the Hon. Mr. LANDRY—

That he will inquire of the government—

How many guns has the government bought, up to this date, for the batteries which are to be built in the parish of Beaumont, below Quebec ?

Are these guns all of the same calibre, and what is it ?

If they are of different calibres, what are these calibres, and how many pieces are there of each of these different calibres ?

What is the range of these guns ?

What is the distance between the Beaumont batteries and—

(a) the buoy on the Ile Madame shoal ?

(b) the Bellechasse islands lighthouse ?

(c) the buoy opposite Grosse Ile quarantine station ?

How much did the guns intended for the Beaumont batteries cost ?

When did they arrive at Quebec ?

Were they unloaded directly from the ship at Quebec, or was it necessary to take them to Montreal, and then bring them back again by railway to Quebec ?

Why this roundabout way ?

Where are they at present ? At Beaumont or at Quebec ?

If at Quebec, are they still on the wharfs or have they been unloaded ?

Are they exposed to the air, or are they under shelter from its inclemencies, and what sort of building protects them against damp, rain or snow ?

Who is the officer specially responsible for their preservation in good order ?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I have been furnished with the particulars asked for, and as they are of a confidential nature, I wish to drop this inquiry.

The motion was dropped.

OLD AGE PENSIONS.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I observe the question of old age pensions is being discussed in other places. I desire to inquire :

1. Have the government had this matter under consideration ?
2. Whether a Bill dealing with this or any similar object has been prepared ?
3. Whether the government propose to introduce any legislation on the subject during this session ?
4. Whether, if such a Bill as above referred to, has been prepared, the government will cause it to be laid on the table for the information of the House ?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The matter to which my hon. friend has alluded is one of no common interest and no common importance. I have no doubt myself that within a comparatively short space of time this question of old age pensions, or a somewhat similar question, will most undoubtedly be engaging the attention of many legislatures, as indeed it has already in the mother country and in several of our sister colonies. I am free to admit that I have always regarded the case of honest, industrious men who have for many years led a life of toil, and at the end of their lives find themselves either by accident or misfortune, or some other cause of a similar kind, thrown on the charity of their neighbours or their relatives, as pre-eminently deserving the compassion and consideration of everybody, and if it were possible to confine the question of old age pensions to that particular class, I do not know that I, and I dare say that many other people would be of the same opinion, would object to introducing some such measure. But this is a subject to which I have given for a considerable space of time a good deal of attention. It is pre-eminently a question on which there are two sides. The one side is the side I have presented ; the other side, which undoubtedly deserves our most serious consideration, is this—what would be the effect of a scheme of old age pensions on the community at large? How far would it discourage thrift ? How far would it discourage self-reliance ; and, what is quite as important if such a scheme were adopted, how would it affect the working men themselves ? My own impression is that, in a great many cases, such a scheme would be found to encourage extravagance, and the result would be that the thrifty, industrious working man would find himself compelled ultimately to bear the burden of his less industrious and possibly dissolute companion. I may observe in passing, that this question of old age pensions, although it is sometimes confounded with it, has nothing, in my judgment, to do with the case of pensions awarded to civil or military servants of any government. That stands on different ground ; may be defended on wholly different grounds, and may be regarded more as part of their wages than as a direct pension. As regards old age pensions there is one exception, I admit. I can understand in the case of old and densely peopled countries, where a large proportion of the population are leading a life from hand to mouth ; where there is practically no margin, that statesmen may find themselves or think themselves compelled to adopt some such expedient, although, even there, I am strongly of opinion that the experiment is dubious, and, at the best, can only be regarded as a temporary expedient dealing with the effect and not with the cause. Fortunately for us in Canada, I think I am justified in saying, and I think the experience of my colleagues here and elsewhere will bear me out, there is very little risk of any hardworking, industrious, able bodied man not being able to make an adequate provision for his old age, if only an opportunity were given to him. I say if only an opportunity be given to him. For myself, I trust we shall never see a state of things in Canada such as I have alluded to, where a large proportion of our population would be in such a condition as I have described, though I think we might very well take precautions now, while the circumstances of our people are wonderfully good as compared with those of people in other countries with which I have any acquaintance, to prevent the chance of the occurrence of any disastrious conditions. Speaking for myself alone, and in no sense speaking in this matter for my colleagues or other parties, I doubt extremely the expediency of having recourse to a system of old age pensions, but I do believe there is a great opportunity for the state to avail itself of the machinery at its disposal for the purpose of placing within the grasp of every industrious man in Canada the opportunity, at an easy rate, and at very small cost to the state, of providing a reasonable annuity for his support at an advanced period of life. I say more ; not only do I believe that this can be done practically without cost, or at an infinitesimal cost to the state—infinitesimal that is to say, in proportion to the benefits to be bestowed—but I believe that some such scheme would attain an end of very great national importance, and meet a great want which is now felt, and which will be more and more felt from time to time as we grow in wealth and importance, and as there are larger numbers of our people engaged in what may be called daily wage earning occupations. I think it is in the power of the state to help every man to provide for his old age at a very small sacrifice. It is quite true that any scheme of that kind, if it is to have a large and general application, must provide of necessity three things, otherwise no great measure of success can be hoped for from it ; it must, in my judgment, first of all be an absolutely safe scheme ; it must be a scheme which will inspire confidence in the class whom we particularly desire to reach ; it must be a scheme in which there is, humanly speaking, no possibility of the man who invests his money by any chance being deprived of the fruits of his investments. In the second place, there would be required in such a scheme, particularly if applied to the class of daily wage-earners, what I call an absolute freedom from forfeiture. Anybody who is acquainted with the habits of our working classes and the position in which they stand, must know that there is no scheme which would be of practical use to them if they are compelled, on pain of forfeiture, to make a monthly, weekly, quarterly, or any other kind of payment from year to year. There are periods at which they cannot make any payments, and, in such a scheme, it would be necessary to provide that if, from any cause, payments were intermitted at any time, the parties who were taking advantage of the state provision should be allowed, under proper conditions, and on payment of a reasonably moderate interest, to resume when times were better, the payments to which I have alluded. But, in any case, it would be also necessary that no creditor could under any circumstances lay his clutches on an old age annuity ; that no dependent or child could be able to cajole the right to use the annuity from its possessor, and in the third place, it would be necessary that there should be no power of anticipation ; that the party who gets it must be content to take it on that condition, and also, that in case he died before the period at which only the annuity would be proposed to be given, that his heirs would receive the money he had paid with reasonable interest thereon. There is no possibility of any corporation affording all these things to parties who desire to obtain annuities. As a matter of fact, I have carefully examined the records of the insurance companies as contained in the reports of our insurance officers, and I find that there are practically no annuities now being taken out in Canada; nor do I believe that under existing conditions there ever would be, particularly by wage-earners, and for this obvious reason ; no wage-earner of the ordinary kind desiring to make such an investment at an early age, could feel absolute certainty that an ordinary corporation, no matter how well managed it might be, no matter how solvent it might be at that particular moment, would be equally solvent and equally well managed twenty, thirty or forty years thereafter. As I said, these things can only be secured by the state. The working man can trust the state, and nobody else, and as a matter of fact I do not believe he would trust anybody else.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I would ask the hon. gentleman, are we to understand a discussion is going to take place on this question? This is quite irregular.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—It is somewhat irregular, but my hon. friend has asked a question which I can only answer in this irregular way. I am aware it is not precisely in order, but I suppose I could place myself in order by moving the adjournment of the House. Does the hon. gentleman desire me to do that ?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—No, we will move the adjournment of the discussion until to-morrow.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I may say to the Senate that this is a subject on which I think we can, with the time at our disposal, very well afford to give a few minutes, even if we do slightly transgress the strict etiquette of the situation. This is not a party measure in any shape or form.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—I wish the same courtesy had been extended to me in regard to the question I brought up last week. Inasmuch as we have so much time to spare, the question I introduced might have been discussed instead of being shelved sine die.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I think this is perhaps a little more germane to the interests of the people of Canada than the acquisition of the north pole. But that is a matter of opinion.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—It might be a matter of opinion.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It is not so refreshing.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I place myself at the disposal of the House. If hon. gentlemen do not desire me to proceed, I can find another opportunity for concluding my remarks.

Some hon. GENTLEMEN—Go on.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The question is, what results can reasonably be promised, and at what cost can they be obtained ? As I say, I have bestowed some consideration on this matter. I am not speaking at random ; I am not speaking without calculation and not without having my calculations carefully revised by some of the best actuaries in Canada. If the state will provide the machinery—and it can do that very cheaply indeed—if the state is willing to allow from three and one-half to three and three-quarters per cent—and I am making this statement after careful calculation,—taking the present average of wages which prevails in Canada, allowing for the average duration of life, in the classes with whom we will chiefly deal, I say these results can be obtained. If any man chooses, when he comes of age, to put aside the wage of one or one and one-half hours per week, or one half day per month, I say that the state could afford when that man attained to the age of 60, to guarantee him an annuity of $120 a year, or if he would accept a deferred annuity commencing at 65, of $200 a year, all payments ceasing at the age of 60. Of course I need not point out to hon. gentlemen here that larger payment would produce larger results, and that in the other case, of commencing at a later age, the payments would be proportionately larger than the one I have taken for the moment, as what may be called the unit of calculation. Some hon. gentlemen may think that these are rather better terms than can be granted without a considerable drain on the public chest. These are not very much better terms than would be given by an ordinary insurance company, but the reason why I think, and why some parties whom I have consulted think, that better terms can be given, are chiefly these three. First of all, the state wants to make no profit out of a transaction of this kind ; whereas any ordinary corporation, in the natural course of things, would require to make a reasonable profit. In the next place, there would be a certain gain by death or by parties dropping out, although, as I have said, in those cases re-payment would be made on certain terms, and I think it is also pretty well ascertained, that, in the case of a great many wage-earners, the duration of life is considerable shorter than it is in the case of persons engaged in other occupations. That, however, is a matter of no very immediate importance, because the utmost difference between what I have suggested now, and what might be required, would probably be a bare quarter of one per cent, if that much. As to minor details in this matter, undoubtedly it would be highly desirable that the mode of payment should be made easy, so that the parties, if they like, could pay up in a lump sum or in short instalments over five, ten, twenty years, or in any way most convenient to them. If some such scheme were ever adopted by the government of Canada, I would suggest, as is the case in England, in the matter of savings banks or the like, that funds should be ear-marked, placed in the hands of commissioners and held specially devoted to these purposes, not that I think it would add materially to the security, but because in dealing with the classes we wish to reach, some such step as that would be acceptable; also it would be necessary to limit the annuity to a certain maximum. Now by creating a very small bureau, and by utilizing the existing machinery which we possess, this can be done for an extremely small cost, and the public would be repaid ten fold, perhaps a hundred fold over if the scheme proved a success. I admit that this is designed chiefly for the benefit of daily wage-earners; still it would necessarily be available for all citizens, farmers, tradesmen, professional men, or for their wives and children, and in short for all those who chose to avail themselves of it, up to the maximum limit that I have explained. If this were properly explained and properly understood, I am of opinon that it might be widely used. Of course this is a project which would need the aid of the press, would need the aid of the pulpit, and, perhaps, would need the aid of large employers of labour and all who are interested in promoting the welfare of the wage-earner. The Bill to which my hon. friend refers, and which has been mentioned in the lower House as well as in this place, was drafted to empower the government to grant annuities only—and this I would call the attention of the House to—does not interfere in any shape or way with the present system of insurance. It does return a certain portion of the money paid, and certain interest on it, but it does not interfere with insurance. Whatever may be thought of the scheme of state insurance, it has no place or connection with this, good, bad or indifferent. My own impression is that those who would use this scheme would not use the other, and vice versa. As to the field, it may interest the hon. gentleman to know what we have at this moment, according to the last 'Gazette' return placed in my hand, some $61,000,000, and a little over in the government savings banks, or in the post office savings bank, bearing an interest of 3 per cent, and that we have something like 200,000 depositors, as I am informed. A comparatively moderate amount of this would go very far to place such a scheme, if they chose to invest their money in that way, instead of holding it in the savings bank at 3 per cent, and this alone would go a long way to make it a success. As to the political side of it, every hon. gentleman present can see that this scheme, if carried out, would interest thousands, it may be hundreds of thousands of people in the stability of the government. It would have the advantage that it would present the government to these men's mind in a somewhat better light than that of a mere tax-collector. Ultimately, too, it might cause the bulk or a very large portion of our national debt to be held in Canada which would be incidentally an advantage. These, of course, are mere minor, incidental benefits. The chief advantage is what I have stated, that it would enable all wage-earners, by a moderate sacrifice, to make an effectual provision for their old age, and would guard them against the swindling projects by which many of them have been deluded into making sacrifices they could ill afford, only to wake up in their old age to find themselves destitute. I regret the rules of this House prevent me from introducing a measure of this kind here. It has to be introduced in the lower House. I can, as my hon. friend requested, lay the draft Bill on the table of the House if the House so desires, but it must be distinctly understood that it is only as a draft Bill; that the government are not committed to it, and that it is merely laid on the table for the purpose of being useful in the discussion, and is subject, even if adopted, to alteration and amendment in any shape. If my hon. friend and the House desire, there can be no particular objection to placing the draft on the table of the House for those purposes, and I have no objection to do so.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Middlesex)—If I may be permitted to shelter myself under the wing of the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, I should like to offer an observation or two on the subject he has brought before the House with so much clearness. I am in favour of the general principle of any measure either here or in the lower House, that would tend to cultivate thrift among the people of Canada.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I rise to a question of order. I think it has been an extremely irregular course that has been pursued on an inquiry of this kind, for the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce to deliver a prepared and academic speech as he has done, more particularly as a discussion upon it cannot be carried on without a further breach of order, and inasmuch as the members of the House have had no notice whatever that any such discussion was going to be introduced. If we are going to have a discussion of this kind, the notice should be in such a form as to indicate what was coming before us. I think the House has been taken advantage of very unfairly by the hon. gentleman from Wellington and the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce. Those who knew what was intended had an opportunity to prepare their speeches which others had not.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Does the hon. gentleman object to spontaneous light on the subject ?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I do not hear the hon. gentleman at all, and I press my point of order.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—I move the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I think the House is ready to hear everything that is to be said on the subject.

The SPEAKER—I think no discussion can take place on such a question being put.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have a distinct recollection, in the early history of the Senate, of general discussions arising on questions of this kind simply by the courtesy of the House. It may be technically contrary to the rules, but, certainly, my remembrance of similar questions is that a fair discussion was permitted. I do not think it has ever been shut off in the way indicated.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The method that has been adopted in this House for the last few years is according to Bourinot. He states :

> The more regular, and now the more common practice is for a member, in cases requiring some discussion, to give notice that he will call attention to a certain fact.

If the hon. gentleman, instead of placing his question on the order paper in the way it is, had called attention to certain facts and then said, 'I will inquire,' then the notice being brought to the attention of the House, everybody would be prepared for the discussion ; but it is not regular to bring the matter up in this way, and we cannot move the adjournment of the House, because it is not in the form it should have been.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—The notice says 'I desire to inquire if the government had this matter under consideration.' It is an inquiry.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman did not catch my remarks. I know it is an inquiry, and it is precisely because it is an inquiry that we cannot discuss it. If he had said that he called the attention of the House to certain facts and would inquire, then the question could be discussed. That is the practice laid down in Bourinot.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Rule 39 says :

> No debate is in order on a mere inquiry ; but explanatory remarks may be made by the senator making the inquiry, and by the minister or other senator answering the same. Observations upon any such answer are not allowed.

The course pursued by the hon. gentleman, and the hon. minister who replied, has put the whole House at a disadvantage. It is only those who knew that the debate was coming on who would be prepared. We are all at a disadvantage, and I do not think it is proper and fair that the House should be so treated. It would not be in order to continue the discussion on a motion of adjournment of the House, neither can the debate be adjourned.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I can assure the House that I had no intention, in putting the question, of placing any member of the House in a position where he could not speak. I have heard questions discussed in the House before, and I understood that by putting a question of this kind the discussion would be permitted, because I have heard questions discussed before. I can assure every hon. gentlemen of the House that I had no intention of preventing any hon. member from expressing his views on the subject.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—In order that we may hear what my hon. friend from Middlesex has to say, I move the adjournment of the House.

The SPEAKER—If the hon. gentleman would allow me, I have decided on the point of order, and I should have mentioned the sections upon which I based my decision. They are as follows :—

21. When a senator wishes to give notice of an inquiry or motion, he reduces the notice to writing, signs it, reads it from his place during a sitting of the Senate, and hands it in at the clerk's table.

The rule does not apply to motions with respect to Bills nor to motions dealing with reports of committees, nor to formal routine, subsidiary or incidential motions, notice of which when necessary, may be given by word of mouth, or by any means which places such motions among the orders or on the notice paper for any day.

Rule 39.—No debate is in order on a mere inquiry ; but explanatory remarks may be made by the senator, making the inquiry and by the minister or other senator answering the same. Observations upon any such answer are not allowed.

Rule 40.—When it is intended to make a statement or raise a discussion on asking a question, the senator having such intention, as part of the notice under rule 21, gives notice that he will call attention to the matter inquired into.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Middlesex)—If I may be allowed to interpose here, I think perhaps a discussion at another stage would serve a better purpose. I am under the impression, from the remarks of the hon. minister, that the question is a deeply interesting one, and I shall take the proper and ordinary course of giving such notice as will enable me to offer observations I might wish to make, and then other hon. gentlemen, perhaps, who are interested in the question will assist in throwing additional light on it. Thanking my hon. friend for the courtesy of giving me an opportunity to speak, I shall postpone my remarks to another occasion.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—With the permission of the House I withdraw my motion to adjourn.

TEMISCOUATA RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.

AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN.

Hon. Mr. TESSIER (in the absence of Hon. Mr. Casgrain, de Lanaudière), moved concurrence in the amendments made by the Standing Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours to Bill (V) An Act respecting the Temiscouata Railway Company.

The motion was concurred in.

Hon. Mr. TESSIER moved the third reading of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The motion is not in order.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The Bill cannot be read to-day. It is not on the orders for third reading to-day.

Hon. Mr. TESSIER—If there is any objection, I move the third reading for to-morrow.

The SPEAKER—In the meantime I will look into the matter.

The motion was agreed to.

INTERCOLONIAL AND PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND RAILWAYS EMPLOYEES PROVIDENT FUND BILL POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being called :

House again in Committee of the Whole on Bill (68) an Act to establish the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island Railways employees' provident fund.—(Rt. Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.)

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—There is a mistake here. I moved that this order be fixed for Tuesday next, as I wanted time to confer with the minister as to some of the objections raised by my hon. friends. I might mention incidentally to the leader of the opposition that I called the special attention of the Minister of Railways to the objection taken by him to the exclusion of ladies from the benefits of the Act, and I have his personal assurance that he will be delighted to embrace all desirable females in the Act.

The motion was agreed to.

MILITIA ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

The Order of the Day being called :

Second reading Bill (T) An Act to amend the Militia Act as regards the calling out of the Active Militia in aid of the Civil Power.—(Hon. Mr. David.)

Hon. Mr. DAVID—I had about given up the idea of proceeding with this order to-day, but I shall do whatever the leader of the House may suggest.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—My suggestion would be to drop the Bill.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—I cannot do that; therefore I shall proceed with the Bill. Hon. gentlemen will see that when I am convinced that I am right, I persevere. What has been said in this House, and what has been published in the newspapers in the whole country, instead of modifying my ideas have confirmed me in the faith and in the belief that I was right when, three years ago, I moved an amendment to the Railway Act to amend the sections connected with the calling out of the militia in cases of riots, strikes or disturbances. I am more convinced than ever that it is a question which deserves the attention of public men and all who take an interest in the welfare and prosperity of Canada, and wish to remove all causes of friction and everything which impede or prevent the progress and development of the country. In spite of all the measures which have been taken, and which are being taken now throughout the world, to improve the condition of the workingman ; in spite of the Conciliation and Arbitration Bills which are being discussed in the House of Commons, and which will be submitted to the Senate before long, I have no hesitation in saying that we cannot remove for ever all causes of friction ; and, as it has been well put by one of the newspapers which discussed that question, the Ottawa 'Citizen', the growth of our population, the progress of our industries, and the great works which are being contemplated, and which are now under construction, will necessarily increase the possibilities of friction such as I have spoken of, and render it more and more necessary to have recourse to the militia in certain circumstances. That is a reason why we should do everything in our power to make the laws connected with the calling out of the militia as just and wise and equitable as possible. But I need not go over the whole question, which is a very important one ; I want to speak of the amendments which I wish to make to the Militia Act. There are two sections especially which I want to amend and which have been recognized by those who have considered the question, as being very important. The first is section 82. In the Revised Statutes of Canada, section 82 of the old statute has been divided into two.

They are the clauses by which power is vested in the judge, to call out the militia when the mayor of the municipality refuses or neglects to do so.

It means that in any organized municipality, when the mayor refuses or neglects to call out the militia, a single judge—I call the attention of the hon. gentlemen to this point—can call out the militia without the consent of the mayor or any person representing the municipality, and the consequence is that in such cases, even when the militia are called out against the will of the municipality, the municipality is nevertheless obliged to pay the expenses involved in calling them out.

I ask the hon. gentlemen of this House, if it is just and proper, in such a case, to make the municipality pay ? I have no hesitation in saying that it is an injustice and that the law should be modified, and I want to modify it in this way. In my amendment I asked that where the mayor refuses to sign a requisition to call out the militia, that the militia may be called out by a judge, a magistrate who has, in that place, under the Criminal Code the power of two or more justices of the peace, and a justice of the peace in order that in such case one of the officials may be a recorder, or a magistrate having the power of two or more justices of the peace. Then the words are added 'and with a justice of the peace'. I think that will furnish more security, if the requisition is signed by a judge and a man who is accustomed to exercise criminal jurisdiction, like a recorder. Hon. gentlemen who are afraid that the modifications which I intended to make would have the effect of inducing the municipalities to call out the militia without sufficient cause, will have no objection to my amendment, because the effect of it will be to safeguard the municipality and the government against the militia being called out without a sufficient cause. Whether the law remains as it is as to the payment of the militia or whether the amendment proposed by my Bill will be adopted or not, in any case I think the first amendment, which I have just discussed, should be adopted in the interests of the municipality as well as the interests of the government. Now I come to the second amendment. Section 89 of the Revised Statutes provides that, in any case when the militia is called out, whether it is called by the municipality or not, whether the requisition is signed by the mayor or not, the municipality is obliged to pay the expense, and whether the permanent force is used or not makes no difference. I call the attention of the hon. gentlemen to this point ; that whether the permanent force is employed or not the municipality has no discretion, and they are obliged to pay. Suppose a riot or disturbance took place in a very small municipality composed of a few hundred people, either in one of the lower provinces or west, it makes no difference, or whether the disturbance took place on a public work, government property, or railway works, the municipality is obliged to pay, and in certain cases, the riot may take place in a harbour which extends from one municipality into another, or it may extend along the front of many municipalities. If the requisition is signed by the mayor, or by the persons authorized to sign the requisition in one of the municipalities, that municipality is obliged to pay the militia. There are many cases that could be cited to show that the law may be very unjust in its application to certain municipalities. There are cases like the celebrated Guibord case in Montreal, where the militia was called out on the occasion of the interment of Guibord. The trouble came from people living outside of the limits of the municipality, and the trouble which was anticipated was to come along the route of the funeral procession from people living in the adjoining municipalities, St. John Baptiste, St. Louis and other municipalities. Although the trouble in that case did not come from the people living in the district of Montreal the city was obliged to pay the cost of the services of the militia. I ask whether it was just in such a case to force the city of Montreal to pay the cost of the militia ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That was more than thirty years ago.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—I am speaking of Montreal, because I know more of what took place there than elsewhere. On the occasion of the longshoremen's strike a riot took place in the harbour of Montreal. A requisition was made by the city of Montreal, to call out the militia. The disturbances took place not only in front of the city of Montreal, but in front of Maisonneuve and Long Point, but because the requisition was signed by the mayor and two magistrates of Montreal the city was obliged to pay $20,000 for the use of the militia on that occasion. If I were to cite all the cases in which there was an evident injustice to the municipalities in forcing them to pay, I would take up too much time. I will cite only a few cases. In the majority of those cases the disturbances took place on public works, on railways, canals or government works. It was very seldom that disturbances took place on account of the by-laws of a municipality. In 1876 a disturbance took place on the Grand Trunk Railway at Belleville, and the militia was called out. In 1877 riots took place amongst labourers on the enlargment of the Lachine canal at Cote St. Paul. In 1878 disturbances occurred on the Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa and Occidental Railway, in order to give possession of the road to the province or the government. Three or four municipalities were interested. In 1880 detachments were called out for service at Long Point and Port Dover, Norfolk country, Ontario, on account of anticipated riots in connection with prize fights projected by foreigners. In 1884 disturbances took place between labourers employed on the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway. In 1903 the whole of the Montreal division was on duty for some weeks at the entrance of the harbour on account of riots resulting from the strike of longshoremen. The harbour is government property, untaxable, and in fact a national port. The east end of the harbour extends for several miles beyond the city's eastern limit. In many instances there was a good deal of discussion and contestation, and the government did not know what to do. I could not get all the information which I wanted. I could get the information about the payments of the militia when called out in a few instances, but I do not scruple to say that in many cases the government itself was obliged to recognize that they could not exact the whole cost of the services of the militia and that in many instances they were obliged to settle the bill, the municipality paying only part of the cost. In the Hamilton case, the account was sent to the municipality. The municipality refused to pay, and the government consented to reduce the bill by fifty per cent, thus adopting for the first time the principle that the municipality should not pay, at least for the services of the permanent force. I take advantage of that precedent to prove that this is a corroboration of my assertion, that the law is very imperfect, because in a great many cases the government cannot discriminate. I think that supports my contention that the law should be amended, because it cannot be carried out as it is. I say that the present law is unjust and very dangerous. It is very dangerous, because a poor municipality, having reason to fear that if they call out the militia they will have to pay a heavy bill of costs beyond its means, rather than become liable for such an expenditure, will refuse to call out the militia. I have no hesitation in saying that that refusal or delay may be the cause of great mischief and bloodshed and damage to property and persons. When the matter came before the House of Commons, the Prime Minister was obliged to admit that in the Buckingham riot if the militia had been called out two days sooner there would have been no bloodshed. I shall now answer the principal objection which has been made. It has been asserted that this is a municipal or a provincial question. I am ready to admit that as regards the common peace and order, the provinces and the municipalities have the power to organize a police force in order to maintain the peace ; but when the peace is disturbed to such an extent that it is necessary to apply to the federal government and to put into operation the federal laws on the subject, I think it ceases to be a municipal question, and that it then becomes a federal matter. The only militia authorized by the constitution is federal. The provinces have no militia ; the law does not recognize any militia organized by the provinincial government. The parliament of Canada has passed laws on the question of riots and disturbances, and for the calling out of the militia and by that fact has recognized the obligation of acceeding to the requisition of the local authority when there is trouble in the municipality. The laws which the militia is called upon to uphold are federal laws, not laws of the municipality, because, as I said before, in almost all cases the disturbances take place in the enforcement of federal laws, and not municipal by-laws. Therefore, I say that if by virtue of the constitution the government is obliged to supply the militia when it is called out by the municipalities in cases of riots, disturbances and strikes, those services may be gratuitous, because the militia is maintained by the country and it costs a great sum of money every year. The country spends three or four millions for the maintenance of the militia, and the government is not obliged to employ the militia. The government has a permanent force which they may employ if they like. As I said before, the government have at their disposal two or three thousand men belonging to the permanent force. If the number is not sufficient they should place themselves in a position to respond to requisitions which may be made upon them by municipalities, because it is their duty to give the municipality the help which is asked for. I inquired from people who were in a position to inform me, and have been informed that in the United States the municipalities never pay for such service in cases of riots and disturbances and if they disburse moneys in connection with those disturbances and riots they are reimbursed by the federal government or state government. No body denies that in cases of insurrection, the government is obliged to supply the militia force required. As was stated by the Ottawa 'Citizen,' the difference between an insurrection and a riot is very slight, and very often a riot is only the beginning of an insurrection. For all these reasons, I think the amendments which I have proposed should be adopted. The hon. members will remark that my amendments will apply only to municipalities organized as towns and cities and as regards the signing of the requisition and that, I propose that all municipalities, rural or not, be exempt from paying, but that towns and cities will be obliged to supply the lodging to the militia called out. Perhaps I should immediately answer the legal objections which may be made, that it is a money Bill. I contend that it is not a money Bill. What does the constitution say on this subject ?

Bills for appropriating any part of the public revenue or for imposing any tax or impost shall originate in the House of Commons.

I contend that in this case there will be no appropriation of the public revenue, or imposition of any tax or impost. Because the municipalities would be exempt in future from paying the expenses in connection with the calling out of the militia it does not follow necessarily that there will be a charge upon the people of the country or an appropriation of the revenue. In order to raise that question of the constitutionality of the Bill, it would be necessary to be in a position to affirm that the effect of the Bill is clearly to impose a charge upon the people or appropriate a part of the revenue. Nobody can show that, but I have a right to say that the government will not be obliged to pay if they do what they ought to do—if they employ the permanent force. I have a right to say that in all cases they may use the permanent force, and if the permanent force is not sufficient, it is not the fault of the municipality. The government has only one thing to do, and that is to appropriate a little more every year, and the Senate will not refuse to give them what may be necessary to provide an adequate force. The argument that the Bill might indirectly affect the revenue is not sufficiently forcible to deprive the Senate of its jurisdiction and the right to discuss and pass such a Bill. If such a principle were adopted—if because a Bill may have the effect of increasing the expenditure in connection with the department were sufficient to take away from the Senate its jurisdiction, what would be the result? Probably twelve out of every twenty Bills which we pass affect the revenue, and the Senate could not pass a Bill to reorganize or improve a department. I am sure if I had time to go through the Acts passed by parliament in the last 10 or 20 years I could find a great many of that character, because, in many cases, the Senate has passed Bills to improve a department declaring it to be necessary to make certain changes, and would the objection, that the passing of such Bill would have the effect of obliging the government to increase the number of employees, be sufficient to deprive this House of its jurisdiction? I am supported to a certain extent on this point by Bourinot.

It is evident that his opinion was that it does not pertain to the Senate to raise the objection. When there is a serious doubt, it is not for the Senate to declare that it has no jurisdiction in matters of this kind, especially when it cannot be affirmed positively that the effect of a Bill will be to impose a charge or increase the public expenditure. The simple supposition is not sufficient to take away from the Senate its jurisdiction and its right to consider such a Bill. Let the House of Commons raise the objection if they like, but the Senate, instead of curtailing its privileges, should extend them and not be the first to raise such an objection.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I expressed my views on this question at an earlier stage. Every one must feel that the hon. gentleman from Mille Iles has done his duty by this Bill: He has taken pains to have it carefully drafted, and he has put the arguments in favour of his view before the House in a very clear and satisfactory way. Whether he has persuaded hon. gentlemen to agree with him or not, is a question I cannot answer. With respect to the last point that the hon. gentlemen dealt with, that is the question as to whether or not this Bill is ultra vires, I have not any very strong impression. I agree with the view taken by the hon. gentleman, that the Senate, instead of trying to minimize its power should rather take the other line. I do not propose to say anything about that, but I do wish to make an observation on what the hon. gentleman said with respect to the permanent force. The hon. gentleman being aware—because the point came up at an earlier stage—that the bulk of the permanent force was employed in doing garison duty in some two or three important places, I mean important from a military point of view, knows that they would not be available for the kind of duty for which he wishes to use them. He contends that if the permanent force is not strong enough, we should make it stronger. If you are going to increase the permanent force to such an extent that you will have details of it within easy reach of all places in Canada, where industrial trouble is likely to arise, that would mean a large increase in that force, and an exceedingly large increase in the sum paid by the country for militia purposes. I think the sum which we now pay is quite large enough. The proposition that you should not employ the ordinary militia, but should keep a part of the permanent force within easy reach, is one that would not meet with the approval of this House or I assume of the people generally. The attitude which the hon. gentleman has taken with respect to the calling out of the militia does not seem to me to be quite consistent with itself. The first amendment which the hon. gentleman proposes, would make it more difficult to call out the militia. I do not think it is necessary to dwell on that. The law as it is provides that the mayor or warden, together with two justices of the peace, or in the event of these authorities not acting, a judge may act. The hon. gentleman proposes in the clause which he suggests as an additional clause to section 83, to substitute this provision:

If the official head of the municipality refuses to act or is unable to act, by any county court or district court judge who has jurisdiction in that place, acting together with any judge or magistrate who, under the Criminal Code, has in that place the power of two or more justices of the peace, and with a justice of the peace.

Hon. gentlemen will see, you must have not only a judge, but you must have with him a magistrate who has the power of two justices of the peace, and also a justice of the peace. That means at least three persons, and in case there is a riot which has reached an acute stage, the requirement that so many parties must sign the request for the militia would involve delay which might have serious results.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—This will apply only to municipalities. It will give more guarantee to the government that the militia will not be called out without all necessary precautions being taken.

Hon. Mr. POWER—As a general thing, the militia have not been called out too soon. I have not heard of any cases where it is contended that the militia should not have been called out. There are cases where they need not have been called out if the civil powers had done their duty. The effect of this amendment is to make it more difficult to call out the militia. Then the hon. gentleman took the ground that, in certain cases, bloodshed would have been prevented if the militia had been called out sooner. He proposes to put difficulties in the way of calling out the militia, and then he contends that on some occasions the militia were not called out soon enough. I take the view which I expressed when the Bill was before the House at its first stage. The main thing is that the civil authorities shall do their duty. It is their duty to keep the peace within the limit of the municipality; and they should have no inducement to neglect to do their duty. We know that in the case of Hamilton the civil authorities did neglect their duty. If they had taken prompt and decisive steps at the beginning it would not have been necessary to call out the militia. Therefore, we should not do anything which would tend to hinder the civil power from doing its duty. If this Bill were to become law, the great inducement to the civil powers to suppress riot and disturbance would be taken away, because they would feel that they would not have to foot the bill, and they could let things go and simply have the militia called out and saddle the country with the expense; and we should have the militia called out very frequently under those circumstances. If you take away from the municipal authorities all over the country the inducement to do their duty and keep the peace, then you will have to call out the militia in probably twenty cases for the one case in which they have to be called out now. When you take away from the civil power the obligation to keep the peace themselves under the penalty of paying for the force which is brought to remove the result of their own negligence, then you offer an inducement to the municipal authorities not to do their duty; and I think that would be a most unfortunate thing to have in this country, which is supposed to be governed by law and not by force, the spectacle of the militia called out every time there was a trifling disturbance in a municipality. It would be a most unfortunate thing, highly discreditable to Canada, and most injurious to our reputation. The law now on the statute-book has been practically the law since confederation. It was the law in the provinces of which the confederation was constituted, and we should be very unwise at this day, without some stronger reason than has been given, to do away with that system which, on the whole, has worked very well, and to introduce a system which would be sure not to work well.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not know that I can add anything to what I said a few days ago when this subject came up for discussion. It would be very unwise to make any change. Happily, we live in a community where riots very rarely take place. Where they do, as a rule it has been the fault of the civil authorities in the city or town where they occurred, in not taking action at the proper moment. The instance given, of Hamilton, was entirely due to the supineness of the mayor. The people concerned in it were active voters, and it was approaching the election time and he hesitated to call out the militia. In the instance also to which I referred on the former occasion, at Buckingham, it was entirely due to the civil authorities allowing it to develop in the manner it did, until it got beyond their control. The proposition is simply this : to charge the whole body of the people of Canada with the cost of calling out the militia when in one particular community, owing to the supineness and the laxness of the civil authorities when a (I will not call it a riot) a disturbance begins. Experience shows that, when properly handled, public opinion in this country always controls any action of that kind if taken in the beginning, before people's minds are excited. I think the Bill is one the Senate should not accept. It proposes to transfer a liability from the municipality to the Crown. That is the effect of it—to transfer the responsibility. I do not think the Senate has jurisdiction to that extent. It also provides for the payment, under certain conditions, and makes it a tax on the public revenues of this country which at present does not exist. We surely cannot do that. The hon. gentleman having explained his own views, will scarcely find any considerable number in the Senate, and certainly not in the House of Commons, in accord with the proposal he submits for our consideration. Under these circumstances, I ask the hon. gentleman to withdraw the Bill rather than have it thrown out.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—I regret exceedingly to have to differ from the hon. Secretary of State. I adhere to the opinion which I had formed about this Bill ; I think it is a fair and just measure. The municipality is not the cause of the riot or disturbance which may take place, and that is one reason why the municipality should not be saddled with the expense. There may be, as in the case of Buckingham, a large body of troops required, and it might bankrupt the community to have to pay the cost of maintaining those troops. That is the chief reason why I thought it would be only just that the burden should be transferred to the general mass of the people of Canada. In the case of a strike, the whole people are concerned and not the municipality alone. It is a riot between capital and labour, and no matter what the field of the battle may be, it is certainly not one that a municipality is equitably or justly liable for the expense incurred in calling out the militia. There is another reason, and that is that the prompt calling out of the troops is one means of checking a disturbance. The fact of the municipality having to pay the amount required for the maintenance of these troops is a strong reason why the civic authorities, those who are elected by the popular vote, will hesitate saddling the municipality with such a large expenditure. If the mayor had no fear of incurring the large expense on the people he represents, he would at once have recourse to the militia as a means of putting down the disturbance. I think these are good and valid reasons for some change. Is it fair that a small municipality should be saddled with all this expense when the difficulties may have been transferred from some other section or caused by some interest outside the municipality ? Why should the municipality have to pay it all ? With regard to the militia force, to which the hon. member for Halifax referred, that does not apply. A small body of permanent troops would be sufficient if called out early. They are at the principal cities where strikes are likely to occur, or contiguous to them and therefore the expense would not be so very great in utilizing the permanent force.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I am surprised at the moderation of this Bill. I thought the promoter would have given to the parliament of Canada something more exacting in regard to the duties of the national government in respect to the devolution of duty on the part of the municipality. I am sorry to see that the Bill is not complete in that respect. I think you would have done well to make it plain to the people of Canada that the country as a whole shall be responsible, and alone responsible, for the maintenance of troops required to keep order in any part of this country, especially when such order is to be maintained on behalf of the government and not on behalf of those who are not responsible for causing the trouble. As I have already stated on the floor of this honourable House, a corporation that would be the cause of trouble within its own jurisdiction would have to pay for the results of that disturbance ; but a municipality that, through its administration, by its officers, or through its by-laws, violates no law of this country and does not encourage the violation of any law, that municipality should not be held responsible for the results of disturbance, riot or rebellion. The municipality that has by-laws that are accepted by the community at large as fair and just, and is governed by patriotic men who do not encourage disturbance or riot, should not be called upon to pay the expense of a riot, disturbance or rebellion, because one or two hundred strangers come within its confines and create a row on the borders of a canal, or on a railroad, or at a prize fight, as has happened in Ontario, when the militia were called out to suppress a riot. Was it the municipality that was responsible for the outbreak on that occasion? No. This parliament wishes to proceed on the old, played-out idea, that the municipality in which a disturbance occurs must be responsible and must bear the consequence. I say it is not fair, except on the one ground; that is, if the municipality is the cause directly or indirectly of the riot. If it is not, the general government of Canada is responsible for the maintenance of peace within its borders, just as it is responsible for maintaining the peace along the international boundary. The hon. Secretary of State says that the municipalities are largely responsible for the disturbances that take place. I beg to take issue with him immediately on that point. Was the municipality of Côte des Neiges responsible for the outbreak in 1875, when Guibord was buried, when the entire militia of that district was called out, over 4,000 strong? The entire disturbance took place in a small municipality outside of Montreal. Am I to be told that that little municipality shall be called upon to pay the expense of calling out the militia on that occasion because the disturbance happened to take place in the Côte des Neiges cemetery, situated in a little municipality which, at that time, had not over one hundred families?

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—They did not pay it.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—If such a thing was tolerated in that day we shall not tolerate it now. In the city of Montreal, as the hon. member from Mille Iles has pointed out, we have had the militia called out several hundred strong to keep order on the wharfs on the property of the harbour commission, not on the property or within the confines of the city of Montreal. The militia were there guarding government property, property belonging to the people of Canada, from Vancouver to Halifax, property extending through two or three municipalities; yet, under the law, Montreal was saddled with the entire expense, and that is why we now ask parliament to remedy that state of affairs. It was not fair for the Dominion government to saddle on Montreal the expense of that disturbance. The citizens of Montreal had nothing to do with it, as a corporation or a municipality. The disturbance took place on government property adjacent, it is true, to that of the city of Montreal, and because people were more or less easily led in the council of the city of Montreal, the city was made to carry the burden.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman is in error in saying it is government property. The Harbour Commissioners of Montreal own the property.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I accept the explanation; but the harbour commissioners are under the direct control of the government. Montreal has absolutely nothing to do with the harbour commissioners. The government owns everything in connection with the harbour commission.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman is entirely in error. The property to which he refers is owned by the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal. The government have loaned them money, and the harbour commissioners pay interest on every dollar they get.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I hope they do.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They do. The interest is regularly paid.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—That makes the situation all the worse. Why should the federal authority say to the city of Montreal, 'You shall be responsible for a disturbance on the property of a third party.' The federal government holds the city of Montreal responsible for a disturbance occurring on the property of a neighbour over which it has no control, property on which it pays no taxes.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—Is not the property within the corporation of the city of Montreal?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The property is not within the limits of the city of Montreal, and is not recognized as being within the limits of the city, and we cannot raise one cent of taxes on it. So that the situation pictured by the hon. Secretary of State is still worse. The city of Montreal has to deal with a third corporation which is still smaller than that of the Dominion government. Now that is a position which we do not want to tolerate any longer. I am not only speaking for Montreal, but for the corporation of Maisonneuve and all those municipalities along the river front. How is it the government came to an arbitrary decision to inflict on Montreal the payment of all the expense incurred owing to a disturbance, which took place along the whole of the line of the River St. Lawrence from Montreal down as far as Long Point? That was an arbitrary decision on the part of the government. I think it was unfair. The citizens of Montreal should not be called upon in the future to fulfil an obligation of that kind. Of course if parliament says we have to do it, we must do it, but before doing it we will put our claims before the parliament of Canada to say whether it is fair or just. I am told again that the municipalities are responsible for riots which take place in their territory. What happened at Côte St. Paul a few years ago, in the construction of the canal? There were tremendous riots there. That is outside of the city of Montreal. Côte St. Paul was a very small corporation twenty or twenty-five years ago. It is a progressive place now, and I am glad to know that it is prospering. Why throw all the blame and cost of that strike, which took place on federal public works, on that municipality? It is absolutely unfair. I admit that it is according to law, and we are told by the hon. gentleman from Halifax that it is a law that has been in existence since confederation, and therefore we should let it alone. We are here to remedy the defects of the past; to wipe out what has been mouldy and crumbling. We are not here to endorse everything that was done forty years ago because it was considered to be good policy at that time. It is time to cure these defects in our laws. I could cite other instances of strikes and disturbances, where there was no contribution at all towards the expense of the militia by the municipality. Take the construction of any canal, or a railway going through the country or province. They may run through ten or twelve municipalities. Probably not one man in one hundred working on that line of railway or canal belongs to the villages or municipalities on which that work borders—probably not one man. Who are they? Strangers. Foreigners for most part. A strike occurs among these men, and the militia is called out. I ask hon. gentlemen in cool common sense, is it fair to say to these poor little struggling municipalities that because there is a riot brought on by strangers and foreigners, and the militia have to be called out, to the extent of one or two or three thousand and kept there two or three weeks to re-establish peace and maintain it, that the municipalities should pay all the expense?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Nor do they. It does not follow that when the troops are called out the municipality has to pay. Take the Belleville strike for instance. It was not the Belleville strike, it was the Grand Trunk Railway strike. I was in the government at the time, and my recollection is that Belleville paid a very small, fractional part of the expense. The main portion of the cost was borne by the government. In the instance of the hon. gentleman gives, along the Lachine canal, the individual townships have not been saddled with the expense.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—They have been saddled in Montreal, and the principle should not be changed because Montreal is a city. If the government is prepared to introduce an amendment in this Bill providing that where the municipality is not responsible for the strike, the government should pay for it, that is all I want. I was asked when this measure was brought into the House, who is going to be the judge of the necessity for calling out the militia. Why submit it to the judge of the district. If it can be proved the municipality was responsible either through its by-laws or its lax administration, for the resulting consequences, then let them pay for it, but every incorporated village or township is liable to be taxed for the calling out of the militia just the same as Montreal, because it is incorporated by the legislature. They exist by virtue of the charter or Act of incorporation by the legislature, and these municipalities are liable to be taxed. All I want is a strong declaration on behalf of parliament and the people of Canada that when a municipality has by-laws in accordance with justice and right, and has an administration of affairs which is equitable and fair, and that administration and those by-laws do not bring about a strike and riot of themselves, that the municipality should not be held responsibile for the expense of calling out the militia. I am not discussing the opportunity of calling them out, at what moment, or what time, but I want to lay it down as a principle in the laws of our country that we should not have to pay for that for which we are not responsible. That is the only point, and I express regret that the hon. gentleman from Mille Iles did not go far enough. The Bill only amounts to this; under what circumstances will the militia be called out. Probably the right of calling out the militia under the old law is just as good and effective as under what he proposes here. That clause is simply a variation. There is no question of principle. It is a question between the mayor and other officials as to calling out the militia. The second clause of this Bill is at variance with what he asked for. You actually saddle the municipality with the responsibility without saying it. I am opposed to that clause. He says the municipality will be obliged to give lodgings, &c., to the officers and men.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—They will pay for that.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—That the municipality will be obliged to give lodging and food to the men?

Hon. Mr. DAVID—That they would be obliged to supply them with food and lodging, if they were responsible.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—But if they are not responsible and not the cause of the strike, why saddle the municipality with the expense? The second clause is against the idea which has been developed in all this discussion, that the expenses of calling out the militia should be saddled on the responsible party, and that party alone would be the municipality or the people who break the law. The government is supposed to enforce the laws and keep peace.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Is the hon. gentleman against the clause or for it?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I am against the clause.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—The hon. gentleman from Victoria is mistaken when he says the harbour of Montreal is not within the limits of the city of Montreal.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Not within the limits of its jurisdiction.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Yes. He is mistaken. It is within the limits and the jurisdiction of the city of Montreal.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Since when?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Well, always, except for a time the government had its own police. It is a property situated down the river but which is owned by a department of the government. The limits of the city extend to the middle of the St. Lawrence.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—And the harbour?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Yes, but of course it is only for police purposes.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Exactly.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—The limit extends to the middle of the river, but the jurisdiction of the city, as a matter of fact, is limited to police regulation, because the property being all owned by the government and not liable for municipal taxes, the city cannot interfere with the management of that property. But this, I think, is quite foreign to the Bill in question. As far as I am concerned I am not prepared to say now that I would be disposed to support the Bill in its entirety. I believe there is something in the Bill which would warrant it being read the second time and referred to a Committee of the Whole, and, when in committee, we may come to the conclusion that the Bill should be killed; but for my part I am not prepared to do so now. There are two points covered by the Bill. The first point is that under section 82 of the Militia Act, if the mayor is unable to act, whether by absence or otherwise, or refuses to act, power is given to the county or district court judge or one of the county or district court judges having jurisdiction in such place, acting alone, to call the militia. It seems to me it is rather unreasonable. Here is a person who is not at all connected with the municipality, and the law gives him, and him alone, the power to call out the militia, and the municipality would have to pay the bill. It seems to me that the municipalities are entitled to ask this honourable House that the law be made more conservative, not by way of obstructing the calling out of the militia, but to have it done with the consent of a magistrate having at least the power of two justices of the peace. It seems to me so far the Bill would be on proper line. As far as the other point is concerned, possibly the Bill is going too far; but it would appeal to my mind, if a provision made to this effect, that the liability of a town or municipality be limited to cases where the riot originates in the municipality leaving it entirely to the goverment to decide the question of fact. It should not be open to any controversy; the government should be the sole judge. It seems to me it would be a proper rule to place within the four corners of the statute, in order that the government may act upon a settled principle. From the reports which were laid on the table of this honourable House by the hon. Secretary of State, at the request of the hon. gentleman from Mille Iles it appears that a number of cases, for one reason or another—and I do not doubt that the reasons were wise and good—the government took upon itself to relieve a number of the municipalities, either of paying any proportion of the cost, or of reducing the amount to be paid by them, for different reasons. But there are in the statute no rules at all for the guidance of the government, and one municipality may consider that they are as much entitled as another municipality to be relieved from paying the costs of calling out the militia, although the circumstances might be entirely different. It seems to me it would be easy to amend the Bill introduced by my hon. friend to provide that the liability of the municipality would be restricted to cases where the riot has, according to the decision of the government, originated within the municipality. If it has not originated with the municipality, they should not be held responsible for any portion of the cost.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Does the hon. member mean originated within the municipality, by people in the municipality or by strangers?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—It makes no difference, because the municipality is responsible for the good behaviour, not only of its citizens, but of all the people who are within its limits.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN moved that the debate be adjourned until Wednesday next.

The motion was agreed to.

PRINTING OF COLONIAL CONFERENCE PAPERS.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—On the 18th of this month, in another place, the Premier laid before the House the papers connected with the Colonial Conference, and there was an order of the House to print them forthwith, the rules being suspended for that purpose. They are not printed yet.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will make some inquiry.

COPIES OF RULES OF HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Did the hon. Secretary of State think about providing us with the rules of the House of Commons?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, I did.

REPORT OF INSURANCE COMMISSION.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I suppose we might get copies of the report of the Insurance Commission? Is it printed yet?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No; it only went down to the Bureau yesterday. It is rather voluminous, and it will take a few days to print.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Will it be printed before the French version of the Revised Statues is printed?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I hope so.

The Senate adjourned until 3 p.m. tomorrow.

THE SENATE.

OTTAWA, Friday, March 1, 1907.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

CONTRACTS FOR SECTIONS OF EASTERN DIVISION NATIONAL TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON inquired :

1. What portions, stated in sections and miles, of the eastern division of the National Transcontinental Railway, have been placed under contract by the government from the 1st instant ?

2. What is the nature of the work embraced in the contract or contracts referred to, are they for grading, or does any of them include track-laying or ballasting, or all three operations ?

3. What will be the cost per mile of grading, track-laying and ballasting, stated separately, or all three operations combined, on each section of the said eastern division, embraced in the aforementioned contracts ?

4. What is the maximum grade of the sections of the said railway, embraced in the contracts referred to ?

5. Has the route of the said railway between Winnipeg and Quebec, or between Quebec and Moncton, been approved by the National Transcontinental Railway Commission or the government ?

6. If so, what is the length of railway between these points ?

7. Has the route of the western division of the said railway been approved as aforesaid ? If so, what is the length of the mountain and prairie sections, stated separately ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No contracts have been awarded for any of the sections for the National Transcontinental Railway, referred to. I see that the press has made certain announcements in regard to the matter ; where they obtained the information I do not know. The contracts have not been awarded, so that questions 2, 3 and 4 would be answered by No. 1. The answers to the remaining questions are as follows :

5. The route approved between Winnipeg and Quebec, as follows : District 'B' 195 miles, districts 'C' and 'D' 150 miles ; between Quebec and Moncton, as follows : 50 miles from Moncton, westward ; 62 miles from Grand Falls to Quebec boundary ; from Quebec bridge, eastward, 150 miles, by order in concil, dated 22nd December, 1906.

6. The distance between Winnipeg and Quebec is 1,358·76 miles ; between Quebec and Moncton, 495·25.

7. The route map has been approved, but the dividing line between the prairie section and the mountain section has not been determined.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Then we could get the total mileage of both, without stating it separately ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I fancy we will have them awarded next week, and my hon. friend will be able to obtain the information the moment the contracts are awarded.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—But whether the contracts have been awarded or not, could we not get the total distance from the coast to Winnipeg?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They have not given it to me. I will procure it for the hon. gentleman.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Yes, for the next sitting of the House.

COST OF CONSTRUCTION OF OTTAWA POST OFFICE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired of the government :

1. How much did the first construction and the fitting up of the Ottawa post office cost, before the burning of that building ?

2. How much have the repairs, the additions since the fire, and the fitting up, of the new post office, cost ?

3. How much is it estimated that it will be necessary to expend in order to finish completely the repairs and the fitting up of the present post office ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I had the answer to this inquiry among my papers, but it has been mislaid. However, I remember closely enough to give my hon. friend the information. The repairs cost about $202,000 and it will take about $2,000 more to finish them. That is my recollection of the answer, but if there is any error in my figures I can correct it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Can the hon. gentleman say when it will probably be completed ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I could not undertake to say.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Will it be completed before the election ?

ELECTRICITY INSPECTION BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (P) An Act respecting the Inspection of Electricity.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There has been on the statute-book since 1894, a statute entitled 'An Act respecting the Inspection of Electricity'. In the past it applied only to electric light. Now the proposition is that the Act be extended to include power, and the changes in this Bill are only in that direction. The changes are comparatively few, and I shall be glad to call attention to them as we proceed.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—This is a consolidation of existing legislation ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, it makes no change except with reference to the inspection of power.

On clause 4,

4. Before commencing to give a supply of electrical energy to any purchaser, the contractor shall declare to such purchaser the constant pressure at which he proposes to supply energy at the purchaser's terminals.

2. The variation of pressure at any purchaser's terminals shall not under any conditions of the supply which the purchaser is entitled to receive, nor at any time, exceed three per cent from the declared constant pressure, whether such variation is due to the resistance of the service lines or apparatus belonging to the contractor, or to any action or effect produced by such apparatus, for which the purchaser cannot be shown to be responsible, or partly to a variation of pressure in the distributing mains from which the supply is taken.

3. The contractor shall not be liable for any variation of pressure caused by unavoidable accident to the generating plant or apparatus, or by the uncontrollable condition of the elements.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—There is just a question in my mind if subclause 3 is not trenching on the provincial domain.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The department has control of the inspection, and if there are any penalties for error they ought to be allowed to enforce them.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I apprehend that this parliament could relieve a contractor of any liability to penalty imposed by this parliament for contravention of the Act ; but clearly this parliament would not relieve a contractor from liability, or damage, or accident that might arise through his negligence, and I say that paragraph 3 of the clause goes as far as that.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is an incident of the British North America Act, that where a subject is under the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada, then all the incidents naturally flowing from it become part. I think this has been decided in a case that went to the Privy Council in connection with the Railway Act.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—But this is not an incident of inspection. As I understand, this Bill is being passed in pursuance of the British North America Act, by which parliament may legislate as to weights and measures. This legislation is for the measurement of electricity. Now, when parliament goes beyond that, it infringes on the domain of the province as far as property and civil rights are concerned, and this parliament certainly cannot relieve a contractor of damage that may arise through his negligence owing to the variation of pressure he may apply to a plant which he is controlling.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It may be quite correct that it is so. I would not be prepared to dispute the point, but whether it is desirable that we should, of our own mere motion, strike it out, is another question. I think it would be better to leave it there.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I think it might be well to call the attenion of the Minister of Justice to that clause and the following clause, which goes very far in the same direction.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is suggested that we should hold that clause and the following clauses, to permit the Minister of Justice to pass upon it. Then subclause 3 of clause 4 will be allowed to stand.

The remaining subclauses were adopted.

On clause 11,

11. Any person may, after examination as to his qualification, be appointed and may act as an inspector under this Act.

2. No inspector shall be a seller of electricity or electric meters, or be employed by any person or company supplying electricity or meters.

3. No inspector shall repair or adjust any meter inspected or verified by him.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The changes in this clause are verbal. The sense is the same.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The difficulty I see is that there is no standard of qualification for an inspector who may be appointed. I might say to my hon. friend, that the present inspectors are simply gas inspectors. How many inspectors have the government at the present time throughout the Dominion ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I cannot say. It is defective in that respect. We have had gas inspectors who were not educated up to the standard, acting as electrical inspectors, and it is a very serious matter. Electricity has come into use so rapidly, so universally, and so much in advance of the officers who are capable of inspecting, that it is difficult to obtain proper inspection. That is one of the troubles the department has experienced.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—There are several universities and technical colleges throughout the Dominion giving thorough courses in electricity, and, certainly a sufficient number of students or graduates would be obtainable to act in that capacity.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There will be in six months from now. I know of different cases where men are assuming to act as inspectors of electricity who know nothing about it. They have been appointed to inspect the lighting by gas throughout the Dominion under the Inspection Act. It seems to me this clause should be so amended as to require the qualification of an inspector to be that of a duly qualified electrician.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is no doubt force in the remarks of the hon. leader of the opposition. There are some inspectors who are gas inspectors and who are capital officers. I ascertained that from inquiry some time ago ; but there are other gas inspectors who know nothing whatever about electricity, and power should be given to the superintendent, who has the recommendation to the government to appoint these people, to select such men as are capable of performing the duties, and we know, as far as Ontario is concerned, there are many of them who are not.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is one of the weaknesses of the Act.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Better reserve that clause.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The department feel that they are unable to appoint proper inspectors, and they are loath to appoint men unless they have passed proper examination. You can get them in Montreal and Toronto.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It is difficult to conceive that from 6,000,000 of people in Canada a sufficient number of inspectors cannot be secured to act.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If the hon. gentleman looks at clause 11, he will see that it is not so wonderful. It says :

No inspector shall be a seller of electricity or electrical meters, or be employed by any person or company supplying electricity or meters.

So that the class which is eligible to be inspectors is not so large.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am told by the head of the branch in the department that they propose to endeavour to get young men from the universities and colleges who have taken a course in electricity to act as inspectors.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—They do not want a course. They can learn any place where there is an electric plant. I do not think the government pay them enough to secure that class.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They should be competent persons. The department will endeavour to secure competent men, and will not allow any inspectors to be appointed hereafter unless they are competent.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—If the department would lay down the qualifications they would require for a good inspector, men could study to qualify for the position.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend very well knows that unless a specific qualification is provided for in the Act that the political influence which will be brought to bear upon the minister, or the government, to appoint incompetent men will be such that invariably they will be appointed; and it seems to me very much more desirable in the public interest, and in the interest of the government, that there should be a qualification mentioned. I should prefer that this clause be allowed to stand until my hon. friend has made further inquiry into it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The minister is duly impressed with the necessity of not allowing incompetent persons to have anything to do with such a destructive agency as elecfricity. From day to day men are dropping off the poles. Yesterday, in this city, a man on top of a pole was stricken cold in death. People passing saw that he was not moving, and some one went up to him and found him dead. Part of his thumb had touched the live wire, and that was the end of him. The department fully appreciates the dangers of the position, and they are endeavouring to cope with the difficulty.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The anxiety of the minister may be very great, but it is not commensurate with the action he has taken in insuring proper inspection. This kind of thing is brought to one's notice every day; accidents happen for want of proper inspection. This is the reason I feel rather critical upon this particular subject. Can my hon. friend say whether the government has recognized certain meters as standards or whether any meter is adopted for this purpose?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—All new styles of meters have to be submitted to the department for approval before being put on the market.

The clause was allowed to stand.

On clause 18,

18. No meter duly stamped as aforesaid shall be liable to be re-verified or re-stamped within a period of five years from the then last verification or re-verication thereof, although it is used in any other place than that at which it was originally stamped, but shall be considered as a lawful meter throughout Canada, unless found incorrect under this Act, or requiring re-verification by lapse of time as aforesaid.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—May I ask how the department satisfies itself that a meter is good for five years?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The term of five years is taken from experience with gas meters and experience in other countries. There is a provision later on which allows either party to have a meter verified at any time by paying a small fee.

The clause was adopted.

On the last clause,

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Has the department ever considered the expediency of taking to itself the power to inspect electric wires? True, it might not come under the exercise of the powers regarding weights and measures, but it may come under the power to legislate for the public health and safety, which can be exercised by the government. The provinces have been lamentably remiss in passing legislation upon this subject. We find that accidents happen every day, and it seems unfortunate that where an elaborate system of inspection is established for one part of the system, it should not be comprehensive enough to extend to the whole.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The same thought has occurred to me, and I drew the attention of the expert to it, but he did not see how it could be remedied. I shall call the attention of the minister to the point, because it is serious, so many deaths are due to that cause.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER, from the committee, reported that they had made some progress with the Bill, and asked leave to sit again.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY AND GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY AGREEMENT BILL.

POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being called :

House again in Committee of the Whole on (Bill 50) An Act to amend an Act to confirm an agreement entered into by Her late Majesty with the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada for the purpose of securing the extension of the Intercolonial Railway system to the city of Montreal.—Hon. Mr. Scott.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved that the order be discharged, and that it be fixed for Wednesday next.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Has my hon. friend been able to secure the original contract?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes ; but I forgot to bring it with me. I may say, however, that the hon. gentleman is quite correct ; there are the mistakes that have been named.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—They are not typographical errors?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No ; the mistakes occurred in copying one from the other.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The agreement in the statute must have been the draft agreement, and there must have been a revised agreement, and those substantial changes cannot be regarded as merely typographical. It is an entirely different contract.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Act was not drawn from a corrected copy of the agreement. The correct copy is in the Secretary of State's office—the binding one, the legal one.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The agreement which the government now regards as the agreement in force is not the draft agreement?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I did not look at the date of the agreement. However, it is quite correct now as it is.

The motion was agreed to.

GREAT WEST RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. De VEBER moved the second reading of Bill (79) An Act respecting the Great West Railway Company.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Would the hon. gentleman explain what the intention of this Bill is ? Where does the Great West Railway commence, and where does it end ?

Hon. Mr. De VEBER—If the hon. gentleman wishes to learn the geography of the district in which this proposed road is to be located, he might appear before the committee, where a map will be furnished, and the parties interested would be better able to explain the Bill. I am afraid if I attempted to do so now, the explanation would not be very lucid. Three or four different railways will be located. One branch will run towards Calgary, and another one to Cowley, and another one on this side of the mountain. It will run through the gap and meet another road running down to the coal regions. The road will commence at Cowley, on this side of the mountain. It would be easily explained if we had a map before us, but very hard without a map.

The motion was agreed to.

WESTERN RIVERS IMPROVEMENT COMPANY BILL.

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being called :

Second reading (Bill 58) An Act to incorporate the Western Improvement Company.—Hon. Mr. Watson.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—In the absence of the hon. gentleman who has charge of this Bill I beg to move that the order of the day be discharged and placed on the orders of the day for Tuesday next.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I may infrom the House, that I have received a telegram from Revelstoke, signed by F. J. Gallespie, which reads as follows :—

Kindly hold Bill Western Rivers Improvement Company until arrival of Mr. McCormick and oblige.

F. J. GALLESPIE.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—There have been telegrams about it, and I will postpone the order of the day until Wednesday next with the permission of the House, and if the parties interested have not arrived we will postpone it further. There is no rush in regard to a Bill which has gone through the Commons, and is simply waiting to pass the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

BURRARD, WESTMINSTER BOUNDARY RAILWAY AND NAVIGATION COMPANY BILL.

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

The order of the day being called :

Second reading (Bill 71) An Act to incorporate the Burrard, Westminster and Boundary Railway and Navigation Company.—Hon. Mr. Riley.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—I move that the order of the day be discharged and that it be placed on the orders for Tuesday next.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I should like to call attention to the fact that this is purely a provincial road, clearly within the legislative powers of the province of British Columbia. I am not going to oppose the motion to discharge the order of the day, nor would I oppose the motion for going into committee ; but I merely want to call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that it is purely provincial and very local at that.

The motion was agreed to.

CANADIAN MUSICAL AND DRAMATIC ASSOCIATION BILL.

CONSIDERATION OF AMENDMENTS POSTPONED.

The order of the day being called :

Consideration of the amendments made by the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills to (Bill I) An Act to incorporate the Canadian Musical and Dramatic Association, Limited.—Hon. Mr. Roy.

Hon. Mr. ROY—I move that the House concur in the amendments.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have to call the attention of the House to this Bill, which is exceedingly misleading in its title. It is proposed to incorporate the Canadian Musical and Dramatic Association, that is the innocent part of the Bill. The part of the Bill which condemns it is in the subsequent clauses. I must ask my hon. friend to let it stand until we have a full House.

Hon. Mr. ROY—Then I move that the order of the day be discharged and that it be placed on the orders of the day for Wednesday next.

Motion agreed to.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (80) An Act to incorporate the Prudential Savings Society.—(Hon. Mr. Watson.)

Bill (54) An Act to incorporate the Edmonton, Dunvegan and British Columbia Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Bostock.)

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday next at 8 p.m.

SENATE.

OTTAWA, Tuesday, March 5, 1907.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Eight o'clock p.m.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

APPOINTMENT OF TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPHIC COMMISSIONER.

MOTION POSTPONED.

Notice of motion being called :

That in the public interest the government should appoint an expert officer in connection with the Board of Railway Commissioners of Canada, to be called a Telephone and Telegraph Commissioner, whose duties shall be to have full control, as regards construction, location, maintenance and operation of all telegraph and telephone lines in Canada.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Stand.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This motion has been on the order paper since the 22nd of January.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I might say with reference to that motion, I am waiting for some data from the west, which I expect to obtain on Thursday.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In a case of that kind it would be better to drop the motion from the order paper, and place it on the orders at some future day. One is kept watching the motion and gets prepared for it, and then when it is postponed forgets all about it.

The motion was allowed to stand.

CONTRACTS FOR SECTIONS OF EASTERN DIVISION OF NATIONAL TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY.

INQUIRY POSTPONED.

The notice of inquiry being called :

1. What portions, stated in sections and miles, of the eastern division of the National Transcontinental Railway, have been placed under contract by the government from the 1st instant ?
2. What is the nature of the work embraced in the contract or contracts referred to, are they for grading, or does any of them include track-laying or ballasting, or all three operations ?
3. What will be the cost per mile of grading, track-laying and ballasting, stated separately, or all three operations combined, on each section of the said eastern division, embraced in the aforementioned contracts ?
4. What is the maximum grade of the sections of the said railway, embraced in the contracts referred to ?
5. Has the route of the said railway between Winnipeg and Quebec, or between Quebec and Moncton, been approved by the National Transcontinental Railway Commission or the government ?
6. If so, what is the length of railway between these points ?
7. Has the route of the western division of the said railway been approved as aforesaid ? If so, what is the length of the mountain and prairie sections, stated separately ?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Two of these questions have already been answered.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—All except one, I think. My hon. friend asked the distance from Winnipeg or Edmonton to the Pacific coast. I have been unable to obtain that. The Grand Trunk people could not give it.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The hon. gentleman will be able to get the information later on.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They telegraphed to headquarters at Montreal, but they could not obtain the information there.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The first three questions are not answered, for the reason that the contract has not been awarded yet, although the papers say it was. I would suggest that items 4 and 5 should be struck out, and allow the remainder of the inquiries to stand as amended, say until Thursday next, and if the hon. gentleman is not then ready to give me the information, there will be a further postponement.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I gave my hon. friend the length of the eastern division.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Yes. With the permision of the House 4 and 5 will be struck out, and the remainder of the notice will stand until Thursday next.

The notice, as amended, was allowed to stand.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (L) An Act respecting the Trader's Fire Insurance Company.—(Hon. Mr. McSweeney.)

Bill (30) An Act to incorporate the Women's Art Association of Canada, as amended.—(Hon. Mr. Kerr.)

DOMINION LANDS SURVEY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved second reading of Bill (59) An Act respecting the surveys of the public lands of the Dominion and the surveyors entitled to make such surveys.

He said : The object of this Bill is to extract from the Dominion Lands Act those portions of it that refer to surveys and surveyors. There is nothing especially new in the measure, as the Bill is the result of long years of amendments from time to time. It is for the purpose of separating from the Dominion Lands Act proper, all the laws relating to surveys and surveyors and have them in one measure. I have in my hand here the Bill with notes which will enable the committee to call attention to any changes made in the law as it stands at present ; but I am advised that the changes are very few, and that none are of very great importance.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Does the Dominion Lands Act, as consolidated and as it appears in the Revised Statutes, contain these provisions with regard to surveys ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, yes, but we are now separating them. There is before the other Chamber a new Bill consolidating the Dominion Lands Act and excluding those, so there are practically two Bills, one for the lands and the other for surveys and surveyors ; but so far as the latter is concerned no material change is made.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Then we shall have in the legislation of this year two complete and separate laws, one dealing with the lands, and the other with the survey and surveyors.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (78) An Act respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Young.)

Bill (28) An Act to incorporate the Residential Fire Insurance Company.—(Hon. Mr. Sullivan.)

Bill (15) An Act respecting the Joliette and Brandon Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Thibaudeau, de la Vallière.)

Bill (71) An Act to incorporate the Burrard, Westminster and Boundary Railway and Navigation Company. — (Hon. Mr. Riley.)

MANITOBA RADIAL RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG (in the absence of Hon. Mr. Watson) moved the second reading of Bill (40) An Act to incorporate the Manitoba Radial Railway Company.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I should like to have a little explanation of this Bill.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Would my hon friend permit the explanation to be given in committee ?

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—The only time we can get an explanation of a Bill is on the second reading. We are not all members of the Railway Committee, and those of us who are not on the committee do not know anything about what takes place in the committee.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Would the hon. gentleman indicate what information he desires, so that I can obtain it for him and have the order of the day discharged and placed on the orders for to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I want a general explanation of the Bill. It seems to me this should be a matter of local concern.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The explanation of the Bill is to be found in the measure itself. It is a Bill to incorporate a railway company. The names of the incorporators are given, and the object for which the Act of incorporation is sought, and it states that a line of railway will be constructed from a point at or near the city of Winnipeg, in the province of Manitoba, westerly and northerly to a point at or near Clandeboye Bay, on the shore of Lake Manitoba, and thence in a northerly direction to a point at or near the post office of Lundar, in the said province, and thence northerly to a point on the shore of Lake Winnipeg, near Grand Rapids, in the district of Keewatin ; and may construct and operate a branch line from a point on the main line near Winnipeg northerly through the town of Stonewall, and thence in a northwesterly direction to Lake Francis, in the province of Manitoba. This is the proposed line which the company are asking to be incorporated to build. The other provisions in the Bill are the usual provisions to be found in charters of a similar character. That is all the information I can give my hon. friend.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—It looks to me very much like a Bill that should come under the local jurisdiction.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—It goes beyond the boundary of the province, into Keewatin.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—I think the request made by the hon. gentleman from Prince Albert, to have an explanation of this Bill, is not unreasonable. He thinks it is a provincial matter. If it be a provincial matter, we ought not to encroach on the rights of the province ; if it be not a provincial matter, then we should have a full explanation to show that the Bill is one of the ordinary charters granted by parliament. We have railroad Bills constantly before us that should be subject to the jurisdiction of the provinces and not subject to the jurisdiction of the federal parliament. We are not worked so hard just now. We can dispose of 20 or 30 orders in a very short time, and I think that we should have a full explanation on the second reading of any Bill if we do not understand what it really purports to be. My hon. friend is simply asking what is proper, and is strictly within his right.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It does seem to me that this railway is a provincial enterprise. It is true that one branch of this proposed railway is described as going into the territory of Keewatin, but it is the easiest thing in the world to put that into the Bill in order to make it interprovincial in its character. I think the promoters of the Bill must have had some doubts about it themselves when they inserted the declaration that the project was for the general advantage of Canada. They could not have contemplated going beyond the province of Manitoba, or they would not have found it necessary to insert this declaration. It is purely an electric railway. Its name indicates that it is a radial road, and it is very doubtful in my mind whether it is anything more than an electric tramway. I would not be very positive, in the case of a province like Manitoba, which I understand has no Department of Railways like the province of Ontario, whether they are equipped for managing railway interests.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—They have a Commissioner of Railways.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It seems to me this is a road that might be left to provincial jurisdiction. However, we can go into that in committee.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I would suggest to my hon. friend from Marshfield that possibly the promoters of this Bill anticipate the extension of the boundaries of Manitoba to the waters of Hudson bay.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read a second time.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (NN) An Act for the relief of George William Hadley.—(Hon. Mr. Perley.)

Bill (OO) An Act to incorporate the Collingwood and Southern Railway Company. —(Hon. Mr. McMullen.)

Bill (PP) An Act to incorporate the Live Stock Insurance Company of Canada, Limited.—(Hon. Mr. David.)

Bill (27) An Act respecting the Banque Nationale.—(Hon. Mr. Bolduc.)

Bill (31) An Act to incorporate the Northwest Trust Company.—(Hon. Mr. Lougheed.)

Bill (63) An Act to incorporate the Protective Association of Canada.—(Hon. Mr. Mitchell.)

Bill (73) An Act respecting Patents of the International Paper Company.—(Hon. Mr. Watson.)

THE AGREEMENT WITH THE GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY COMPANY.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Before the House adjourns, may I ask my hon. friend the leader of the government if he is prepared to lay on the table the agreement between the government and the Grand Trunk Railway Company dealt with in Bill (No. 50), which is on the order paper for to-morrow ? I may point out that if it is not placed on the table until we again go into Committee of the Whole, it will be impossible to peruse the agreement and compare it with the Bill.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is filed in the office. I do not know whether I am justified in bringing it here ; however, it can be returned.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If my hon. friend will bring down a copy, it will be sufficient.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I had it all carefully examined, and I find that there are a great many other mistakes. However, I am only disposed to correct the mistakes referred to in the Bill. They are clerical mistakes and not important. I have had the paragraphs referred to copied, but I can bring the whole agreement here.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It seems extraordinary that a very important Bill of this character, involving an expenditure of many hundreds of thousands of dollars, should contain so many material mistakes. If they were mere typographical errors, one could understand it ; but this Bill proposes to depart very radically from the original agreement, practically making a new agreement.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, no. It is a very long document. I had it all carefully examined, and was told there were other errors besides the particular ones referred to in this Bill. I had the sections in which those errors occurred copied in full, but I can bring the original here to-morrow. The Bill is all right—the statements made in it are quite correct. I was looking up the history of it. It seems to have been sent to the Department of Railways. It ought to have been sent, in the first instance, to the Department of State. However, it was sent to the Railways Department and it was a couple of years afterwards before it reached the Department of State and was registered there.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Can my hon. friend explain why the Grand Trunk Railway came to overlook so important a matter ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is only one error in it of very great importance. The others are merely verbal.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Judging from the Bill there are several.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Three I think, but only one is important.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Will my hon. friend bring down any information he can get relating to the litigation referred to in the Bill? He will observe that there is a clause of the Bill dealing with litigation. The House should have the fullest possible information regarding that litigation, and the effect of the passage of the Bill upon any litigation which may be pending.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—One amendment is to give force and effect to a certain map. We did not see that map when the original Bill went through, and we would not have thought it so necessary to see it then, because there was not that force given to the map that is proposed to be given to it by the amendment now before us. I think it is necessary that we should see that map.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not really know what my hon. friend is referring to.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—One of the amendments proposes to insert the word 'as' after the word 'all' in one of the paragraphs. That amendment will give force and effect to a map which it did not possess before and, therefore, we ought to see that map.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Surely if the legislation proposed is to copy exactly the original document, the House cannot take exception to it. It is to correct the error between the print of three years ago, as it appears in the statute, and the original document on file. The object of this amendment is to insert the very words that are in the original agreement, so it is all in the right direction.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think parliament should hesitate before passing this amendment unless the map was produced, because parliament would not know what it was doing. As it stood, it was only a declaration that certain things were delineated on the map, but now we propose to say they shall be as delineated on the map, giving them the force and effect of law.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at three o'clock p.m.

SENATE.

OTTAWA, Wednesday, March 6, 1907.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

NOTICE OF MOTION.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—I give notice that, to-morrow, I shall move the six months hoist in regard to three of the Bills reported from the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, which are clearly provincial in their character.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think the hon. gentleman must define the Bills he refers to.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—I am not bound to give notice. I can move the six months hoist without notice.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is just as well to give notice.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not think it is in the power of a member to move the six months hoist to a private Bill without giving notice of his intention to do so.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—And I give notice that to-morrow I shall move an amendment to the Bill to which I objected in committee this morning.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (QQ) An Act for the relief of Celina Kingan Ansley.—(Hon. Mr. McMullen.)

REPORTS OF GOVERNMENT OFFICERS REGARDING OLD AGE PENSIONS.

MOTION.

The order of the day being called :

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency may cause to be laid on the table of the Senate, all correspondence between the government of Canada or any member thereof with any person whatsoever, and any report from any officer of the government regarding the question of pensions by the state to deserving persons of advanced age, and also a copy of a Bill referred to by the right honourable the Minister of Trade and Commerce during a speech made by him in the Senate on the 28th February last, dealing with the sale of annuities by the government of Canada.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My motion has not matured, the two days notice not having been given; but as I obsèrve my hon. friend from Wellington has a notice on the paper for to-morrow which will cover the same ground, with the exception that my notice of motion calls for laying on the table of a Bill referred to by my hon. friend the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, I think it would be very convenient if we could have that Bill in our possession when the debate takes place. If that view is concurred in, my motion might be allowed to pass in order to make the tabling of that Bill perfectly regular ; and then my hon. friend's motion could come on later for the purpose of discussion when we had that Bill before us. If my hon. friend from Halifax would waive his objection to my motion on the ground of insufficient notice, it might be allowed to go through without discussion, and we would have this Bill before us when we consider the matter again.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Very well. My hon. friend can make his motion and I will lay the papers on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. POWER.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I now lay the document on the table for the information of the House. The hon. gentleman will bear in mind that this is merely a draft.

THE ROSS RIFLE.

INQUIRY.

The notice of motion being called :

1. How many rifles has the Ross Rifle Company manufactured, from the time it commenced the performance of its contract with the government up to the 1st of March instant—

(a) Of mark No. I.; (b) of mark No. II ; (c) of mark No. III.?

2. How many of all these rifles has the government accepted after inspection thereof—

(a) Of mark No. I.; (b) of mark No. II. ; (c) of mark No. III.?

3. How much, up to the 1st of March instant, has the government given as payment in full for rifles—

(a) Of mark No. I.; (b) of mark No. II.; (c) of mark No. III.?

4. What is the amount paid in advance for rifles in course of manufacture but not yet finished or not yet accepted on that date, the 1st of March instant ?

5. How many rifles belong to the latter category and of what mark are they ?

6. Out of the rifles accepted by the government and wholly paid for by it, how many of each mark have been distributed, and how many of them remain in the military stores ?

7. At what places have the rifles been stored which have not been distributed ?

8. To whom have been given or sold the rifles that have been distributed ? What is the number, of each mark, thus given or sold? What regiments, rifle associations, bodies or individuals whosoever, are now furnished with the Ross rifle, and in what quantity has it been distributed to them ?

9. In what respect is the mark No. II. essentially or especially different from the mark No. I.?

10. In what does mark No. III. differ from the two preceding ?

11. How many rifles of mark No. II. have been substituted for rifles of mark No. I., after a regular distribution of the latter ?

12. Were the rifles of mark No. I. convertible, and have they been converted into rifles of mark No. II.?

13. Will the improvements recently brought about in the rifle of mark No. II., in order to make out of it the rifle of mark No. III., be extended to all the rifles of mark No. II. and to all the rifles of mark No. I.?

14. If the improvements brought about in the Ross rifle cannot be adapted to rifles previously manufactured by the company and accepted by the government, what use does the government intend to make of an arm comparatively inferior ?

15. What, on an average, is the proportion of rifles set aside on first inspection by the government ?

16. Out of these rifles rejected on first inspection, what is afterwards, on the average, the proportion of those which a second inspection allows the government to accept ?

17. Has the government concluded a contract with the Ross Rifle Company for the manufacture of a bayonet for this rifle? When, at what price, and for what quantity?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Is the hon. gentleman ready to answer this inquiry?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The minister informs me that a return has been called for by the House of Commons for practically the same information that is asked for in the 17 questions the hon. gentleman is putting, and he asks me to allow this to stand until that report comes down, when a copy of it will be presented to this House. It is scarcely proper to ask 17 questions on one subject. It is usual in cases of that kind, where it involves a very large amount of papers to refer to, that it should be in the form of an address. Probably the answer to the address of the House of Commons will cover the hon. gentleman's point. Sir Frederick Borden informs me that it will be down in a few days.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I do not know that the hon. gentleman is quite right in saying that it is not proper to ask 17 questions on any subject; perhaps he thinks it would be proper if the notice contained an even number of questions. I am willing to wait, because I think the information which I am asking for by this inquiry cannot be all covered by the return which the hon Secretary of State says we will receive in a few days. My motion includes information up to the 1st of March. I gave it about 15 days in advance, in order that the Department of Militia might have time to select from the proper source the answers to the questions I ask; but I am ready to wait another fortnight if it will please my hon. friend. I want correct information, and if in the return to be laid on the table of this House there is anything lacking, I shall make the inquiry again.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I gave my hon. friend the answer furnished me by the Minister of Militia. He said he thought the hon. gentleman would be satisfied with all the information they could afford; they were bringing down all that could be presented in the form of an address, and a duplicate will be presented here when it is ready.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Then I am willing to let this stand until Thursday of next week.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It may not be ready by that time. It may take ten days to have the return prepared. It is impossible for me to foreshadow when the return will be brought down.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If it is not ready by Thursday of next week, I shall be willing to let it stand again.

The notice was allowed to stand.

ROYAL VICTORIA LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY BILL.

THIRD READING POSTPONED.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (in the absence of Hon. Mr. Forget) moved the third reading of Bill (37) An Act respecting the Royal Victoria Life Insurance Company.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH—I am in receipt of a telegram from the solicitor acting for several shareholders of the company, requesting me to have this Bill postponed until he has time to consult with the shareholders he represents. I regret having to do this, but I do not think the Bill is likely to be imperilled if it is allowed to stand for a few days. The shareholders will act prudently in the matter, and their request is simply for the purpose of safeguarding their interests. The telegram is from Mr. Stewart, a prominent lawyer in Lindsay, who is acting for some of the shareholders.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—They have had ample opportunity to state their views before the committee of the House of Commons and the committee here. It is rather an unusual proceeding, but I have no objection to let the Bill stand.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH—If the third reading is deferred until Friday, that ought to give them all the time they want to state any objection they may have to the Bill. I am not asking this with a view of trying to defeat or delay the Bill. I am merely acting in good faith with the solicitor, at whose request I have asked that the matter be postponed until Friday.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If the hon. gentleman would write to the lawyer that he has done all that he possibly could to have the consideration of the Bill deferred, but it could not be done, the lawyer would be content and the hon. gentleman himself would be satisfied. I do not see why the Bill before this Chamber should be delayed, simply because it pleases a lawyer in the town which my hon. friend represents. Why was he not here before the committee of both Houses? It is a private Bill. It has passed through six stages, and I do not see any reason why it should be longer delayed. No reason has been offered.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend has no doubt done his duty to the gentleman who has written him. but I agree with my hon. friend from de Lanaudière, and I do not think we should hold the Bill over. It passed the committee of both Houses. Special care was taken in our committee to send for the Superintendent of Insurance, and he explained the details of the Bill to the satisfaction of every hon. member. My hon. friend will be able to inform the lawyer that he has made the request.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—I do not think the hon. gentleman has asked for anything more than what is right. We have often delayed measures three or four days for very much less. He asks that this Bill be postponed until Friday, until he hears again from the solicitor. I do not see why the House could not grant the request. No good reason has been given why we should refuse.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It is not for us to give the reasons.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—The hon. gentleman from Stadacona has on many occasions retarded the progress of Bills, more than any other hon. gentleman in this House. My hon. friend from Lindsay asks that this Bill be postponed, and he has never himself obstructed Bills in this House.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman has no right to say that I have obstructed the Bills of this House, and I want him to retract that expression.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—If I have not made the statement in a proper way, I should like to put it in the way in which it should be made. If I have said it in a wrong manner then I will retract the expression.

The order of the day was allowed to stand until Friday.

THIRD READING.

Bill (9) An Act respecting a patent of Edgar Webster Summers and Hadley Herbert Summers.—(Hon. Mr. McMullen.)

MILITIA ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

BILL WITHDRAWN.

The order of the day being called :

Resuming adjourned debate on the motion for the second reading (Bill T) An Act to amend the Militia Act as regards the calling out of the active militia in aid of the civil power.—Hon. Mr. McMullen.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I listened with a great deal of interest to the discussion which took place on this Bill, especially the address of the hon. senator from Montreal. We have had an extended experience in connection with the calling out of the militia of Canada ever since the inception of the measure that provided for their being called out and utilized in the way in which they are when strikes occur. I admit that, in some cases, the expense may be rather heavy on towns and cities ; at the same time that will deter them from allowing a condition of things to prevail that would necessitate the calling out of the militia. It would not be prudent for us to alter the law at the present moment. It may be a great hardship upon a city that the interference of the militia with a condition of things that cannot be controlled by the local police or the peace organizations of the city, throws the expense of such intervention on the municipality. At the same time, I think it would be a step in the wrong direction if we should adopt the Bill which my hon. friend has proposed. It would open the way for a permanent corps being established by this Dominion that would be utilized specially to put a stop to strikes. The mayors and officials of the cities would virtually refuse to do anything, in the case of any controversy arising, knowing that they could fall back upon the militia, to preserve order or put down a riot. In all the cases where the militia has been called out in Canada, so far as I know, they have discharged their duties admirably. In Montreal, where there was an extensive strike, and the militia had to be called out to maintain order, the municipality was put to considerable expense. If the mayor of Montreal had fully and efficiently discharged his duty, and added to his police force to put down the riot, as it should have been put down, the probabilities are that the expense would not have been incurred. The great trouble is that where any difficulty of this kind arises, mayors are very anxious to cultivate popularity with the very class, in many cases, that have to be dealt with. Of course, the popular vote of any city or town is looked after and coveted by officers of a municipality. The result is, they do not want to get into a tangle or get at cross purposes with those people. Their object is to cultivate their good wishes and to obtain their votes when the period comes around for the election of municipal officers. To do that, they allow the strikers very extended license. They do not handle riots and disturbances with that determination they should do in the interest of the municipality, and the result is sometimes serious. I am quite satisfied that were we to take the step in the direction indicated by my esteemed friend's Bill, we would increase very considerably the annual expenditure in connection with the Militia Department in keeping a force on active service virtually from January to January, and I question very much if one equipped regiment would be sufficient for the purpose. I dare say the Minister of Militia might, before very long, feel himself called upon to equip two or possibly more. For the last thirty years, things have got along very well. We have had no serious out-breaks, and no expense imposed upon a city or town that has become very burdensome to them. All the cities and towns in this Dominion know the terms upon which the militia can be called out and the inevitable result of what will follow when they have to be called out in case of strike. We do not want to have them called out if it can be avoided, and it should be avoided. The municipal organization should be able, and should make determined effort to deal with strikes. In place of doing that, they play with the electors in the hope of cultivating their good feelings and getting their votes when the elections come round. Strikes therefore, are largely allowed to take care of themselves. It was the case in the city of Hamilton, with regard to the strike which recently took place, from the accounts that we received in regard to it. Had the militia been called out prior to the date at which it was called out, a great deal of the trouble that took place might have been avoided. Property was destroyed and people were wounded. The destruction that occurred in Hamilton was unquestionably a disgrace to any well regulated city, and the citizens themselves have more to regret than any other persons owing to that unfortunate strike. I hope that they have had a lesson, and that in future they will so regulate their own internal affairs as to prevent a repetition of the occurrence. In the city of London, they had a very serious strike that lasted for a long time. I do not quite remember whether the militia were called out on that occasion or not.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Yes, they were.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—There is one gratifying feature with reference to calling out the militia; in every case where they have been appealed to, they have creditably performed the duty they were called upon to perform, and it is a good thing for the people of this country, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, that in the event of any large crowd of rowdies getting together to cause the destruction of property, we have a means whereby that kind of thing will be put a stop to. I do not think that the law now on the statute-book can be improved upon. It would not be wise to adopt the method that my hon. friend has proposed to the House. I think we had better continue the law as it is now. I can easily understand that the strike they had in Montreal caused a great deal of bitterness, and was the cause of an enormous amount of expense, but I hope that such an impression has been made upon the minds of the people there, that they will not require the assistance of the militia again for fifty years to come. I hope they realize that it is an expensive way of putting a stop to disturbances and rioting in case of a strike, owing to indifference and want of determined, united action on the part of their own municipal officials. We had better allow the law to remain as it is, and I earnestly hope that my hon. friend will feel it to be his duty, after the discussion has taken place on the question, to drop his Bill.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—As it appears to be the feeling of this House that I should not proceed with this measure, I beg to be permitted to withdraw it, convinced that before four or five years have elapsed a measure will be adopted, if not in exactly the same words, in the same line; because I think instances will arise which will show clearly that the government, under certain circumstances, must pay the cost of the militia.

The Bill was withdrawn.

INSPECTION OF ELECTRICITY BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (P) An Act respecting the Inspection of Electricity.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It will be within the recollection of hon. gentlemen, that we went through this Bill, and three sections were held over, 4, 5 and 11; 4 and 5 on the question of the jurisdiction of parliament, and I was asked to obtain the opinion of the Minister of Justice. I have here a letter addressed to me by the Deputy Minister of Justice in reply to the question put by Mr. Higman, the electrician, which reads as follows:

Dear Sir,—Mr. Higman submitted to me yesterday the Senate Bill lettered P, intituled 'An Act respecting the Inspection of Electricity,' with the question as to whether in my opinion subsection 3 of section 4, and section 5, are intra vires of parliament?

My opinion is in the affirmative with regard to both these clauses.

As to subsection 3 of section 4 it is to be observed that the two previous subsections provide for the constant pressure at which the contractor is to supply energy to the purchaser, and the variation of pressure shall not exceed three per cent. Subsection 3, as I understand it, is in the nature of a proviso, excepting from the requirement of subsection 2 the case or variation by the causes therein mentioned, I see no reason why the authority which imposes an obligation may not state the nature and extent of the obligation, and subsection 3, seems to be merely intended as one of the terms of such statement.

As to section 3, the contractor is thereby charged with the proper maintenance of electric lines, fittings and apparatus belonging to him or under his control upon the purchaser's premises. So far the provision seems to be a perfectly proper one assuming that the subject matter of the Bill is, as it appears to be, and as it has for some time been treated, within the legislative authority of parliament. Then it is provided that the contractor shall not be responsible for damages arising from the use of the electric current in lines, fittings and apparatus not belonging to him or under his control. By this I understand that it is not intended to say more than that nothing in this section, or perhaps in the Act is intended to make him so responsible. It is in fact a provision very much of the same character as subsection 3 of section 4.

I see no reason therefore why parliament should hesitate to enact either of these provisions so far as any question of authority is concerned.

I return herewith copy of the Bill which Mr. Higman left with me.

I am, yours truly,
(Sd.) E. L. NEWCOMBE,
Deputy Minister of Justice.

Of course it has been the law in the statute-book for the last eleven years. It was passed in 1898 and has not been challenged in all that time.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That would not necessarily impair the rights of the province.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, but no exception has been taken to it. Then in reference to clause 5, as I explained before, the minister will feel it his duty to make selections of young men who have trained themselves especially for experts in electricity in regard to inspection.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have just had placed in my hands a clause to be substituted for clause 11, which, probably, will better meet the views of hon. gentlemen who have expressed opinions upon the subject than the clause as framed in the corrected Bill. It is to provide that no person shall be appointed to act as inspector until he has passed a a qualifying examination in electricity; but it is not intended to affect the status of any officers appointed prior to the passage of the Act. Graduates in electrical engineering of any university of Canada may be appointed without passing a qualifying examination; but no inspector shall be a seller of electricity or electric motors, or be employed by any person supplying electricity or motors. I move that the clause be substituted for clause 11.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—While the proposed clause is a very great improvement on the one in the Bill, it would not have been unreasonable that the department should exact from the present inspectors a qualification such as they will enforce towards new inspectors. It might seem arbitrary to compel them to qualify themselves within a given time, but within a reasonable time they should prove their efficiency.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They will work up to it. It is not usual to legislate out people already holding offices and discharging duties.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I do not suggest that they should be legislated out, but that they should be compelled to qualify themselves to the satisfaction of the department.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That must be left to the department. It appears that the parties who are interested in electric power say that they cannot strictly comply with the conditions in clause 4; so the department is willing, at all events for the present, to limit clause 4 to electric lighting, and I move an amendment to that effect.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—How does the government propose to measure the power which may be supplied by electrical power companies ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The same class of meter, only a larger type.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There are many cases in which electric power is supplied on a flat rate.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is a common practice—they do not measure at all.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In cases of that kind, this Bill would not operate any way.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is optional between the company and the consumer. They may make an arrangement for what is called 'a flat rate,' and then there would be no meter required.

The clause was amended and adopted.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN, from the committee, reported the Bill with amendments, which were concurred in.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY EXTENSION TO MONTREAL BILL.

COMMITTEE STAGE POSTPONED.

The order of the day being called :

House again in Committee of the Whole on (Bill 50) An Act to amend an Act to confirm an agreement entered into by Her late Majesty with the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada for the purpose of securing the extension of the Intercolonial Railway system to the city of Montreal.—Hon. Mr. Scott.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved that the Speaker do now leave the chair.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I understood that my hon. friend was to submit the original agreement before resuming consideration of this Bill.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have it here.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—We will not have time to examine it if we proceed with the Bill to-day.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have had an abstract prepared of the documents deposited with the Secretary of State's office, and of the printed statutes. The question was also asked me whether any litigation has arisen out of this. I am informed no, that it had no connection with litigation between the Crown and the Grand Trunk Railway, but it was in the course of litigation that the discovery was made that the agreement as filed in the Secretary of State's office did not agree with the print in the statute in some few particulars. The errors are not really important, but it was desirable to correct them.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend may think I am too critical in this matter in view of the explanation which has been given, but I have not yet heard any explanation as to why such an extraordinary change could be made without the knowledge of the contracting parties. Now it is proposed to insert in this contract a long sentence, which certainly is not a typographical error :

Of the railway between and including Ste. Rosalie and Bonaventure station and Chaudière bridge, and connections.

There are two other equally long sentences which it is proposed to embody in the contract. I have not yet heard any explanation how such omissions arose as those referred to in clause 1 of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The only explanation one can get of it is, that they took up the wrong draft the time it was submitted, because the meaning is exactly the same.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—They are the same by the interpretation clause, except where the context shows a difference.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—How could the change have been made?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is absolutely impossible to find out. The only way one can assume is, they made two drafts and, so far as those particulars are concerned, the wrong draft was put in the statute. There is no essential difference.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I would suggest to let this Bill stand until to-morrow, in order that senators may in the meantime look at the documents brought down.

The Order of the Day was discharged and fixed for to-morrow.

WESTERN RIVERS IMPROVEMENT COMPANY BILL.

Hon. Mr. POWER (in the absence of Hon. Mr. Watson) moved the second reading of Bill (58) An Act to incorporate the Western Rivers Improvement Company.

He said: The object of the Bill is to permit this company to attach booms to the shore of Kamloops lake and the shores of the North Thompson river at or near the point of its confluence with the South Thompson river, and acquire, construct and maintain piers on the shores of and in the waters of the said rivers or lake at or near the said points (first having obtained the approval of the Governor in Council of its selection of such points), and to use booms in connection therewith: Provided that none of the said piers, booms or other work shall interfere with the free navigation of the said rivers and lake.

It is a navigable stream, and the company ask for power to erect booms, and build piers, with the approval of the Governor in Council.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is not this similar in character to a Bill which was rejected by the committee about two years ago, and is not this an attempt to reintroduce the Bill which was rejected then?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am not aware. I do not remember being present at the meeting of the committee when the other Bill was discussed, but perhaps the hon. gentleman will let the Bill be read the second time now, and, when it goes to the committee, if we find it is on all fours with the Bill of which he makes mention, it can be treated the same way.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have no objection to its being read the second time and referred to the committee; but I call the attention of those who took an interest in a Bill of a similar character two years ago, and who are not members of that committee, to these facts in order that they may know what they are called upon to sanction.

Hon. Mr. POWER—After the observations made by the hon. member from Belleville, of course, the committee will have their eyes open and be prepared to carefully scrutinize the Bill.

Hon. Mr. KERR—There is another feature of the Bill which should be carefully considered. The Thompson river is wholly within the province of British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. POWER—But it is a navigable stream.

Hon. Mr. KERR—That makes no difference. The soil under that navigable stream and the shores of it, belong to the province; it is only the water which should be dealt with by this parliament. I do not wish to interfere with this Bill being considered in the committee, but the principle on which we are asked to take action is open certainly to two objections; first, the objection mentioned by the hon. member from Belleville, and also on the ground that we have no right here to authorize by legislation the construction of the works specified in the Bill. If the provincial legislature confer a right within their jurisdiction for the construction of works, it might be necessary to get the authority from this parliament ancillary to that to permit them to cause an obstruction to navigation; but only to that extent ought this parliament to interfere. That question was very fully discussed two years ago, and again in a short way one year ago, when powers were given with reference to the interference with the waters of Rainy river by the Ontario and Minnesota Power Company. The question is one which deserves careful consideration, first, whether we should pass the Bill at all, and, second, whether, after having refused the various powers applied for two years ago, we should now confer them upon another company.

Hon. Mr. De BOUCHERVILLE—It seems to me this is a Bill which should be passed by the legislature of British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I understand there is a very much stronger ground of opposition to this Bill, and that it has practically got to this stage without the parties really interested in property up there knowing anything about it, and that several persons were induced to sign a petition in favour of it by misrepresentation and fraud. I am informed by a professional gentleman from Winnipeg, that the works at the junction, referred to in this petition, are where the firm of Lamb, Watson & Co., a large lumbering company, have invested nearly half a million dollars, and are bringing down this year 50,000,000 feet of lumber on those very waters. Now it is proposed by this Bill to confer on a small syndicate the right to exact tolls. The Bill is not one that can possibly be entertained when the facts are known. It is probably better that it should go to the committee, where all the parties can be heard; but it is just as well to warn hon. gentlemen in advance, of the fact that the parties who propose to form themselves into a company and exact tolls, are interested in that section to a very small degree, and the presumption is that the object is to bring pressure on the larger companies. The Bill contains powers of expropriation. They may expropriate property worth half a million dollars when they have not probably ten thousand dollars interest in the locality. Another feature I observe in the Bill is this: they can go into operation when they pay in $1,250, and exercise the extraordinary powers conferred on the syndicate by this Bill. I merely mention these points that have been communicated to me. I first received a telegram from Revelstoke requesting me to have this Bill delayed until the parties interested could appear in Ottawa. Mr. Watson was out of the Chamber at the time, and I handed it to another hon. gentleman to be used in case I should be absent when the Bill came up. I hope the committee will thoroughly sift the Bill before it passes

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It looks very much like an ordinary hold-up Bill.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If there are no merits in the Bill, and if it is as colourable as is indicated by the leader of the government in this Chamber, and if it will involve bringing witnesses and others interested all the way from British Columbia at their own expense, and is an invasion, to the extent mentioned, of very important interests in British Columbia, why should we accept the principle of it by giving it a second reading?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Let it stand for a week.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It seems to me the proper course to take is to refuse to give it a second reading. If there is any hon. gentleman present who can controvert the statements that have been made here to-day, and show that the Bill has merits, we may then accept the principle.

Hon. Mr. POWER—We should either kill the Bill now or let it go to committee at once, because the legal gentleman to whom my hon. friend the Secretary of State has referred is in the city now, from Winnipeg, and it is not desirable that he should be kept waiting here as he would be if the second reading were deferred for a week. I know very little of the merits of the case. I simply was asked to take charge of the Bill in the absence of the hon. gentleman from Portage la Prairie; but I think the general practice in this House is not to consider that there is any principle involved in the second reading of a private Bill. A private Bill is supposed to go to the committee, and I assume that if the statements which have been made here in relation to this Bill are correct, the committee will report that the preamble of the Bill has not been proven. It would be an unusual course to defeat a private Bill on the second reading.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—I think there is very much in what the hon. leader of the House says. This is a Bill that we ought to canvas carefully and analyse thoroughly. It strikes me very forceably that we have comparatively little information in reference to the rights that the company are asking for in that locality, and perhaps, we may be giving away an important water privilege that we know not of. It is true that it will be subject to an order in council; but we know that these things occur very frequently, not in the best interests of the country, and if what has been stated by the hon. gentleman from Halifax, that these men are here, and that they will appear before the committee and offer explanations, is correct, it is a reason why we might permit this Bill to go to the committee. Otherwise it appears to me, the hon. mover of the Bill has not that necessary information which would enable us to decide in favour of allowing this Bill to pass, only on the condition that it goes before the committee where parties connected with it will appear and explain the nature of the powers they are asking for, and which, according to the Bill, appear to be very extensive indeed. They regulate their tolls and every thing else, subject to an order in council. We ought to know definitely what those tolls are going to be, and the powers vested in the company. Under those conditions I will not oppose the Bill at the present time.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The learned gentleman from Winnipeg, of whom I spoke, is here to oppose the Bill.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—I might possibly relieve any doubt in the mind of the hon. leader of the opposition. I understand that the promoter of this Bill is to be in the city to-morrow, and the gentlemen who are opposing it have been here for two or three days. So far as any information we require with regard to either side of the question is concerned, we shall have both parties here by the time the Bill goes before the Railway Committee. I do not myself consider that this is a very proper kind of Bill, because the House will probably remember that practically the same Bill was brought before this House in 1904, and the Railway Committee appointed a special committee to deal with it. They remodeled the whole Bill and curtailed its powers to a very large extent, and when it left the committee, it was a very different measure from what it was when introduced. I find that on comparing this Bill with the original Bill brought in, known as the Thompson River Improvement Company Bill, this measure is identically the same, excepting that the second clause declares it to be a work for the general advantage of Canada. I do not myself consider that this Bill is one which should be allowed to go through in the shape in which it stands; but I asked that it be allowed to go to committee.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read second time.

CANADIAN MUSICAL AND DRAMATIC ASSOCIATION BILL.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière) moved concurrence in the amendments made by the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills to Bill (I) An Act to incorporate the Canadian Musical and Dramatic Association, Limited. He said: I am afraid there is some misapprehension about this Bill. I have been asked by the promoters of it, very respectable people indeed, amateurs of music, who think that Montreal should have a conservatoire of music—to explain it. They have been endeavouring to establish this institution, but lack of funds and encouragement from the public have prevented it becoming a success. They thought if they were granted the privilege they have asked for in their Bill that they might be able to establish a conservatoire of music. This conservatoire would be a place where young men could meet to study the art of music, and those who were the best pupils would be sent, at the expense of this association, to complete their studies in the old country. I find among the names given to me here, the following gentlemen: Mr. Edmond McMahon of the district of Montreal, who has been for many years one of the leading men in the chapel of the church of Notre Dame of Montreal, choir master in one of the most important churches; J. A. Boucher is also a musician; Mendoza Langlois has been engaged in all these musical associations, Zenon Fontaine, advocate, and J. Alfred Labelle, advocate. Two of these gentlemen have themselves founded a theatre in Montreal. I must say that this is altogether a technical matter. It appears they cannot get enough encouragement from the public. The idea, as I understand it, would be that they would simply sell tickets of admission to these theatres at the usual prices, sell only the number of tickets for which there are seats, and out of the price they would receive from the sale of these tickets, they would draw lots, and get certain premiums. That is the way I understand the Bill. I must say that I am not as familiar as I might be with all the details, and I regret it. The amendments are before the Senate, and perhaps, after discussion, some further amendment may be offered. However, I submit the amendments as they are, and ask the concurrence of the House in those amendments.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is an exceedingly praise-worthy thing of Montreal to establish a conservatoire of music, but one would think that in the large population Montreal has, over 400,000, they would not have to resort to so low down a method of getting subscriptions as to have a lottery of theatre tickets—theatre tickets of all things in the world. It is purely and simply based on the lottery principle. In the clauses that refer to the association, it is set forth that they may do certain things. The association may at any place in Canada build, purchase lands, acquire and operate theatres, and give dramatical and musical performances, and it may do a number of other things; but in none of the instances is the word 'shall' used. They are not bound to do any one of them—a variety of things that will be commendatory and quite in accord with the remarks of my hon. friend.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—There is no objection to the word 'shall.'

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—But the mode by which they will raise money is to acquire a theatre, and act in concert with a theatre. The tickets are issued for a theatre; you are not bound to go there so long as you buy a ticket. You share in a certain amount set aside out of the gross earnings of the theatre twice a month, and, if you win the prize, you get $100 or $150, whatever it might be, not depending on the number of people who sit in the theatre, or who bought tickets for the theatre, but as it is drawn, for the number of tickets that the theatre itself will hold, the seats, which shows what the object is plainly enough. In reference to this question of lotteries, there has been an expressed opinion by the Senate that they are not to be encouraged. Some fifteen or twenty years ago, when the subject first came up in this Chamber, a very strong appeal was made to exempt the Arts Union of England, but so strong was the feeling at that time against the encouragement of lotteries drawing prizes of any kind, that the Senate said no, and for some ten or fifteen years we would not even allow subscribers to the Arts Union, who are annual subscribers, and who receive annually a picture, share in the drawing of a higher class of picture, because it simply savoured of chance. We went that far, and up till last session the Arts Union of London, England, was excluded from that small privilege of giving to its own subscribers a high class picture, they already having paid their money annually, for which they got a picture; but the Senate was strongly impressed with the propriety of putting down raffles of that kind, because it was found that the drawings of the Arts Union were made a precedent of by other concerns, and, that by means of the numbers that were issued by the Arts Union they got in and distributed the money prizes according to the Arts Union system of drawing for pictures. The law on the subject is this:

> Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years imprisonment, and to a fine not exceeding $2,000, who makes, prints, advertises or publishes or causes or procures to be made, printed, advertised or published, any proposal, scheme or plan for advancing, lending, giving, selling or in any way disposing of property by lots, cards, tickets or any mode of chance whatever.

Now you violate the criminal law if you pass this Bill.

Subsection 3 says:

> Conducts or manages any scheme, contrivance or operation of any kind for the purpose of determining who or the holders of what lots, tickets, numbers or chances, are the winners of any property so proposed to be advanced, lent, given, sold or disposed of.

Clauses 15 of the Bill reads as follows:

> For the purpose of aiding the association to defray the aforesaid expenses for the maintenance of the said conservatory and of the said scholarships, the association may distribute, by means of the drawing of lots, a part of the receipts of the theatre managed by the association at its head office, among all the bearers of the tickets of admission to the performances given to the said theatre, but subject to the following conditions:—
> (a) Provided that the amount thus distributed at each drawing of lots shall never exceed fifteen per cent of the gross total receipts which the said theatre of the association would have given at the rate of admission charged by the association, if the theatre had been filled at each performance given since the last drawing of lots.

That is the way the Bill read before it was changed in committee. They struck out three lines in this clause, and limited it to collections by the theatres. It was limited then to all the tickets sold, and twice a month 15 per cent of the gross receipts were to be raffled for, and it was open to any one who happened to have a ticket. You need not go to the theatre; you might have bought ten or twenty tickets and have never gone near the theatre at all, but you would have twenty chances in the lottery which was to be held within a certain time. I was surprised indeed to see the names of the gentlemen who have been quoted as favouring this measure, and I may say that I was called upon to-day by a very influential deputation, who urged that this Bill ought to be allowed to go through, that it was harmless. I pointed out the law on the subject, and stated that the uniform policy of the Senate had been the suppression of lotteries, the evil of it had so often been brought to our notice, and the gambling spirit of the age is not to be encouraged. People will gamble, but do not let us make gambling legal; do not give the support of some superior association to it. The cause, no doubt, is a good one, if it is fairly carried out.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I thing the hon. gentleman should read the other restrictions, to be fair.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have read everything that was necessary.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Necessary for the hon. gentleman's argument, but not for fair play.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I shall read the other provisos. They are as follows:

(b) Provided moreover that no ticket of admission shall give a right to participate in the said drawing of lots unless the performance for which the said ticket has been sold has taken place, and that there has been at such performance a place in the theatre for the holder of such ticket, as provided for by the municipal and provincial regulations in force;

(c) Provided moreover that every holder of a ticket under the conditions aforesaid shall have the right to participate in the said drawing of lots, and that nothing beyond the regular price of admission shall be charged for such right.

That provides that there is a seat in the theatre for the holder of a ticket. It is admitted that the holder need not go to the theatre; all he has to do is to buy a ticket, and then he shares in the lottery. I do not think the two last provisos help us at all. On the contrary, they make it perfectly clear as to the terms and conditions on which the party shall buy his ticket, and on which he shall share in the lottery. Under these conditions, I would certainly ask this House to maintain the high position they have held in the past in regard to Bills of this kind, and decline to accept it. It is an indirect violation of the criminal law.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—In fairness to the measure, I would point out to the hon. gentleman that the word 'shall' is used. It provides that the said association 'shall' expend for the said conservatory an annual sum of not less than $20,000.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, but there is nothing to compel them to raise money. I challenge my hon. friend to sustain what he says: Clause 8, reads in this way:

8. The association may—

(a) at any place in Canada, build, purchase, lease, or otherwise acquire, and operate, theatres and give therein dramatic or musical performances;

(b) build, purchase, lease, or otherwise acquire a conservatory in the city of Montreal for the teaching of vocal and instrumental music, elocution, declamation and the dramatic art;

(c) establish and maintain elsewhere in the Dominion of Canada branches of the said conservatory;

(d) found and maintain scholarships for sending pupils from its conservatory to study in foreign conservatories;

(e) exercise all other powers necessary or expedient for the aforesaid purposes.

When my statement was challenged that there was nothing compelling the company to do anything else except to hold this lottery, I would refer to the enacting subclauses in clause 8. There is nothing to compel them to do it. They simply have the right to do it. There is nothing obligatory on them to do it. They can hire a theatre, and they can sell tickets to that theatre, and the profits of the sale of the tickets twice a month will be divided amongst the ticket holders. I do not think you could have a clearer lottery practice than that.

Hon. Mr. POWER—In addition to the objections to clause 15 which the hon. Secretary of State has pointed out, and also to clause 8, it strikes me that the first paragraph of clause 8 is objectionable. That paragraph states that the association may at any place in Canada, build, purchase, lease and otherwise acquire and operate, theatres, and give dramatic or musical performances. It does not seem to me that it is a desirable thing that we shall here incorporate a body with power to enter into competition all over Canada with the existing theatrical houses. That is an objectionable feature. Those theatres are institutions which come peculiarly within the provinces of the local legislatures, and have been dealt with, have been established, and the companies incorporated by the local legislatures, and it is therefore objectionable that we should here authorize one company to enter into competition in all the provinces with those theatres. The object of the Bill, to develop the musical talent of the country, is a very good object ; but, as the hon. Secretary of State has pointed out, the real substance of the Bill is to be found in clause 15, which is simply a clause authorizing them to gamble. I am not opposed to the Bill, but I think it will bear amendment, and if that is the feeling of the House, I shall move, seconded by Hon. Mr. Ellis, that the amendments be not now concurred in, but that the Bill be referred back to the Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills, with instructions to further amend the same by removing the provisions with respect to lotteries.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I have no intention of discussing the Bill at very great length, but there is a matter that I cannot forget. The instructions given by my hon. friend, the member for Halifax, asking this House to refer back to the committee the consideration of this Bill is useless, I think. And why ? We have already enjoyed the light which the hon. gentleman brought before that committee. I remember we were all sitting together discussing the merits of the Bill——

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The hon. gentleman cannot discuss what was said in committee.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I am not discussing it. If the hon. gentleman would give me a little more time, he would learn what I was going to say. I remember the day when, if we may rely on what has been reported, not to say what took place in another part of this House, but what was reported—I may refer to that—when it was stated that in one of the committees of this House—I do not say what committee—

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Order, order.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I am not referring to it. The report of the committee is here. It has been brought in, and we know what it decides. I am not speaking of that. There is a motion to refer the report back to committee, with certain instructions. I say if what I heard reported is true, it is useless to make that recommendation.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—That is a reflection on the committee.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It is not a reflection on the committee ; I say if what is reported is true—I am not saying what took place at all.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Is that report in order?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—How many times has the hon. gentleman risen in his place in this House and referred to things which took place in this House. The hon. gentleman should know what the rule is.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I do.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I am not referring to what took place in committee. He has no right to call me to order ; but I may refer to what I have heard, so much so that when a speech is made in the House of Commons and is reported in the newspapers, we may refer to that speech, because we get it from another source than the reports of the proceedings of that House. We get it from the public press. What we obtain from the public papers, I may get from the public utterances in this House or outside of it by hon. members. That is what I refer to. I did not refer to what took place in committee. I do not know what took place in committee. I was told. I heard officers tell me, that one day in the committee an hon. member came there and said ' Do you know what we are doing gentlemen '—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

The SPEAKER—The hon. gentleman cannot refer, even in an indirect way, to what took place in the committee.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I never said it took place. I said I heard that it took place.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—The hon. gentleman is arguing; if he is arguing anything at all, it is that it is no use to refer the Bill back to committee, because the committee will not obey the mandate of this House. That is what he is arguing.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman did not understand my argument at all. I never said so. I never said that the committee would not take into consideration the mandate of this House. I said it was useless to do so; it might take into consideration, and it might adopt the mandate of this House, or might give reasons why it should not adopt the mandate of this House. I never said it would not take it into consideration, and the hon. gentleman is going too far. He did not understand my argument at all. The hon. gentleman said that this was against the criminal law. Will the hon. gentleman say here that that phase of the question was not presented to the committee? I shall rely upon him. I will not say what took place in the committee. The hon. gentleman cannot say.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Surely the hon. gentleman would not want me to state what took place or what did not take place in committee? Officially I know nothing about it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It must have taken place.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman says so.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—And the hon. gentleman is unable to contradict me. He could not contradict me, because he knows.

The SPEAKER—The hon. gentleman could not contradict or affirm, because he has no right to state what took place in the committee.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is what I am doing. I do not affirm that; I defy him to contradict. If I have no right to say what took place in the committee, I have a right to ask the hon. gentleman if really such a great objection as this was not raised in the committee.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The hon. gentleman wants to know what took place in the committee, by proxy.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—No, it is not proxy. He says the clause is contrary to the criminal law. We all know that, and it is for that reason this Bill is presented. When the Arts Union Bill was before the House, it was a violation of the criminal law, and it was precisely for that reason that my hon. friend from St. John introduced that measure, to place the Arts Union outside the pale of the law. More than that, what is a gambling game? What is a lottery? Could the hon. gentleman tell me what a lottery is?

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I have had no experience.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—But the hon. gentleman knows the term. The fact that we say a thing is a lottery does not really make it a lottery. If the hon. gentleman will look at the criminal law he will see that a lottery is a scheme in which you risk your money to get something or to get nothing at all. You run your chance; you take a ticket; you may lose your money or double it, or treble it to any amount.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I call the hon. gentleman's attention to the definition of a lottery in subsection (b) of the clause which refers to it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If the hon. gentleman will allow me to discuss it, we will give him a chance to reply. I have not section (b) in my hand. I am asking what constitutes a lottery?

Hon. Mr. KERR—The statute states what a lottery is.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If the hon. gentleman desires to speak, I will let him have his chance. Does he wish to make his speech now? I think there is a rule which states that one member should not interrupt another, especially when he is requested not to. The hon. gentleman will have all the chance he wants.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I was rising to a point of order.

The SPEAKER—The hon. gentleman will please not interrupt.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—There is no chance that the person who buys a ticket will not get the worth of his money; you buy a ticket and go to the concert. You get what you pay for, and you have a right to draw prizes to the extent of 15 per cent of the gross receipts of the company. Even though you fail to draw a prize, you have something for your money. This is only an inducement to bring people to the theatre. They are not permitted to sell tickets beyond the capacity of the House. The capacity of the building limits the number of tickets that may be sold. No tickets shall be given unless the holder has a seat in the house. There is no lottery in that. Those clauses are more restricted than the clauses we imposed on the Arts Union of London. Is it because this happens to be a Canadian company that we refuse to give them all the privileges we give to an English company? This is an arts association. It appeals to the ear as the other union appealed to the eye. I do not see why we should refuse to this company what we granted to the other. Last year, when we adopted the Bill proposed by my hon. friend, it was pointed out that it was establishing a precedent, and that we could not refuse similar applications in the future. I shall vote against the amendment.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—I have just received a note from the promoters of the Bill saying they do not want to establish a lottery of any kind, and are ready to accept the amendment of the hon. member from Halifax. They are willing to have the Bill referred back to the committee, in order to strike out of it any vestige of a lottery principle.

The amendment was agreed to.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (KK) An Act to incorporate the Abitibi and Hudson Bay Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Power.)

Bill (LL) An Act respecting the Canadian Northern Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Young.)

Bill (MM) An Act respecting the Hamilton Radial Electric Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Gibson.)

MEATS AND CANNED FOODS BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (33) An Act respecting the inspection of Meats and Canned Foods.

(In the Committee.)

On clause 12,

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The House may remember that considerable discussion took place with respect to clause 12 which provides :

All articles prepared for food in any establishment and packed in cans or similar receptacles, or in any package whatever, shall be subject to inspection during the whole course of preparation and packing ; and all such packages shall be marked with—

(a) the initials of the Christian names, the full surname, and the address, or, in the case of a firm or corporation, the firm or corporate name and address of the packer;

(b) a true and correct description of the contents of the package.

The hon. Minister of Agriculture, who originally devised this Bill, has consulted with several parties who feared that their trade would be interfered with by this provision, and he has advised me that he is prepared to consent to this amendment :

Provided, however, that if it be established to the satisfaction of the Governor in Council that such marking would hinder the sale of any of said articles in the British market, he may exempt such articles from the provisions of this section.

I understand that this is agreeable to the parties who feared that their business would be endangered by the provision in the former clause, and therefore I move that these words be added.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—Would the hon. gentleman have any objection to adding after the word ' British ' ' or European ' ?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—No, that seems reasonable. I think there is no objection.

The amendment was changed and adopted.

On clause 2, subclause (a),

Carcases means the carcases of cattle, swine, sheep, goats or poultry.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—On reading this clause, I was struck with certain phrases made use of. There is one animal very extensively used as food, an animal which has contributed probably more than all other animals to the advancement of science. It is connected with no less important a subject than electricity. It is an animal that is exported or was, up to a few months ago, exported in large quantities to the United States. It is used there to stimulate the jaded appetites of those voluptuous Sybarites who have destroyed their digestion by indulgence. That will give an idea of the value of the animal. It is the 'rana esculanta', or common frog. This animal was a subject of discussion at Washington. The Canadians exported it in such large quantities, and the value of it was so great that certain Americans called on the Secretary of the Treasury in relation to it. The Secretary of the Treasury heard their complaints, and so strong were their statements and arguments, that they proceeded to define what the nature of this animal was. Was it fish or flesh? It is a fish at one period of its life, and may be a terrestrial animal at another—it is in fact amphibious. This animal was the subject of a prolonged dispute, and after learned men and all the naturalists had pronounced their views upon it, it was decided to place this animal in the category of chickens. There is a law in the United States which provides that any article imported into that country and which is not classed in the tariff, may be taxed by its close relation to a thing which is taxed. They thought the flesh of frog resembled chicken, and they classified it as chicken. My reasons for saying all this is, that when I read this clause I found that we were called upon to pronounce that poultry has a carcase. What is the meaning of putting that word poultry in this clause? It would be consulting good taste and euphony to have this word stricken out of the clause. Poultry are turkeys, geese, hens, &c. Pigeons and pheasants are not classed as poultry, so you see the term is confined to certain birds. I do not see why poultry should be put in the same class as the animals named in the clause, contrary to the usage of naturalists and contrary also to the recognized use of the term. No butcher applies the term carcase to a turkey. It is used in relation to cattle, swine, sheep and goats, and the term 'carcase' is applied only when the head, hide, hoofs and entrails are removed. It is for this House to pronounce on this phrase whatever way it likes, but I think it is contrary to good taste, it is an error in grammar and it is contrary to natural history. It is no reason why we should pass it because it passed the House of Commons. I should be sorry to think this clause was allowed to pass in this House without recording my objection to it. Any one who reads it will wonder if there was not enough intelligence in the House to strike it out. I do not see what possible use it is there, or that removing it can interfere with the merit of the Bill in any way. Unless the right hon. gentleman, who has charge of the Bill, can justify its use, I would like to strike out that word 'poultry'. I move that the word 'poultry' be struck out of the clause.

The amendment was rejected, and the clause was adopted.

On subclause (d),

(d) 'Food' includes every article used for food or drink by men, and every ingredient intended to be mixed with the food or drink of man for any purpose.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not know why 'drink' should be classed as a food. Would you consider a glass of whisky and water as food?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I will inquire of the Minister of the Agriculture, who is supposed to be an expert, why the term is included in the clause.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It seems to me an extraordinary definition of the word 'food.'

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What application has that to the Bill? There is no provision made for the inspection of liquids.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I am bound to say that the word does look dubious in this Bill, which is supposed to refer to meats. I suspect it is put in to give a latitude to examining of every thing that could be construed as an article of food.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Bovril is an article which I think would come under that description.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The Bill has been carefully prepared by the department, and I do not think any possible harm can arise from passing it in its present shape.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 5,

5. Unless the minister otherwise directs, upon the report of an inspector, animals owned by farmers and slaughtered by them on their own premises, and animals slaughtered by retail butchers on their own premises, shall not be subject to inspection under the provisions of this Act.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—This is an exceedingly important provision, and I do not know what object the minister had in excluding animals slaughtered by farmers, and especially animals slaughtered by butchers. It would have been better if we had reserved the right to make inspection where a complaint was filed. It is strongly suspected that a great many animals that will not pass inspection, such as animals that have lump jaw or diseases of that kind, sometimes, because they are so cheap, are bought by retail merchants and sold by retail. They are not subject to inspection, and many people buy that kind of meat not knowing that any thing is wrong with it, and, in that way, are using meat that is not in a sound condition. It would have been better if the minister had reserved the right to inspect where there was any complaint filed, that there was reason to believe a butcher had sold the meat of a diseased animal. He should have reserved that power. This throws the gate open virtually to permit farmers to slaughter diseased animals at home and sell the meat on the market by the quarter. Nobody would know if the animal had been diseased, and the meat is bought and used. For instance, a farmer has an animal that has lump jaw, which precludes the possibility of selling it for export; he may slaughter that animal on his own farm and sell it to a local butcher, who may be ignorant of the fact that it is not fit for food. The affected part is cut off and thrown away, and the rest of the meat is sold.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—As I understand, this Bill applies to the export trade?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Chiefly.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—And does not refer to animals slaughtered for consumption in the country; because if all the cattle slaughtered for food had to be inspected, you would require more inspectors than the government could pay for.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I do not think you can go further than clause 5. If a farmer could not slaughter an animal without having an inspector examine it, you would make the Act so restrictive that it would have to be repealed.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Clause 5 is necessary, because clause 2 provides that an establishment means 'any abattoir, packing house, or other premises in which such animals are slaughtered.' Therefore, if clause 5 were not there, it would include the premises of farmers, and the farmer would not be allowed to slaughter any animal on his premises unless he had it inspected. Clause 5 exempts farmers premises from the operation of the law, but reserves to the minister the right to provide for an inspection, if he thinks proper.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I wish to direct the attention of the hon. gentleman from Wellington to clause 10 which provides for the case he speaks of:

10. Any person slaughtering, or permitting the slaughtering of, animals and selling, or offering for sale or transportation, for export a carcase, or any portion or product thereof, which is unhealthy or unfit for food is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to one year's imprisonment.

That is not limited to a case where the slaughtering takes place in an establishment.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—I think that clause is as good a clause as could possibly be framed for the enforcing of this Act.

If there be what the hon. gentleman referred to, any disease in the neighbourhood, any lump jaw or whatever it otherwise might be, the inspector will have the opportunity, and the minister will direct that he shall examine into the condition of cattle in that locality and direct that the farmer be not permitted to slaughter a diseased animal. It would never do to place the whole of this matter in the position that no animal could be slaughtered without the permission of the inspector. Therefore, I think you could not select a clause that would answer and enable justice to be done to the farmer better than by clause 5 as it stands.

On clause 6,

The directors, after the whole of the capital stock has been subscribed for and fifty per cent thereof paid up in cash, may increase the capital stock, from time to time, to an amount not exceeding five hundred thousand dollars, but such increase of capital shall not take place unless and until a resolution of the directors authorizing such increase has been approved of by a vote of two-thirds in value of the shareholders present or represented by proxy at a special general meeting called for that purpose or at the annual meeting.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—Is this inspection to be made by the inspectors of fowl, turkey, geese, and so on?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I understand so.

On clause 7,

Every carcase or portion or product thereof prepared for food in any establishment and packed in cans or similar receptacles, or in any package whatever, shall be subject to inspection during the whole course of preparation and packing; and after all the requirements of this Act regarding inspection have been complied with, and not until then, all such packages shall be marked by the inspector in such manner as is provided by the regulations.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Would this clause be sufficiently far reaching to deal with a carcase that is not packed in a can or a similar receptacle? In many large abattoirs the beef is shipped, for instance, in quarters to different parts of the Dominion in cold storage. It seems to me that this clause would not be sufficiently large to deal with that case, because there has been really no packing.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Would clause 6 not reach the objection of my hon. friend fully? That would appear to deal with the point he raises.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It depends on the regulations as to whether they would meet that.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I think it would. I would just say to my hon. friends, as they very well know, this Act was drawn by the Minister of Agriculture, and in special reference to the scandals which had arisen in the United States and which have done such an enormous amount of damage to their export trade, particularly in canned goods. The other portions of the Act are incidental, and, as the hon. gentleman knows, it is practically impossible to enforce too rigid inspection in such a Dominion as ours. He could not, for instance, in the territory he represents, which covers I do not know how many hundreds of miles, with people living five, ten and fifteen miles apart, have inspectors examine every hog, cow or animal.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I quite appreciate that. I refer to the larger abattoirs, where meats are prepared for sale, and where they are frozen and shipped as frozen, or partially frozen, chilled products.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Clause 10 contains very severe penalties against parties who sell improper meat. I think the two taken together would cover the ground. Perhaps my hon. friend had better wait until we get to clause 10, and then we can consider the two together.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 9,

9. Every carcase, or portion or product thereof, found, upon inspection or reinspection, to be unhealthy or unfit for food, or which contains such ingredients or preservatives as may render it unfit for food, shall be marked by the inspector in such manner as is provided by the regulations, and shall thereupon be deemed to be condemned as unfit for food and shall be disposed of as provided by the regulations.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—Is there any definition given of the preservative? Does the minister define it?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—That must be done by regulation. You cannot pretend to put those things into an Act of parliament.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 10,

Any person slaughtering, or permitting the slaughter of, animals and selling, or offering for sale or transportation, for export a carcase, or any portion or product thereof, which is unhealthy or unfit for food is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to one year's imprisonment.

2. Every one who is convicted of this offence after a previous conviction for the same crime shall be liable to two years' imprisonment.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is there any provision relating to the slaughtering of diseased animals which are sold for home consumption ? This clause refers exclusively to exportation.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I think it goes further than that. There is no doubt that the main design of the Act is to guard our export trade in these articles. Under the general Act, if my memory serves me, the law which was lately passed, the Revised Statutes, there are penalties inflicted on people who sell food in improper condition, but I have not the general Act here.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 12,

All articles prepared for food in any establishment and packed in cans or similar receptacles, or in any package whatever, shall be subject to inspection during the whole course of preparation and packing ; and all such packages shall be marked with—

The CHAIRMAN—This is the clause to which the following amendment has been proposed :—

Provided, however, that if it be established to the satisfaction of the Governor in Council that such marking would hinder the sale of any of said articles in the British and other European market, he may exempt such articles from the provisions of this section.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is relegating the legislative powers altogether to the Governor in Council, so far as marking of goods is concerned. When this question was under discussion before, the hon. gentleman from Montague called attention to the fact that the marking and putting of labels on lobster cans would affect their sale. I remember some years ago, when I was visiting the canneries, particularly the lobster canneries on the Island of Prince Edward, that a number of them were owned and worked by citizens of the United States, and they put no labels except Yankee labels on the products of our own fisheries. My attention was called to it at the time. I am not aware that any law has been passed since to prevent that practice. But the character of the lobsters which were caught on the shores of Prince Edward Island was so superior to the character of those that were caught in the United States, that the United States operators who owned and were working the canneries, put their own United States labels upon the lobsters that were put up in the canneries on the island. I remember very well calling the attention of the government to that fraud, because it was nothing else, and it was taking credit to the United States for the superiority of an article which they obtained in Canadian fisheries. I have no recollection, at present, if any law was passed preventing the canneries from putting foreign labels upon the articles produced in Canada, but such a law should be enacted.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I cannot answer that question of my hon. friend, but my own impression is that ultimately it will be found to be very much in the interests of the packers themselves and the producers of these articles to have them labelled as Canadian goods, and I was a good deal surprised at the objection to the proviso for that reason. But lobster packers, and I think the salmon packers in British Columbia represented very strongly to the government, that their trade would be damaged unless this particular exemption were permitted.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think the statement of the hon. gentleman is quite correct. These goods canned in the Dominion are known in the markets of Europe to be superior to those which are canned in the United States, and it is a gratifying fact to know that a Canadian label placed upon many of our articles which are exported now to Europe, brings higher prices than those exported from United States. At the time to which I refer such was not the case.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—That is true. It may interest my hon. friend who preceded me in the present department, to know that the agents in several cases have reported that now-a-days United States goods are being constantly labelled as Canadian, for the purpose of obtaining a market in England.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—I am not able to answer the hon. senator from Belleville, as to whether there are any United States labels put on lobster cans in Prince Edward Island canneries or not, but I know a great number of our Prince Edward Island lobster packers label the cans with the island, or some Canadian label, and these lobsters are all exported to the United States market. What is provided by this Bill and what this amendment covers, is that continental buyers, and I think, Canadian buyers also, who wish to have lobsters from our island, may order their cans sent without a label, so that they can use their own label. I think it will be better to have all the lobsters labelled as Canadian, and that will in time be done. It will cost more money if we emboss the cans, as we would wish to.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—It would not apply to Australia or to other important markets. I would suggest that the clause be made to read:

But to any of said articles in markets outside of Canada.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—I do not know that the Australians or any other continental buyers object to their being labelled.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Which clause provides for putting a date on the can? It is not clause 12?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I think that was thrown out.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—That was for the time being dropped. I am bound to say that my own opinion is that all these articles of food in cans should be dated, but this is a tentative measure and we want to move slowly and not disturb the trade unnecessarily.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—What is the use of inspection if the purchaser is not protected in some way, even for our own people? I would label lobsters particularly, as it would have the effect of stopping the use of them, because I do not think you can eat anything more unwholesome. Here are gentlemen from British Columbia on the west, and Prince Edward Island on the east, requesting that the can label be removed, simply to comply with the request of some packers for reasons that they cannot give, except for the sale of it. If is a melancholy fact that such a feeling does exist. I do not know when the spirit will arouse the people to insist on the names and dates being placed on all canned foods.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The reason is this; the lobster trade is in an excellent position. It is a very lucrative business. The prices are satisfactory, and the reputation of the goods is all right to comply with the requirements of the European markets. It will spoil the trade altogether if you insist on placing your own label on the can. Then there is the further difficulty that in the lobster business there are any number of very small factories, and the expense of providing dies for the cans would be very great, and then if they were dated they would have to be changed continually and it would hamper and injure the business. I think the amendment the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce suggests will work all right, and I learn now that the date was omitted. The Bill was amended in regard to the date in the House of Commons, and that is not now a feature of the Bill. Therefore the amendment that is proposed will, I think, cover the case, and, as far as I can learn, it is only with reference to the European market, and more especially with the continental market, that the difficulty arises.

Clause 12 as amended was adopted.

No person shall offer or accept for export, or shall export, any articles subject to inspection under this Act, unless its requirements regarding inspection and marking have been complied with in respect to such articles.

2. No clearance shall be granted to any vessel carrying any carcases, or any portions of products thereof, unless they are duly marked in accordance with the provisions of this Act.

3. The provisions of this section shall not apply to meats intended for consumption on board the vessels by which they are shipped from a Canadian port.

4. At the request of the owner of any establishment, the inspector in charge thereof shall issue certificates of inspection for any carcases or portions or products thereof intended for export. Such certificates shall be in such form as is provided by the regulations.

Hon. Mr. POWER—As to subclause 3, why should the provisions of this section not apply to meats? Why should not the sailors on board the vessels, and other people, be protected as well as the customers on the other side of the water?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—There is an immense number of little vessels that take small cargoes with them, particularly from my hon. friend's own province. You cannot require all those to have a certificate. The same rule prevents us in No. 5 from inspecting the carcases slaughtered by farmers.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Is there any penalty in clause 15 ?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—None that I know of, except the prohibition.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Clause 26.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Yes, clause 26.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Looking at clause 15, and subclause 4, it would appear it was the intention to have an inspector in each establishment.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am glad to hear it is not so, but that is what it reads like. Clause 15 reads :

15. In the event of the provisions of this Act, or any regulations, or the lawful instruction of an inspector not being complied with in any establishment, the minister may withdraw the inspector therefrom, and may refuse to it the inspection, marking and certification of the articles prepared therein, and may cause the establishment to be closed.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—If the hon. gentleman will look at clause 11, he will see that it describes what establishments shall have an inspector.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—And an inspector may be in charge of many establishments.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Clause 16 deals with cases where inspectors have been established. The provisions of 3, 4 and 6, down to 10 apply to such establishments as are designated by order in council. It will be assumed that a good many will be designated, otherwise there will be no inspection, and, under clause 15, it does seem that there was to be an inspector in each establishment.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—That is simply impossible.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The minister may withdraw the inspector therefrom.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—An inspector may look after one hundred establishments.

The clause and subclauses were adopted.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK, from the committee, reported progress and asked leave to sit again to-morrow.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (RR) An Act respecting the City of Toronto Yonge Street Bridge.—(Hon. Mr. Kerr.)

The Senate adjourned until Three o'clock to-morrow.

SENATE.

OTTAWA, Thursday, March 7, 1907.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (SS) An Act to amend an Act respecting the Canadian Assessment Policyholders in the Mutual Reserve Life Insurance Company.—(Hon. Mr. Domville.)

Bill (TT) An Act to incorporate the Ottawa Terminals Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Edwards.)

INSPECTION OF BANKING INSTITUTIONS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON rose to call the attention of the House to the following extract from the presentment of the grand jury at the Assize Court in its recent sitting at Toronto :

We are of the opinion that it is the duty of the Dominion government to at once establish some system of inspection of our banking and other monetary institutions that will safeguard the investing public from deceitful and fraudulent statements issued by boards of directors, who apparently, in this institution, have been grossly negligent of their duty as trustees for the shareholders of the bank.

And the following reply of His Honour Justice Mabee :

His Lordship also referred to the fact that the grand jury had made a very timely suggestion in regard to the above matter, arising out of the failure of the Ontario Bank, and that undoubtedly the government would step in and enact a law for the stricter inspection of banking institutions.

And to inquire if it is the intention of the government to introduce a measure during the present session of parliament providing for an inspection of Canadian banking institutions ?

He said : I do not intend to make any observations upon this matter, although the notice would entitle me to do so. I will reserve to myself the right to place another notice on the paper at a later date, after I have the answer of the government, and will then make some remarks on the matter.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is not the intention of the government to introduce a measure, during the present session of parliament, providing for an inspection of Canadian banking institutions.

TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH COMMISSIONER.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS moved :

That in the public interest the government should appoint an expert officer in connection with the Board of Railway Commissioners of Canada, to be called a Telephone and Telegraph Commissioner, whose duties shall be to have full control, as regards construction, location, maintenance and operation of all telegraph and telephone lines in Canada.

He said : The reason I gave notice that I would move this resolution, is on account of the fact that I suppose is probably known to the majority of hon. gentlemen in this House, that the telegraph system in this country, at the present time, is not in the state in which a first-class service should be. My motion refers to the telephone service as well. I intend to take up the question of the telegraph service first, and, after dealing with that, I will briefly deal with the question of the telephone service in the country. I have made the statement, in the first place, that the telegraph system is bad, so far as the district from which I come in the western provinces is concerned. I am sure every hon. gentleman from that part of the country, in this House, will bear me out in the statement that the telegraph service is very bad.

I have known cases where people sending messages two or three hours before taking a train, have arrived at their destination a couple of hours before the delivery of the message. That is not exceptional ; it is of frequent occurrence in the west. With reference to the powers of the Railway Commissioners, I find they have no jurisdiction in this matter at all. I understand there is a telegraph expert in connection with the Department of Railways, and a portion of his time is devoted to the Railway Commission, to give them information or advice with reference to this particular subject ; but there is no authority in the Dominion at the present time to deal with the telegraph system. The telegraph service in a country like this is very important. All the business transactions of the country to-day are, practically, carried on by telegraph, and it is a serious matter that that service is not regulated in any way. It is a question that should be taken up and considered by the government. I believe the time is coming, and at no very distant period, when the telegraph system of this country will have to be taken over by the government. There is no reason why the government should not manage the telegraph as it manages the post office service. It is not right or proper that a telegraph system should be under the control of any railway corporation. All the news of the country is disseminated through the country practically under the control of the railway companies. There are many things that the people are interested in knowing ; but they must be filtered through the railway corporations. If a business man wants to get a low rate from a railway company that does not control the telegraph, he may have his despatch looked into by the rival railway company. We have heard of a listening board in Toronto in connection with the telephone, and I am satisfied there is something of the kind in connection with the telegraph system, and that through it the railway companies get possession of facts which they should not have in their possession.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If the government owned and operated the telegraphs and telephones, could they have a listening board just as well as if the lines were owned by companies ?

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—No, I do not think so, because there would be no object in doing so. There are many business men all over this country who have to ship freight, and they are trying to get the best rates possible, and the railway company that controls the telegraph lines is very anxious to find out these things and has an object in keeping a listening board, whereas the state has none.

Hon. Mr. McKAY (Truro)—Except in elections.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—My hon. friend evidently speaks with authority. He knows more on that subject than I do. If a man has a case before the Railway Commission or before the courts and wants to telegraph for witnesses, he must do so through a service controlled by his opponent, and I do not think that that is fair to the business men of the country. The only way to remedy the evil is to give the state possession of the telegraph system. However, my motion does not deal with that. What I am after is, to have the telegraph system regulated. I may be told that it should be under the Railway Commission, but the Railway Commission is over-worked at the present time. We have recently thrown upon the commission the telephone and express tolls, and it will be months, probably years, before they can deal with all this business. In the meantime the most important public service in this country, after the railways, is left without any control whatever. If we had another commissioner appointed, who would be practically a member of the Railway Commission, but who would have power to sit the same as the County Court judge and decide questions relating to telegraph and telephone service, subject to an appeal to the Railway Commission, we would get far better service. If there was an appeal, he would be able to make a digest of the evidence and hand it to his colleagues, who could deal with more questions in one day under that system than they can at present in a month. One of my principal reasons for bringing this motion before the House is this—I will not use any moderate language in speaking of the system—the people in my part of the country have been and are being robbed by the telegraph companies. That is putting it mildly, and, when I submit the figures to the House, they will say that I am speaking by the book. I do not see why the people west of the great lakes should pay more for telegraph service than the people east of the great lakes. It does not cost more to send a message 300 miles than to send it 100 miles, provided it does not have to be repeated.

That is a well known fact. A telegraph message from here to North Bay, if it is not repeated, would not cost the company any more than a message to Carleton Place. Then why should there not be a flat rate all over, where messages are not to be repeated? We should have a flat rate. Take Winnipeg as one point, and Edmonton as another; there is a distance of 827 miles between those two places, and the messages have not to be repeated—they have a straight wire right through. It does not cost any more to send a message to Edmonton, than to send a message 20 miles out of Winnipeg; but the company say 'Look at the distance and the cost of maintenance of that line?' But should the whole cost of that telegraph line be imposed on the cities of Winnipeg and Edmonton? All the stations between these points are doing business, and why should not each one of them bear a proportion of the cost of maintenance and construction of that line? So they do. It would not cost the company any more to send a message from Winnipeg to Edmonton than to send a message 20 miles for 25 cents. That is the rate they should charge; but they do not do it, because there is nobody to force them to do it at the present time. Now I shall quote some of the rates the people of the west have to pay, and will compare them with rates paid in the east. A short time ago I walked into a telegraph office here and asked the clerk in charge how much it would cost to send a telegram to Halifax? He said 30 cents. I looked up the distance and found that Halifax through Canadian territory is 949 miles from Ottawa, by the Intercolonial Railway. You can send a message to Sydney for the same rate, or to Prince Edward Island, which is in round figures 1,000 miles, for the same price, 30 cents. I said: I want to send a telegram to Fort William, which is, in round numbers, 850 miles; how much will that be? He said 75 cents. I ask, in all fairness, if that is right? Why should we have to pay 75 cents for a message which is sent 850 miles, for a service which the people here get for a longer distance for 30 cents? I shall read a list of the distances to go on record in the Debates, so that hon. gentlemen will be able to compare them :

| | Miles. | Day rate. | Night rate. |
|---|---|---|---|
| | | Cts. | Cts. |
| Winnipeg to St. John | 1904 | 75 | 75 |
| " Victoria, B.C | 1500 | 75 | 75 |
| " Calgary | 840 | 75 | 50 |
| " Regina | 357 | 40 | 30 |
| Ottawa to Toronto | 256 | 25 | 25 for 25 words. |
| " Windsor | 489 | 25 | 25 |
| " London | 376 | 25 | 25 |
| " Hamilton | 310 | 25 | 25 |
| " Quebec | 275 | 25 | 25 |
| " Halifax | 949 | 30 | 25 for 25 words. |
| " Prince Edward Island. Charlottetown | 998 | 30 | 25 for 10 words. |
| Winnipeg to Port Arthur | 426 | 75 | |
| " Edmonton | 827 | 75 | |
| " Moosejaw | 405 | 40 | |
| " Calgary | 846 | 75 | |
| " Regina | 358 | 40 | |
| " Brandon | 133 | 25 | |
| " Portage la Prairie | 56 | 25 | |
| " Prince Albert | 587 | 60 | |
| " Battleford | 573 | 65 | |
| " Port Arthur | 426 | 40 | |
| " Ottawa | 1247 | 75 | |
| Ottawa to Port Arthur | 821 | 75 | |
| Winnipeg to Minneapolis | 448 | 50 | |
| Ottawa to Prince Albert | 1834 | 1 00 | |
| " Chicago | 759 | 50 | |
| " New York | .... | 50 | |
| Toronto to Quebec | 508 | 25 | |
| Ottawa to Fort William | 821 | 75 | |

Now there is the striking part of it ; between here and Halifax 30 cents for 949 miles, and Winnipeg to Calgary, 827 miles, it is 75 cents for the same service. Is that just? I think there should be some authority to look after those people, and see that they do not impose on the public the way they have been doing in the past.

Regina 358 miles, 40 cents. You can send double the distance in this country for 30 cents.

From Winnipeg to Prince Albert, 587 miles ; we have to pay 60 cents for ten words. These rates are all based on a ten words message. We pay 60 cents as compared with Halifax, 949 miles, in round figures, for 30 cents—just half the price.

Battleford, 573 miles, 65 cents.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—How much for extra words ?

Hon. Mr. DAVIS.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I have not taken that up.

Winnipeg to Port Arthur, 460 miles.

Another matter that I wish to mention in dealing with this question is the manner in which it affects the press in this country. It is a well known fact that the people in the west have not been getting the telegraphic news that we should get, and I am to suppose that a great many people are not aware of the reason why we do not get it. The Dominion government, in 1903, passed an Act granting a subsidy to a newspaper organization in this country known as The Canadian Press Association. The reason why that was done was there was a general complaint in this country, that all the telegraphic foreign news that we got was filtered through United States channels, and, therefore, it was not to be relied upon, and a great many people in the country came to the conclusion that in order to get reliable news, we should have a Canadian Associated Press, who would establish in London an agency with a permanent resident agent there whose business it would be to collect the news and send it over here. The Dominion parliament voted a bonus towards this enterprise. The maximum amount of that bonus was to be $15,000 a year. The Associated Press was to pay dollar for dollar with the Dominion government, according to the money expended in this respect. That was to land this news in Montreal. A number of the newspapers in the eastern part of the country belong to the Associated Press, and I think each one of them had to contribute something like $1,000 a year in order to pay for the service. After the news is landed in the Dominion what do we find ? You can send that news all over the eastern provinces at the rate of 25 cents a hundred words. If it is sent to Prince Edward Island it will cost 30 cents, and if you send it to Winnineg, 50 cents. If you want to send it further than Winnipeg it will cost you one dollar. We have two daily papers in Winnipeg receiving the news, the 'Telegram' and 'Free Press,' and these are the only two papers west of Lake Superior that can afford to get the cabled news. In Regina we have two daily papers, and in Saskatoon we have two, and we have in Calgary two daily papers ; in Edmonton, two ; in Vancouver, one or two ; New Westminster, one, and two in Victoria, but these papers cannot afford to obtain the Associated Press cables, because it costs too much. I believe it is considered that there is about 1,200 words in an ordinary column of print, and you can understand the severity of the tax, when it costs one dollar for every hundred words. Very few of the daily papers in the western part of the country can afford to publish the cable despatches because it costs too much. There is no reason for that. I believe that at the present time in the western part of the country, the telegraphic service that the newspapers are getting, is coming through the United States channels, simply because they cannot afford to get it through the Canadian channel. The object the government had in giving that grant to the Associated Press was to have all the transatlantic news coming to this country pass through a Canadian channel ; but the very fact that the telegraph companies in Canada are allowed to charge exhorbitant rates has shut them off from getting the news from that source, and it has to be brought in through United States channels on account of the high rates which the railway companies, who own these telegraphic lines charge. I think it is time that matter was dealt with by parliament. Every person in this country helps to pay that $15,000 subsidy to the Associated Press, but we are prohibited from receiving any benefit from it on account of these tolls. I think I am not far astray when I say that some action should be taken by the government to see that the people of the western country are not fleeced as they have been in the past. People here may be getting value for their money, but we in the west are not. Of course we hear the argument that the companies in the east have a great deal of work to do, while the companies in the west have not. I say—and I defy contradiction—that the telegraphic system in the west cannot handle the business promptly, because they have more work than they can do. Therefore that argument falls to the ground. I think it is reasonable and right that we should bring this matter before parliament and ask that something be done with reference to it. With reference to the telephone system, I included it in my motion because, naturally, if we had a commissioner to deal with one service he would have to deal with the other, and he could relieve the Railway Commission by being able to deal with the express companies tolls as well. The telephone system of the country is a source of annoyance all the time. There is hardly a session that some grievance is not brought before the House with reference to this question simply because it has never been taken up and grappled with in the right way. They will tell you that competition is the thing you want. Every reasonable and sensible man knows that you cannot have competition in telephone service. It is a monopoly in its nature and you cannot make anything else of it. What man in this country wants to have three or four telephones of rival companies standing on his desk if he is doing business ? It is said, 'Let us have competition to cut down the rates, and regulate the service.' That means, you will require to have two telephones on the counter. Then if those two companies amalgamate as they have always done, or entered into a private agreement, you are in the same position. The people are not then satisfied, and the third company may come in and you will have three telephone services. That cannot be worked out. People will suffer and put up with a bad service, with being robbed in the way of rates and matters of that kind, before they will pay for two services. I point to Yorkton, up in my part of the country, in the county of Mackenzie. A gentleman came in there, with no very large amount of capital, and started a telephone company in connection with a few of the merchants of the town. He is giving everybody in that town an up-to-date service. His telephones are one hundred per cent better than those of the old Bell Telephone Company, because it is antiquated plant that has been pitched out of the larger cities which they have forced on us. The gentleman I have referred to, supplies an up-to-date service, with up-to-date machines, and for one-half the sum the Bell Telephone Company are asking, and he is making money for the shareholders. He has extended his line all through the rural districts, and the farmers have a first-class telephone service for $15 a year. We have a grievance with reference to the telephone system in the west, as well as with telegraph system, because it is not only the telegraph companies that are after the sheckels in the west. They all know we grow lots of wheat up there and are getting quite a lot of money, and these people are all after the money. I have not time to go into the whole question, but will compare a few of the rates in the west. I will refer now to the long distance telephone service :

From Ottawa to Montreal, a distance of about 116 miles in round figures, as far as I can gather, by the way the telephone line runs, and the charge is 50 cents. In other words they charge 50 cents for performing that service for a distance of 116 miles, and they charge us 50 cents for 50 miles. They base most of their charge on the mileage in the west. Ten miles ten cents and so on, until you get into the territories, and then you find some beautiful examples of how people are treated with reference to telephones.

From Regina to Balgonia, on the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway 18 miles, the people have to pay 35 cents. This is all for a two minutes service. From Lumsden, 20 miles from Regina, the rate is 35 cents, while from Ottawa to Montreal, over 116 miles, it is 50 cents ; to Carleton Place, 27 miles, it is 25 cents, and so on all down the line, so not only are we charged double by the telegraphic companies but we are also charged double by the telephone companies. It is about time that we had some relief from this octopus, because it is nothing else, the telegraphic system in the Northwest. They do not care when they transmit telegrams. Very often a lot of money may be involved in the necessity of getting a prompt answer, but when you send your telegram you may not get a reply in two days. I have a case of my own in mind now. Last fall I had occasion to go to Calgary from Regina, I sent a telegram to a friend of mine, Mr. Van Wart, asking him to meet me at the station on my arrival, as I could not stay long. I sent that telegram in the evening, expecting to leave half an hour afterwards. Unfortunately, one of those wrecks which have occurred so frequently of late took place, and the train did not leave Regina for five hours after I sent the telegram. When I got to Calgary, I met Mr. Van Wart at the station out of breath—he had just got my telegram and had to run to enable him to keep the appointment. If it had not been for the delay caused by the wreck, the telegram would not have been delivered until five hours after my arrival in Calgary. The same thing happened at Cartier, going up. I sent a telegram to a friend at Kenora to meet me on the arrival of the morning train, half-past five in the morning. I got there and went to meet my friend, but he was not there, I had to stay over the day, losing my pullman to Winnipeg. I went to a hotel and slept until nine, got breakfast and strolled down to the telegraph office and asked the operator why my telegram had not been delivered.. She said, 'I am just going to send it out now.' That was eleven o'clock in the day, twenty-four hours after sending the message to the telegraph office. These are illustrations of what we have to put up with. I think the time has come when the telegraph and telephone systems of this country should be under some control. We want somebody who will grapple with them and give us relief, and that is why I have brought this question before the House to day. It is a live issue, and I hope the government will see that something is done.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am sure we are all sorry to hear that the people of Prince Albert have been so badly treated by the telegraph and telephone companies as represented by my hon. friend. I am not going to discuss the general question with him further than to say that the fair judgment of everybody is that the value of a service depends on the conditions. The hon. gentleman gave us an illustration of the service between Ottawa and Fort William, a distance of 900 miles. The greater part of the way, the line runs through an uninhabited country where it is expensive to have it kept up. To illustrate what I am saying, we endeavour to keep up a telegraphic system between British Columbia and Dawson. It costs the people of this country forty or fifty thousand dollars a year, simply because there is only business at the two ends. The cost of keeping up lines in the particular sections to which he alludes is excessive. The department sends me this answer :

> The Board of Railway Commissioners already possess all the power proposed to be covered by the resolution. The commission has in its employ an expert electrician for telegraph, telephone and electric light, who advises on all work that comes before them, and the purposes for which an officer is suggested is already provided for.

I shall be glad to bring the remarks of the hon. gentleman to the notice of my colleagues, but we cannot accept the proposition he has submitted to the House, and I would therefore request him to withdraw his motion.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—One swallow does not make a summer, nor does the illustration given by my hon. friend with reference to the line between here and Fort William establish his case. If he will go through the country from Edmonton to Winnipeg he will find it thickly studded with towns, every one of them flourishing, and that there is more business done in one of these towns than in three towns of the same size in the east. The wires are kept hot night and day. There is very little of vacant country between Winnipeg and Calgary, but there are towns doing an enormous business in the grain season and at other times. Because there happens to be a few rock piles between here and Port Arthur, that does not make out a case against me at all. With reference to the officer of the department, I have taken the trouble to find out what his powers are, and, as far as I can learn from the chairman of the commission, he has no power, and the commission has no power to deal with the matter. However, if my hon. friend wishes me to withdraw the motion, as he is leader of this House, I shall do so, and let the country deal with the grievance.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am glad the hon. gentleman is willing to withdraw his resolution, because it goes a great deal further than he intended. It states that the duties of the inspector shall be 'to have full control as regards construction, location, maintenance and operation of all telegraph and telephone lines in Canada.' Those are almost unrestricted and unlimited powers which he askes parliament to give to one officer. That officer would have to deal with wealthy corporations. Telegraph and telephone companies are known to be, as a rule, very wealthy corporations. Looking at the revelations which are continually made with respect to officers of various corporations, does my hon. friend think that he can get any politically appointed officer, or an officer appointed in any other way, who can be trusted to deal with those immensely wealthy corporations ?

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—We can in the west ; I do not know about the east.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is one of the practical questions the hon. gentleman should have considered. It seems to be a most unbusiness like and unreasonable proposition to put such power as that into the hands of any one man. I do not undertake to say that the Railway Commission are doing all that they might do ; but it would be better, instead of making a sweeping change of this kind, to call their attention to the necessity of attending to these abuses to which the hon. gentleman has referred. No doubt there are abuses to-day. There are two ways in which those abuses may be remedied. Either way is perhaps, not objectionable. The abuses may disappear in this way : as I understand it, at the present time there is really only one line of telegraph in that western country ; but a second line of railway has been built to Prince Albert and Edmonton, and a third line is about to be built, and it seems to me that when you have telepragh lines owned and operated by the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Canadian Northern Railway and the Grand Trunk Pacific, there will be such competition as will reduce the rates to reasonable figures. I think the better way is not to be in a hurry, but to possess our souls with a certain amount of patience, and within a year or so these evils will be cured, without any government interference.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Halifax)—The hon. gentleman from Prince Albert has made out a strong case. What are governments for? To remove injustice and to secure fair-play to the people. The time will soon come when it will be necessary for the government to acquire the telegraphic and telephone lines throughout Canada. That is the condition of things not only in the mother country but in Australia and New Zealand, and it is the only way by which justice will be done. Some of those companies are getting too rich, and when they get too rich they get too saucy. They defy the people, and the people have to suffer from inferior service or high rates. Therefore, I think that the resolution of my hon. friend should not be dealt with so summarily as it has been by the hon. Secretary of State. It should receive more consideration. I regret that the resolution has not received more attention from this House than it has had.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—I entirely agree with the remarks which have been made by my hon. friend from Prince Albert. The abuses of which he has complained exist not only in the far west, but west of North Bay. I intended myself, in the course of the session, to bring this question up. It has been brought before the House in a masterly manner. I shall not go over the ground so well covered by my hon. friend, but will venture to answer the plea of the hon. Secretary of State which, in my estimation, is very specious. It is this, that because, in the west, there happened to be long intervening distances where there is no traffic for telegraph or telephone lines, the parties who live at the extremities of the lines should be made to pay double. That is neither right nor just, because, if it were, it would apply also to railroad fares. The railway fares are uniform, and if they are not uniform an injustice is being done. From here to Winnipeg the traffic is not as great as between here and Halifax. There are long intervals where there are few intermediate stations, and still the rates have to be the same. It is a matter of justice that they should be the same, and why should not the same principle prevail in the case of telephones and telegraphs. If those monopolists are losing money up west—a statement with which I am not prepared to agree—they certainly are making money down east and the surplus they have here should be used to reduce the rates up west. The rates should be uniform, and there is no reason why our friends in the west, because the country is young and the monopolists have special advantages, should be made to suffer and as in the case of telegraph communication be deprived of the advantage of having daily communication with the rest of the world. The telegraph and the telephone should be for the Dominion at large, and not for the benefit of particular sections of the country to the detriment of other sections. I therefore hope that the hon. Secretary of State will reconsider this question, and make up his mind to this, that sooner or later, but likely sooner, the question will have to be taken up, because it is one in which the Dominion at large is interested. It is moreover one of justice and fair-play, and although I am from the east myself, I love to give our friends in the west the same advantages that we possess in the east or as those possessed by the people of Ontario and Quebec, which happen to be in the centre.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I desire to say only one word, it is because this discussion is rather unfair to the Railway Commission. I am not aware that the Railway Commission has ever been called upon to take action on the question which has been made the subject of the present discussion, and it seems to me that the first step to have taken should have been an application to them; then reasons would have been shown either for or against the application. It was only last session that we passed an Act placing telephones under the jurisdiction of the Railway Commission, and as far as the telegraph lines are concerned I think they are only partially under the Railway Commission. What is suggested by the hon. member from Prince Albert is to appoint one man as a commissioner to act alone, for the purpose of dealing with telephone and telegraph lines. If that were done we would have the Railway Commission superseded entirely as regards a part of the equipment of railways, the telegraph lines.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—My hon. friend is mistaken. If he had followed what I said, he would know that I wanted this commissioner to be appointed on the commission, with power to sit as a County Court judge, and his decision would have to go before the Railway Commission.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—The words of the hon. gentleman's resolution are 'to have full control'. Therefore by the very wording of the motion he would be a commission by himself.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—The hon. member from Prince Albert has done a great service to the country in bringing up this matter. People who settle in the west have a right to be protected in this matter. I do not know what the government may feel about it, but my hon. friend will be glad to hear that the North American Telegraph Company have decided to extend their service to the northwest, and the rates will be reduced. I hope in this way my hon. friend's views will be met.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—In reply to the hon member from De Salaberry, I may state that the hon. gentleman from Prince Albert took the pains to ascertain what the powers of the Railway Commission were in regard to this matter, so that the criticism of the hon. gentleman from De Salaberry was founded on an assumption which is not a fact. The hon. member from Prince Albert made it his duty to communicate with the Railway Commissioners, and asked the chairman, Judge Killam, if the Railway Commission could take action in the matter. I am given to understand that the answer of the chairman was that they had absolutely no powers with reference to the subject, so that the criticism which would otherwise be fair is not justified under the circumstances. I agree with several of the senators who have spoken, and especially senators from the east who have seen service in this country for a number of years, and are prepared to stand up for one of the junior senators from the west, and commend him for the good service he has done to this country. It is a proper stand to take when any representative of the people exposes before parliament a state of things which should not be tolerated. His action should not be snuffed out. The hon. gentleman has given to the House and country a statement of facts which is uncontradicted. He has shown that the people of the west are suffering from an intolerable state of things, and not a senator on either side of the House has undertaken to say that his statement of facts is not correct. He simply asks the government to take means to remedy an intolerable state of affairs. That is a very simple way of going about it. He does not dictate to the government what they shall do. He suggests that if the powers in existence are not sufficient to remedy the evil, the government should appoint an officer to deal with it. His resolution may not be drafted in proper form to meet the situation, but his ideas are excellent, and his object is to relieve the people of the west, and the country at large from an injustice. Although he has been asked in a very summary way to withdraw his motion, I think the matter should stand and be brought forcibly to the attention of the government. They should be made aware of the fact that the Railway Commission themselves admit that they have no powers, or at least no time, to deal with the telegraph and telephone companies, and that those companies are absolute masters of the situation. That is a state of things which must not continue in this country. The hon. member from Halifax says that these evils will remedy themselves. They will never remedy themselves. They will go on increasing, and I, for one, think that the hon. member from Prince Albert has done his duty in this House and to the people he represents.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—It is generally understood in a debate of this kind that the mover of a motion has the right to reply.

Hon. Mr. POWER—But the hon. gentleman has replied.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I waited to see if anybody else was going to take part in this discussion but no one seemed ready to speak, and I want now to reply to the hon. member from Halifax. I admit I am not as able to draft a motion to express what I mean, as the hon. member from Halifax himself, who has had a great deal of experience, but I thought I had made myself clear. I said I wanted to bring the matter before the House; that I did not want an officer appointed with all the powers of a Czar, but a commissioner who would be a member of the Railway Commission, with power to sit like a County Court judge, and I pointed out also that if all the commissioners had the same powers, with an appeal from the decision of any one of them, it would greatly facilitate business. My hon. friend tries to make out that I want to appoint a man who would have full control, and he says that if that man had to deal with wealthy corporations, he would likely be led from the path of duty. Surely there is an honest man to be had in this country, and if no one else can be found, I would suggest the appointment of the hon. member from Halifax, in whom I have great confidence, and who would fill the position to the great satisfaction of the people. The hon. member from De Salaberry says that this matter should be dealt with by the Railway Commission. I went to the Railway Commission and found that they have not authority so far as the telegraph system is concerned, and it is very hazy authority they have with reference to the telegraphs; more than that, they have more work than they can attend to. I found they had a pile of work on their hands, which cannot be dealt with for months, and possibly years. Surely it is not out of place, if there is a present necessity, to ask for the appointment of another official who will deal with this question of affording the people relief. The hon. Secretary of State wishes to have the motion withdrawn. I am perfectly satisfied to withdraw it. I have placed the facts before the country, and anybody can go to the telegraph offices and find for himself if I have given anything that is not a correct statement of facts. I say the people of the west are systematically robbed so far as the telegraph is concerned, and it is time we had relief.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In obedience to public opinion last year, the government placed the telephone system absolutely under the control of the Board of Railway Commissioners. Certainly no more competent jurisdiction could be secured. Public opinion pointed to them, and I have yet to learn that they have failed to appreciate the importance of giving the matter attention. I have here, under my hand, the authority given by statute over rates, making connections with other lines—absolutely giving them power to make any regulation which is reasonable or fair.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Have they done anything in the last year to reduce the rates or benefit the people of this country?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We are not to be the judge of that. We cannot be the judge. No more competent jurisdiction could be secured than the one under which the government have placed the telephone system. With regard to the telegraph lines it is competent for anybody, or any syndicate to form a telegraph company. There are dozens of telegraph companies all over this country. They get no aid or subsidy from the government. Therefore, why should the government be held responsible for their tariff?

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Is that any reason why they should be allowed to rob the people?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I maintain that the government have gone as far as they could go in obedience to public opinion. In England a similar sentiment prevailed some years ago, and the government took over the telegraph and telephone systems. What has been the effect of that? The body of the people, who do not use the system, are being taxed large sums of money to keep up the system because it is costing the country more than when it was under private management. It is not fair for the hon. gentleman to blame the government because they do not interfere with the telegraph system. The incidents to which he has called attention are not those that should induce any government to interfere. Let the public in that vicinity form their telegraph system. The parliament of Canada can of course compel the large lines, the Great Northwestern and the Canadian Pacific Railway, to make connections with local lines, just the same as we can compel connections with the great telephone systems. The government are not open to any of the charges made by the hon. gentleman, of having neglected their duty with regard to either of those services.

The motion was withdrawn.

OLD AGE PENSIONS.

MOTION POSTPONED.

The notice of motion being called :

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General ; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, copies of all correspondence in the hands of the government, or any department thereof, on the question of old age pensions to aged residents in Canada, or retiring allowance in any form.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—The Minister of Trade and Commerce having laid on the table a day or two ago a Bill on this subject, I have not had the opportunity of looking at it, and there are others in the same position. I think we should have an opportunity of examining it before discussing the subject.

The SPEAKER—There need be no motion ; it simply stands.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I was going to suggest that if we listen to a debate, or to understand the position of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, the Bill should be in the hands of each member, so as to know really what he intends. Do I understand that the Minister of Trade and Commerce laid that Bill upon the table with a view of introducing a measure to be considered by parliament during this session ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, I think he distinctly stated that he did not. It was his own individual views.

The motion was allowed to stand.

IRREGULARITY IN THE MINUTES.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the Orders of the Day are called I desire to call attention to what I consider an irregularity in those orders. On page 389, about the middle of the page, I find the following :

With leave of the Senate,

The Honourable Mr. Power moved, seconded by the Honourable Mr. Fiset,

That the Bill (R) intitled : 'An Act to incorporate the Bonaventure and Gaspé Telephone Company, Limited,' be placed on the Orders of the Day for a third reading to-morrow.

The question of concurrence being put thereon, the same was resolved in the affirmative, and Ordered accordingly.

Perhaps I am mistaken, but I think this is a misunderstanding. I heard the hon. gentleman say that he would give notice that when the Bill came up to-day it would be read a third time, and not that he moved the resolution that the Bill be placed on the orders of the day for the third reading. I would certainly have objected if he had made such a motion, but I understood, and a few gentlemen whom I asked told me they understood the same thing, that the hon. gentleman was giving notice of the third reading for to-morrow. I think this should not be stated in the minutes as a fact which took place. He gave notice that he would move to-day that the third reading of that Bill should take place.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The minutes are correct as a record of what took place.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman is judging his own case, and decides the minutes to be correct.

Hon. Mr. KERR—A very good judge.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Does the hon. gentleman know something about it ?

Hon. Mr. KERR—My recollection is entirely in accordance with the statement made by the hon. gentleman from Halifax.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Two judges. If the hon gentleman says he did so, I am obliged to take his word ; but I am astonished at his rising and moving with the leave of the Senate that such a thing be done. He could not make such a motion before the amendments were concurred in. How could he move that the third reading of the Bill be placed on the orders of the day when the amendments were not concurred in ? If that motion was carried yesterday, the Bill should be one of the first on the orders of the day. It should appear among those Bills the third reading of which is ordered for to-day. Rule 20 says :

Unless the Senate direct otherwise, Orders of the Day take precedence according to priority as follows :

1. Orders of the Day for the third reading of Bills.

That is the first order of the day. If that motion had been carried yesterday, why do we not find the Bill in its proper place to-day ? Because it was irregular. Because the amendments had not been concurred in; and in order to make the record complete, they had to commit another irregularity; they were obliged to put that Bill in another place than that which it should have occupied on the orders of the day. According to rule 20, the third reading should have been placed either as the first or fifth order of the day ; whereas we find it is the 18th order of the day. That is because the 17th order was a consideration of the amendments to that Bill, so, to be logical, they were obliged to infringe the orders of the House and to put that Bill in a place it should not have occupied, because it is contrary to rule 20. If that order has been passed, this Bill should be in its proper place on the order paper, and should not appear where it is. What was done in a similar case ? My hon. friend from Edmonton, the Hon. Mr. Roy, sometime ago moved suspension of the rules so that when the consideration of certain amendments would take place the third reading might immediately follow. What was the motion he made ? It will be found at page 379 of our minutes. He gave notice that when the amendments to Bill (I) were concurred in, he would move that rule 24 be suspended and that the Bill be read a third time. The effect of that motion would be in the third reading, but it was never placed on the orders of the day for a third reading. It was placed on the orders for concurrence, and when the amendments had been concurred in, the hon. gentleman would have been at liberty to make his motion, because he had given notice for that. I say if the hon. gentleman made his motion then the Bill should have been placed as our rules prescribe, one of the first items on the order paper, amongst the third readings, and that has not been done.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not propose to follow the hon. gentleman. There is not any rule that I know of which forbids the reading of a Bill the third time the same day on which the amendments are concurred in. There is a rule which says a Bill shall not be read the third time the same day on which it is reported from committee, but there is not any rule which hinders you from reading a Bill the third time on the same day on which the amendments are concurred in. However, I am not in charge of the Bill, and there is no urgency. I made the motion I did with a view of getting the Bill down to the House of Commons at the earliest possible date. I did not understand that there was any objection to the Bill as amended, but I understand the hon. gentleman from the Gulf division, who is in charge of the Bill, is quite prepared to let the third reading stand until to-morrow.

The SPEAKER—I am not aware that a written notice was given, or that a motion was made by the hon. gentleman from Halifax.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes, the hon. gentleman from De Lanaudière read the report of the committee on the Bill, giving the amendment, and then the hon. gentleman from De Lanaudière moved that the amendment be taken into consideration to-morrow. I thereupon move, seconded by the hon. gentleman from the Gulf division, that the Bill be read the third time to-morrow.

The SPEAKER—I have simply to declare that the minutes are correct ; but my idea was that the hon. gentleman was following the same course as was pursued by the hon. gentleman from Edmonton, and giving notice on the same lines, so as to suspend rule 24.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That would have been the better course.

The SPEAKER—But as there will be no third reading taken to-day, there need be no decision.

REPORT OF INSURANCE COMMISSION.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to say that we have been furnished with five volumes of the report of the Insurance Commission, four volumes containing evidence and one containing the report. I have looked through all these volumes, and I find that the draft Bill which the newspapers say form a part of that report, or is attached to it, is not forthcoming. Nor do I find the exhibits that are referred to throughout the evidence. Are there any other volumes to be presented to parliament, or has the draft Bill been submitted in some other shape? I have seen by the newspapers that the draft Bill prepared by the commission has been submitted to the House of Commons, and been laid on the Table. Now that may or may not be correct, but evidently the newspapers have got it and some extracts from it have been published, and it should certainly be in the possession of this House.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I ascertained that the draft Bill was printed at the 'Free Press office. The only copy of it which I received was the one presented to the House of Commons on the day on which the report was brought down, when it was laid on the table, on Monday or Tuesday. Then I asked the King's Printer to make the inquiry whether the 'Free Press' had printed, at the instance of the commission, a sufficient number of copies of the Bill, and I found they had not, and I at once gave orders, as they had it in type, to strike off a sufficient number for both Houses. So I presume that is being done and we should have the copies of the Bill very soon. They were printed entirely by the commission, and not at the Printing Bureau. They had given the job to the 'Free Press". The evidence was printed in Toronto by a firm there, because the commission sat there in the first instance, and it was arranged, in order to save time, that that firm in Toronto should do the printing, subject to the charges being taxed by the King's Printer here, and it is in that way we have been able to secure the printed evidence so soon. But I did not learn until recently where the report had been printed. In making the inquiry, I ascertained that only a limited number of copies had been struck off, sufficient to furnish them to both Houses. I presume we will get them to-day or to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—When the Bill was presented to the House of Commons, would it not have been courteous that that Bill should have been presented to us at the same time?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I had only one copy.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The hon. gentleman should have held it. Charity begins at home, and I think the hon. Secretary of State should have given that copy to us.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I thought the Finance Minister was the party entitled to the copy, and I gave it to Mr. Fielding. He laid it on the table of the House with the other papers. Following up the inquiry, I ascertained just what I have stated, that only a limited number of copies had been struck off.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is this proceeding not somewhat extraordinary? Why should that Bill be printed separately and laid upon the table of the House? Who is responsible for it?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The commission.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The commissioners have made their report to parliament, and in that report they have recommended a draft Bill. Now it seems to me that no Bill of that character should be laid before the House except with the consent of the government, who must be responsible for future legislation. My object in giving notice of a motion for to-morrow was to ascertain what the position of the government was with reference to that draft Bill. That draft Bill, which is being circulated among the members, can only be considered as the opinion of the commission, for which no one is responsible, so far as parliament is concerned.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, that is right.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—So it matters not to parliament whether the Bill has been circulated either by the commission or by a private individual, except as circulars are sent to each member when some particular person desires to bring his particular views before parliament to be considered when a measure is before it. The whole thing is irregular.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I did not know, nor do I think any member of the government knew, that the commission were preparing a draft Bill. I learned it only a day or two ago, when we first received the draft report. In that report they referred to a draft Bill. I did not know where that draft Bill was. It was only after minute inquiry that I ascertained the draft Bill had been sent to the 'Free Press' office to be printed for the commission. The draft Bill was brought down simply as part of the report, and part of the evidence. The government is in no way responsible for it. It was not at their instance it was prepared, and they knew nothing about it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Why was that draft Bill not in the report ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not know. We are not responsible for that.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Does the hon. gentleman know anything about the exhibits ? There was one exhibit I was interested in looking at. It was referred to in the evidence as No. 685, I think, and when I looked for it I could not find any exhibits at all. I suppose we will receive four or five other volumes.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think not. At least I hope not.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—We ought to have the exhibits.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not know where they are. I shall be glad to write to the secretary of the commission. The secretary came to me on Monday or Tuesday, and in a sealed package handed those papers to me, and he said : 'Mr. Scott, the commission desired me to hand those to you for the government.' On opening the package, I found a copy of the report in type, and it was marked on the cover of it 'for the printer'. In order to expedite matters, that was at once sent down to the printers to be printed. Then there were four volumes of the evidence, and there was this draft Bill among the papers. There was only a single copy. I did not examine it at the time. He made no reference to it in his letter. There were no other papers, no exhibits delivered. However, I shall write to the secretary, asking where the exhibits are ; I think they ought to go with the report and be deposited where they will be available for any hon. gentleman who wishes to see them.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Will the hon. gentleman find out where the exhibits are ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, I will.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I hope when the hon. gentleman receives a draft Bill of that kind again, and only one copy, that he will give it to the Senate instead of to the other House.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I thought it ought to go to the Finance Minister, as he had to do with insurance.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Would the hon. Secretary of State inform the Senate, by what authority the commission ordered the printing of four volumes of that evidence, and what authority they had to give it to any private printing office ? The usual practice of commissions, whether they are royal commissions, or any other commissions, is to make their report to parliament, and after they have made the report to parliament it is for parliament to say whether they shall go to the expense of printing that report for distribution or not. In this case it appears that the commissioners have not only taken upon themselves the responsibilty of ordering the printing of an enormous amount of evidence, covering four large volumes, but also the report and draft Bill. At whose expense ? At the expense of the government ? It is something new to me, and I fancy it will be new to the members of this House and to the government itself, that commissioners have the power to do what they have done. If the government in the power which it gave to this commission, authorized them to incur this expense, I fancy they would be justified in doing it. Could the hon. Secretary of State inform the House why the commission took upon themselves the responsibility of incurring this expense without being ordered to do so, either by parliament or by the government ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The text of the commission was brought down, and hon. gentlemen will notice that the powers given to the commissioners were very wide. When they opened in Toronto, they proposed to sit for some weeks, and did sit for some weeks. Then this question of the printing turned up, and I do not know where the suggestion came from, but it was submitted to me whether the evidence could not, by arrangement, be printed at Toronto day by day as it was given. 'Well,' I said, 'if it is submitted to the King's Printer to tax the bill,' and it was arranged that any printing done under the order of the commission should be submitted to the King's Printer to say whether the charges were reasonable and fair. At the time I do not think any one believed or appreciated that the evidence would be extended in the manner it has been, to require four volumes to complete it.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr SCOTT—Of close printed matter. It was a surprise to all of us to find it was so exceedingly voluminous

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—One volume should have been enough.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—However, there was no help for it. If the evidence had not been printed at the time, we should not have had it for a month yet. If we had waited for its presentation until the report was completed, it is doubtful whether we would have printed it at all, because it would have been evident that the expense would be greater than the advantage which would flow from it. So, in that way, it was printed off. In regard to the draft Bill, I never heard of it, or that they contemplated preparing a Bill until one copy was handed in with the report. Then I ascertained that the type was standing in the 'Free Press', and I said they had better strike off enough for distribution in the two Houses.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Can the hon. gentleman say whether it is the intention of the government to proceed with the subject-matter of the report during the present session?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, I think not. It is too voluminous a matter to proceed with this session.

HURON AND ONTARIO RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG (in the absence of Hon. Mr. Gibson) moved the second reading of Bill (55) An Act respecting the Huron and Ontario Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Frost.)

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I move, in amendment, that this Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be amended by striking out clause 2. This Bill asks for two things; one an extension of time for the construction of the main line; the other the authorization to construct branch lines. The whole of the railway system is in the province of Ontario, in the county of Huron. The main line has not yet been constructed, but, pending its construction, the petitioners seek authority to construct branch lines to a very great extent. As the Act incorporating this company was passed by the federal parliament, I think no objection could be taken to extending the time to enable the company to construct their main line. Though that law should have been passed by the provincial legislature, the fact that the company was incorporated by this parliament to construct a work which was declared to be a work for the general advantage of Canada, might entitle them to have their rights continued; but when they come asking for power to construct branch lines wholly situated within the province of Ontario, in fact constructing new railways under the pretext of building branch lines, it is time for those who believe in maintaining provincial rights to demand that those rights be protected. Therefore, while I approve of granting an extension of time for the construction of the main line, because the Act of incorporation was originally granted by this parliament, I do not approve of trespassing on the rights of the province of Ontario, by extending the power of the company to construct new branch lines, and that is why I made my motion. It leaves them power to construct their main line, which is all they should expect.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The statement made by the hon. senator for Stadacona is very forcible. If we are to respect the powers vested in the local legislatures, we certainly should accept the amendment. The fact that power was given under the original Act, some years ago, declaring this road to be in the general interest of the Dominion, might not have been correct. My own view is that it never should have been passed; but, having been passed, the position taken by the hon. member for Stadacona has a great deal of force in it. These amendments cover almost a blanket charter. They empower the company to build branch lines through some half dozen counties. I am sorry I was not present in the committee when this Bill was passed, or I would have taken objection there. It includes the counties of Dufferin, Simcoe, Peel, Wellington, Waterloo, Perth, Huron, Middlesex, Lambton, Essex and Grey, all in the province of Ontario. In the legislature of Ontario, a Bill has been introduced and passed, declaring that local rights of this particular kind must be maintained, and that if the Dominion parliament passed an Act which is within the purview of the local legislature, the company so incorporated will be deprived of certain rights and privileges which the legislature of the province has the right to deal with. We are asked to set at defiance the action of the local legislature of Ontario at the present time.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I was under the impression that the Act of the local legislature, to which the hon. gentleman referred, was still under consideration ?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—My impression is that it has passed. At all events, if we are to judge from the tone of the press on both sides of politics, taking the 'Mail' on one side and the 'Globe' on the other, it is supporting the action of the local legislature in reference to encroachments by the Dominion parliament on the rights and privileges of the province ; so I do not think there is the slightest doubt that it will become law. For that reason I think this House should take the position of throwing the responsibility entirely upon the different provinces to deal with questions which are immediately within their control, under the constitution of the Dominion. Unless the Dominion parliament has made up its mind to set at defiance the rights and privileges of the province, it will reject applications of this kind.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—It is very unfortunate that the hon. senator who has charge of this Bill is not present himself, as he understands the subject much better than I do. Out of courtesy I made the motion so that the work of the House could be proceeded with, but I wish to direct attention to the fact that if any Bill has received ample consideration at the hands of the Railway Committee, this Bill certainly deserves to be classed as such. All the points which have been raised here were presented there, and very fully explained.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman has no right to refer to what occurred in the committee.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The hon. gentleman is right.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend from Stadacona might withdraw his objection, and let us hear what took place in the committee.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I wish to explain to the House, that as far as I can understand, this company has applied for legislation on several occasions. My hon. friend shakes his head ; I may be wrong, but that is my understanding. The original Act gives them power to build certain lines in Ontario, with steamship or steamboat connections. It has been granted an extension of time, and also the right to build the additional branch line which my hon. friend has mentioned. As I understand it, the company that controlled the charter until recently were not able to make any progress towards the construction of the line, but, as I understand, this charter has recently fallen into the hands of men who seem to be able to proceed with the work reasonably fast and will commence operations this coming spring.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Who are they?

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I cannot tell; but if it is of interest to the House that the promoters should be known, I have no doubt, if the order is postponed, the information will be obtained. I am informed that the new aggregation in control of this charter are financially strong enough to proceed with the construction of the work just as soon as the frost is out of the ground in spring. That is why they ask for the further extension of time, and also to be authorized to construct further mileage. The fact that the road is entirely within the province of Ontario does not mean that this House should not deal with it, because the original charter deals with transportation on the lakes connecting Ontario with other provinces, and, apart from that fact, it is an extensive road which should be under the control of the Railway Commission. There is also the fact that the original Act of incorporation declared this to be a work for the general advantage of Canada, and it strikes me we can very properly grant them the legislation they seek in this Bill. However, there are other gentlemen here who know more about the matter than I do. Possibly I have made a mistake in the motion I have submitted. I should have asked that the order be postponed until the gentleman who has charge of the Bill could be present to give information about it, because of his residence being in the immediate vicinity of the territory affected, and which I am sure would have convinced this House, as it convinced another body, that the legislation should be passed.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am sorry I cannot concur with my hon. friend from Killarney. I was not present at the meeting of the Railway Committee. I knew that this Bill was coming up, but I had been at a former meeting, and from what I observed at that meeting I concluded it was not necessary for me to attend. My views are pretty well known. I must confess I was surprised that this Bill was reported without change. The charter goes back to 1896. It authorized the company to construct a railway from Port Perry to Kincardine, touching at Uxbridge and several other places, all within the province of Ontario. Those powers were granted eleven years ago, and I understand it is admitted that, so far, nothing has been done under the charter. Now, they ask not only for an extension of time but for the additional powers contained in the present Bill. That seemed to me rather too much. I confess I have acquiesced in many instances where we were practically intruding on the provincial prerogative. I did it because it was represented there were railway connections, and other causes which led the House to let it slip through. But such applications are becoming too frequent. Spasmodically this House has thrown out such Bills. I think the House of Commons passed such Bills, throwing on us the responsibility of rejecting them. If there ever was a Bill which came from the other House in which it was apparent that the provincial prerogative was absolutely taken away, it is this Bill. There are twenty-five or thirty places, all within the province of Ontario, mentioned in the Bill. This company obtained legislation in 1896, 1903, 1904 and 1906, each time getting some further privileges. It did seem to me that the motion made just now to strike out clause 2 was not extreme, allowing the charter to stand as it was originally passed and not throwing it out altogether. The company have power to connect with a large number of towns and villages in Ontario already. Any one looking at the statute of 1896, will find that they have very large powers under their charter. The Bill ought to have been thrown out in 1896 because the company did not pretend to make any outside connections or to be anything but a purely local work in the province of Ontario. I have noticed in the press, and from reports of proceedings in the legislature, that our actions here are subject to very extreme criticism. It is an important matter that the provincial and federal powers should keep on amicable terms in reference to their rights under the constitution. If they fail, where can they look to? The Senate of Canada is the guardian of provincial rights. At confederation, this subject was fully discussed, and although the British North America Act laid down very positively the exclusive powers which belonged to each, yet if one reads over the debates that took place before confederation he will find that whenever any reference was made to the rights of the smaller provinces being overridden the reply was, 'We have fixed the number of senators from the provinces so that the rights of the provinces are perfectly safe.' I shall just read one paragraph from the debate which took place at Quebec, in which Sir A. T. Galt discussed the relative powers of the federal and provincial authorities. Sir Alexander Galt was probably the progenitor of confederation. I think the first speech I ever listened to on confederation was delivered by Galt. It created a very great impression at the time, and he continued to take great interest in the subject. It was afterwards brought up in the London conference. Mr. Galt said:

> To the legislative council all the provinces look for protection under the federal principle. Therefore, we should in this respect define now the extent to which we should settle the constitution of the Upper House.

And, in doing that, they decided this way : while the representation in the House of Commons will change and must change under the principle of representation by population, yet we will so fix the representation in the upper Chamber that even if the representation in the lower House is cut away altogether the province will still have guardians in the upper Chamber. That was the basic principle on which confederation was founded. Now, in confirmation of that, we find that Prince Edward Island came into the union with six members. On two different occasions that was cut down, and Prince Edward Island now has only four representatives in the House of Commons but has four senators. The four senators were made independent of any popular sentiment in the future—they were made part of the constitution of the country, and for the very purpose of protecting the province so that it could not be without representation. New Brunswick and Nova Scotia have had their representation in the lower House cut down. Do hon. gentlemen, who have been looking forward to the development of the great west, not appreciate the fact that the representation of some of the eastern provinces may be cut down, and that the representation of those great western provinces will probably exceed the representation of any other portion of the Dominion? But while the provinces towards the sea may have their representation diminished in the House of Commons every ten years, fortunately for them their representation in this Chamber will remain the same, so that they can always stand up and protect the rights of the provinces. Therefore, I say the Senate has thrown upon it a very grave responsibility. In fact, its raison d'etre, its necessity for existence, its only justification is that it stand for the provinces.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman says Oh no. I can give the views of Sir John A Macdonald, Sir Leonard Tilley and others to confirm what I say.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman goes too far when he says that it is the only raison d'etre of the Senate. It is important I admit.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I say for the argument I have made it is. The Senate, representing the various provinces, with a fixed number from each, incapable of change under the British North America Act, makes it perfectly clear that was the main point they had in view. What was the most important point in coming into confederation? Why the division of powers and prerogatives between the federal and provincial bodies, and what was to be its mainstay? The Senate, and their number was fixed, incapable of change.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Would the hon. gentleman permit me to say that in the debate on the Confederation Act, in the House of Lords, Lord Carnarvon said that the principle of the Bill, as regards the Senate, was for the preservation of the rights of the provinces.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I recollect it. I had the opportunity of hearing debates on the subject, long before confederation took place, and the legislative council and its successor, the Senate, became the guardians of the provinces. It is perfectly clear, according to the British North America Act, that this company is a creature of the province—'In each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to matters coming within the class of subjects hereinafter enumerated—that is to say, 'local work and undertakings.' Surely nobody will deny that this is a local work and undertaking. The evidence is clear. Read the Bill; read the original charter. They do not profess to be other than local. Under this charter they may build between two intermediate points without building any of the other sections.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I should like to know where the steamboat and navigation come in?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I let those Bills go when they do not trench very much on provincial jurisdiction, but where a Bill of this kind is brought in, providing that the company's line may touch some twenty-five places within one province, without going outside of the province, it is too much to ask the Senate of Canada to abrogate entirely the most sacred duty it holds as guardian of the provinces. If this Senate is no longer the guardian of provincial rights, what are the provinces to feel on the subject? Year by year the House of Commons will naturally and necessarily obtain more power, because this is a stationary body. The numbers there will increase from time to time, and, therefore, we have to recognize that we have a responsibility in this matter —that it is not a matter of choice. We have to ask ourselves, are we to give evidence for the reason we are here. We are told we are here for the purpose of seeing that the dividing line between the federal and provincial jurisdictions is sacredly observed. I confess we do not do that scrupulously. We allow a great many Bills to go through now and then, and then we pull up and throw an objectionable Bill out; but in this case it seems to me a shock that we should be asked to allow a charter of this kind to be approved by the parliament of Canada, where there are twenty-five or thirty local works within the province to be constructed. The original charter was certainly wide enough. That charter was granted in 1896. Are we not doing fairly by this company if we say 'Gentlemen, we will give you the extension of time, but you have a good deal to do before you commence on the works enumerated in section 2. Build them first. If at a future day parliament think that you have established a right to be a federal company, well and good.' I say nothing on that point, but it seemed rather a shock to say that the company should have additional power to build to a number of other places before they have commenced to construct any portion of their line.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Is it the opinion of the hon. Secretary of State that this House should invariably refuse to assume jurisdiction whenever a Bill is presented to incorporate a line entirely within one province?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If the hon. gentleman had followed me, he would have heard that I qualified my remarks in that respect. I said we had allowed Bills of a local character to pass in many instances and may do so again, but the case that is now submitted to us is an extreme one. In all my experience in parliament I have never known any company, federal or provincial, to ask for the extended powers obtained in the charter granted in 1896, and the Bill now under consideration. I simply took it up as an extreme case. I qualified my view in that way—we had done it, and probably would do it again, but when a gross case came, one that had excited comment, a case that had been brought up in the legislature, and where, at the present moment, there have been some pretty sharp criticisms not only by the party in power, but by the opposition in the legislature, I thought it was time to speak. Mr. Graham, the leader of the Liberal party in the provincial legislature, was just as strong in his condemnation of the action of this parliament on the federal Acts that are encroaching on provincial rights, as was Mr. Whitney. The people he represented felt in that way, and he expressed the views of the Liberals, as Mr. Whitney did of the Conservatives, and the situation became a very grave one. We should not set ourselves up against the two parties in one province. They said 'We shall pass some Act which will reach those companies you are incorporating—we will reach them by taxation if you persist.'

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Middlesex)—I agree with the leader of the House, that we might go so far as to extend this charter for another period of two years, though a company chartered eleven years ago should have accomplished something before now under the charter granted them in 1896. I see no reason, however, inasmuch as the company has done nothing up to date, why we should extend the jurisdiction of the original charter. They have had eleven years in which to do something. The House was good enough, two years ago, to extend that charter again. They were given a sort of roving commission all over Ontario to build some 500 miles of railway, but up to this time they have done nothing, and, in the face of that failure, they are asking this House to almost double the extent of the original line of railway. If we extend their original charter for two years more, they will have a main line to build, if there is a main line of railway to this project at all. I have not found a spinal column in it, notwithstanding my examination. It begins here and goes to a certain place, begins in another place and goes somewhere else, and the company has done nothing yet. The most the company should ask for, is the privilege of an extension for two years. On the question of provincial rights, I have a strong feeling; but, as a new member, I felt some hesitation in putting my views before the House. Two years ago the provincial legislature passed an address protesting against the power exercised by this parliament, bringing under Dominion jurisdiction provincial lines that intersected Dominion lines such as the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Grand Trunk Railway and the Great Western. The protest was unanimous, both sides agreeing. That was a much smaller matter than assuming control over provincial steam railways and adding thereto control over provincial radial railways, for which the argument is weaker. In 1903 a similar opinion was expressed, both sides agreeing unanimously. It may be a fine point to decide when railways come within Dominion jurisdiction, and when they do not. I do not know that I would at present commit myself to the abstract question. There may be reasons of expediency in the public interest, when what appears to be, by a certain construction of the law, a provincial railway might be more useful, under better control and serve the public interest if it came under the jurisdiction of the Dominion Railway Commissioners. That is a matter to be argued, perhaps, in each case; but in this case I see no argument at all. If the company wants to borrow money in foreign parts, it surely has a basis on which to borrow very largely for the construction of the miles of railway required under the original charter. I believe it is argued that if they get the larger privileges, they can borrow money more easily. I do not know whether that is a good argument or not. I would rather say it was easier to float four or five millions of money in the British or French markets, than double that amount of money. But, be that as it may, if this company gives assurance of good faith, builds what it proposed to build under its original charter, and this is the proper place to come to for power to build additional branches, I do not think any member of this House will be stopped by any action he may take to-day from granting this further privilege. Or if it appears that it is a proper privilege to be given by the provincial legislature, and only by the provincial legislature, I would be prepared to give my personal guarantee that the Ontario legislature would not refuse to any well authenticated company the right to construct any number of branches they like. The policy of Ontario is to gridiron the whole country with a radial system; but the policy of the people of Ontario, as I understand it, is, so far as possible, to keep the control of that system under the provincial legislature. I do not know that this House could do anything that would more estrange itself from the public sentiment of that province—I cannot speak for any other—than, by a gradual process of pressure and elimination, withdraw from the provincial legislature privileges which that legislature believed to be rightly belonging to it.

I do not think we should quarrel with the legislature, nor do I think we should be afraid to quarrel with the legislature or any body or any thing, if, by so doing we are advancing the public interest; but if we establish a feeling of estrangement between this House and the provincial legislature, unless it be for good reasons, I think as a matter of policy and good feeling and administration, it would be a mistake for us to do so. For these reasons, I think we might very well—so far as I am concerned, I feel it to be my duty—agree to a further extension of this charter, to see whether the company is exercising good faith, and, although I would not pledge myself in advance, I would not at all events close my judgment against giving them branches if it were found that by so doing the public interest would be served without any undue encroachment on the powers of the local legislature. I hope that this view will prevail with the House.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I agree with what has been said by various hon. gentlemen, as to the desirability of defining the jurisdiction as between the Dominion and the provinces, and I think hon. gentlemen who have been for any time in the House will give me credit for having generally taken the provincial side; but that is only when taking that side is consistent with justice and fair-play, and I hold that in the present case it is not so. This company, whose Bill is before us, was incorporated in the first session of 1896, and in its original charter it was declared to be a work for the general advantage of Canada. Therefore, under the British North America Act, this work came under the jurisdiction of this parliament. So that hon. gentlemen will see that it is not the case of a company coming here for a new charter. The company got a charter and came under our jurisdiction. That original Act of 1896 was amended in 1903, and again in 1904 and again in 1906. Now, if the views which have been expressed this afternoon had been held during those years, I think it would have been well to have expressed them, and to have stopped the measure from going any further.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They did not ask for additional powers.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think they did ask for additional powers. I shall deal with that matter. The original charter authorized the company to build—I think one of the termini of the road was to be at a port on Lake Ontario, and the company were to have power to connect with steam vessels on the lake.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I read the clause. I copied it from the Bill—'From a point in the town of Port Perry, in the county of Ontario to the town of Kincardine in the county of Bruce'.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Section 5 of the original charter provides that:—

> The company at any point where the railway, or any branch thereof touches or crosses any navigable waters, may, for the purposes of its business, build, equip and operate docks, and elevators, and steam and other vessels, and may collect wharfage and storage charges for the use of its wharfs and buildings, and may, in connection with its railway, convey passengers and freight.

There was very great ground, I think, for declaring this to be a work for the general advantage of Canada. The position is this. This company has a right today to build ships and run them in connection with its railway, starting from this port on Lake Ontario, and they come to parliament and say: 'We can do better if we make our road less local.' The original scheme did provide for a road which was a very local one, but this clause which it is proposed now to strike out of this Bill really proposes to take the road out of the category of local roads. There is to be a through line across from Collingwood on Georgian bay, so that that part of the road will be for the accommodation of the grain traffic coming west of Collingwood to the canal.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Down where?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Down to the eastern lakes. Then the paragraph (a) gives this company the power to go to Windsor and also to Sarnia. The effect of that is that under the charter, as proposed to be amended, this will not be in the strict sense of the word a local undertaking at all. It will be an undertaking, one section of which will form part of the route from the west to the lakes, and the other will form part of a road with two branches connecting with United States roads at the border. Now, where else could the company go for such powers? These gentlemen say they have made arrangements to get their money, with the understanding that no obstacle would be put in the way of getting this change in their charter. If we refused to make this change, what would happen? I fancy the result will be that it would be quite impossible, as it has been found in the past, to secure the capital to go on with this work, just because, in its present condition, it is almost purely a local undertaking, although it was chartered in the first session of 1896 as a Dominion work.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—They have three millions of capital.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is the impression that is made upon my mind, at any rate. Where could these promoters go? Where could the people who are undertaking this work go if this parliament says it will not give them these powers?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—To Ontario.

Hon. Mr. POWER—They cannot go to Ontario, because the session of the Ontario legislature is over practically now.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. POWER—They cannot go to Ontario ; and then possibly the very fact that they had come here first might prevent them getting what they looked for in Ontario. I must say that I feel, strong advocate as I am for provincial rights, that in the present instance this is not a case in which to press this doctrine of provincial rights to an extreme, and this is an extreme. If there had not already been a charter from the Dominion, and the company had not undertaken certain operations on the strength of that charter, and on the strength of the practibility of getting this measure through, it would be a different thing. If this company came here to-day for the first time, as they came in 1896, I should vote against the charter ; but I do not think it is fair or just to withhold from the company now the privileges which they have asked for.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I should like to have an opinion from the hon. leader of the House in regard to what the government policy really is, because after hearing these remarks, I must confess that if that is the government policy, I do not know what it is. Is it that provincial rights in a definite form, absolute rights are to be preserved, and that when a railway or work is wholly within the province and local in its character, although extensive, that we are here to stand up as the champions of the province and uphold the powers of the people with respect to that legislation ? I will be glad to know whether this is to apply to this particular Bill only or to all Bills before this parliament this session ? I shall be glad to know whether the hon. gentleman intends to apply it to Bills which have already passed and which have not yet received the royal assent ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No. I stated that we had, in the past, and probably would in the future, allow many Bills, where the point was doubtful, to become law. But this was a gross case, one which certainly had no parallel in my experience in the Senate. We have passed many Bills, and probably will pass many more which deal with local matters, but not to the extent this does.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I move the adjournment of the debate. I feel that we are opening up a very large question and, as one of the supporters of the government, I should like to know where we stand. I should like to know whether the Jordan Heat, Light and Power Company, incorporated the other day, supported by the hon. gentleman himself, was of such a magnificent character that it should be treated in one way, and another measure embracing 473 miles of railway is to be treated in a different manner ; in other words whether 1,100 feet of ditch in the Niagara peninsula, which received a certain treatment, and 473 miles of Railway in Ontario, are not to receive the same treatment. I should like to know whether the addition of 200 miles is to be treated one way and a little ditch is to be treated in another way. I should like to understand these things, so that when we go to committee I can form an opinion. I think the supporters of the government are entitled to know whether it is the policy of the government, or the individual policy of the hon. gentleman leading the House. It seems to me it is impossible for hon. gentlemen to know where we are drifting if this is permitted to go much further. We have had charters for railways a few miles long, and all in one province, passed in this House this session. There are half a dozen Bills now on the order paper. The one which has been adjourned is about a railway fifteen miles long, in the province of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It has not passed yet.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I know it has not.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—We will attend to that one.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We have another one on the order paper to-day.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Not yet passed.

Hon. Mr. KERR—The question is what are we to do? Are we to make fish of one and flesh of another? Are we to see who is the promoter of the Bill and support it perhaps on that ground rather than to support it on general principle and general grounds? These are matters in regard to which we should have an understanding. I for one protest against this course. I quite agree that each individual case should be dealt with on its merits, but that where there is a large proposition it should not be singled out and where there is a small proposition it would be allowed to go through. That is what I was anxious to get information about, and if I could get information about that, I would know then what to say. Perhaps the hon. gentleman would favour me in that regard?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Has the hon. gentleman from Toronto left his discretion at home in Toronto, or brought it to Ottawa with him?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I heard the debate on this matter ten days ago and from reading that debate and reading the Bill I formed my views. The members of the government may have different views. I am expressing my own views on the question.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I move that the debate be adjourned until Wednesday next.

The motion was agreed to.

MALONE AND HOPKINS POINT RAILWAY COMPANY.

THIRD READING POSTPONED.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN moved the third reading of Bill (12) An Act to incorporate the Malone and Hopkins Point Railway Company.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think that should stand over until we know the disposition of the other Bill.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—This road runs to Malone.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I move that the Bill be read the third time this day six months.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—I second that motion.

The amendment was lost on division.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Inasmuch as the question involved in this case is about the same as that in the Bill which has been postponed until next week, I would move in amendment to the motion for the third reading that the Order of the Day be discharged and that the Bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for Wednesday next.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I have no objection to the hon. gentleman taking twenty-four or forty-eight hours to read the Bill over, and he will see that although it is being built within a small county in Quebec it is still to terminate in the United States. That is the only saving point in it, and if it were not for that I would be opposed to it. The road will be of no use unless it makes that connection.

The motion was agreed to, and the Order of the Day was discharged and placed on the orders for Wednesday next.

THIRD READING.

Bill (P) An Act respecting the Inspection of Electricity.—(Hon. Mr. Scott.)

COLLINGWOOD SOUTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN moved the second reading of Bill (OO) An Act to incorporate the Collingwood Southern Railway Company.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Is this road not altogether within the province of Ontario? We are committing ourselves to the principle of the Bill by allowing the second reading to take place.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Would the hon. gentleman explain where it begins and where it ends?

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I was asked to take charge of the Bill in the absence of another member of the House, and I agreed to do so, but I am not able to give a clear explanation to the House.

The Order of the Day was allowed to stand.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (PP) An Act to incorporate the Live Stock Insurance Company of Canada, Limited.—(Hon. Mr. David.)

Bill (27) An Act respecting La Banque Nationale.—(Hon. Mr. Bolduc.)

Bill (31) An Act to incorporate the Northwestern Trust and Loan Company.—(Hon. Mr. Lougheed.)

Bill (63) An Act to incorporate the Protective Association of Canada.—(Hon. Mr. Mitchell.)

Bill (73) An Act respecting patents of the International Paper Company.—(Hon. Mr. Young.)

YONGE STREET BRIDGE BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. KERR moved the second reading of Bill (RR) An Act respecting the city of Toronto Yonge Street Bridge.

He said: I ask the House to allow this Bill to be read a second time, in order that it may go before the Railway Committee at its next meeting. It is a very important Bill. It is a public Bill, providing for the building of a bridge at the water front in Toronto, which is absolutely necessary for the preservation of health and life. Under these circumstances, I ask the indulgence of the House.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I do not know whether we can accept that motion. The Bill is not printed either in French or English

Hon. Mr. KERR—It is printed. Whether it has been printed for distribution or not I do not know, but when I read it the first time I handed in a copy, so that I know the Bill is printed to some extent.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Explain it.

Hon. Mr. KERR—It is providing for the construction of a bridge at the foot of Yonge street, where Yonge street crosses the railway tracks of all the railways going into Toronto. The bridge will extend to the wharfs, where all the steamers land. There are thousands upon thousands of people crossing these tracks every day at that place. There has been great danger to life. Many accidents have happened, and, in consequence of that, an application was made to the old committee of the Privy Council, and an order was made requiring the railways to build a bridge and pay for it entirely, apportioning the money between the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway. That order was appealed against by one of the railways, if not by both. Unfortunately, just at that time, our new Railway Act was introduced, and it became law, repealing the provisions which enabled the Privy Council to hear appeals and it did not make provision in the Railway Act for this appeal from it. Accordingly, the following session, an amendment was made to the Railway Act, which enabled an appeal to be made, and from that there was an appeal to Ottawa, and from that there is an appeal now pending to the Privy Council. In the meantime, life is in danger and what the city has said is, 'Let us build the bridge, and let us determine afterwards who is to pay for it.' That is the provision.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I can confirm what the hon. gentleman has said. Efforts have been made for the last two years to have the bridge completed, but it has been thwarted by the litigation between the railway companies. It has been recognized by the government that the bridge should have been built ten years ago.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—What kind of bridge is it?

Hon. Mr. KERR—It is a high bridge over the railway.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Is it a federal matter?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, it is over the Grand Trunk Railway.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read a second time.

The Senate adjourned.

SENATE.

OTTAWA, Friday, March 8, 1907.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

LEGISLATION RESPECTING LIFE INSURANCE.

The order of the day being called:

Will call the attention of the government to a statement which has appeared in the press, to the effect that there is to be no legislation during this session upon the subject of life insurance, and inquire of the government whether it approves of the suggestions and recommendations made by the Royal Commission appointed to inquire into and report on the affairs of life insurance companies doing business in Canada, and whether said suggestions and recommendations are to be embodied in a Bill to be introduced into parliament for adoption this session.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The informal discussion which took place yesterday, on the orders of the day being called, has answered to a very great extent the question which I propose to put to the hon. Secretary of State. However, in order to have a formal answer to these questions placed upon record, I will call the attention of the government to this inquiry which I have placed on the paper. A statement has been made in some of the papers representing the government that no legislation was to be laid before parliament on this subject during the present session; then I noticed in another journal a statement that a Bill had been laid upon the table of the House of Commons, not knowing at that time that that Bill was merely a recommendation from the commissioners. I was somewhat puzzled to know why it was that that information had not been given upon so important a matter to the Senate as well as to the House of Commons. It is also important that the public should know, particularly those who are interested in life insurance, what the policy of the government is, if they have formed any policy up to the present time, and whether that policy would be in accord with the suggestions made by the Royal Commission in the report which was laid before parliament. Speaking for myself, I think there are many of the suggestions made by the commission that would be accepted by the people as being in the right direction. There are other suggestions so drastic in their character that I question very much whether any government would ever adopt them, and whether, if adopted, they would be in the interest of the policy-holders or of the companies themselves. Having made these few observations, I trust my hon. friend will be in a position to inform us what the policy of the government is on this very important question.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I explained to the House yesterday that the papers sent to me where only a single copy of the Bill and a single copy of the evidence. I handed them to Mr. Fielding, and they were presented to the House of Commons, the object being that if any printing had to be done—because one contained a copy of the report—prompt action should be taken. The Bill itself submitted by the commission has only been distributed to-day. I do not think any colleague of mine has read it, and we have had no opportunity of discussing it, and the House and country can scarcely expect the government would commence the consideration of so important a subject at this period of the session. It will have to stand for another year, and will be fully considered, of course, before any measure is brought down for the approval of parliament. The hon. gentleman asked me yesterday about the exhibits. I have a copy of them here that I got from Mr. Ross, the clerk. A list of them has been ordered to be printed, so that hon. gentlemen can have an opportunity of seeing them. They are very voluminous. It is not at all probable that it would be justifiable to print the whole of the exhibits. The list will be printed and distributed for use of members as soon as possible.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that the government has not formed any opinion as to the recommendations made by the commission?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, that is what I said.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I scarcely expected the government, under the circumstances, would lay a Bill before parliament unless they had in their possession the recommendations of the commission for some time. In reference to the exhibits which have been laid on the table, I see no reason why, after so large an expenditure has been incurred in printing the four volumes of the evidence and the report, they should not also print the exhibits in full, so that both Houses of parliament and the country may have before them a complete record of everything that took place before that commission?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is not proposed to print all the exhibits, but to print the index of them and any hon. gentlemen who wants a particular voucher or exhibit can easily apply to the department and get a copy of it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Where will they be available?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In the Finance Department. They are in charge of Mr. Ross, who is the clerk.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think it would be better to have another volume.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The better way, it was thought, was to publish a list defining the exhibits and if any hon. gentleman wants to see a particular exhibit, or exhibits, it is easy to have a copy made and laid on the table.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—While it may be very desirable from the insurance companies point of view, and the point of view of the public as well, that this question should be approached and dealt with as soon as possible, I can't help expressing my opinion that the hon. Secretary of State, speaking for the government, said a wise thing when he stated that the government will not deal with it this sesison. It would be a great mistake to take up so important a question, with such a great mass of evidence and such a voluminous report as we have before us, and attempt to deal with it at the end of a session, which is already somewhat extended. I also think we should cry 'enough' with regard to the matter of printing. We have four great volumes of evidence, and the voluminous report of the commissioners on this subject. I thought of Horace Greely when he wrote the book 'What I know about farming.' These gentlemen who knew very little about life insurance companies when they commenced their job, and who know very little about it still, should entitle their report 'What we know about life insurance.' I will give one illustration from their report. On page 13, they say this with regard to the Canada Life Insurance Company :

> But it is equally manifest that if the inherent power of the additional capital is only 46·7 per cent its engagement in the affairs of the Canada Life without any real need is a simple method of raising that earning power to 8 per cent, the difference under whatever name being necessarily taken away from the policy-holders whose accumulations have earned it.

It is the easiest thing in the world to make a calculation of the subject, and you will find that last year the policy-holders were benefited by having that capital called up to the extent of over $35,000, and yet these commissioners have put that statement on record to go out all over the country to damage the affairs of one of our largest insurance companies.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Although 3,000 copies were first ordered, the House of Commons has thought proper, after the type was partially taken down, to order 2,000 more, so there will be 5,000 copies of the report distributed.

CANADIAN MUSICAL AND DRAMATIC ASSOCIATION (LIMITED) BILL.

A QUESTION OF PROCEDURE.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would ask permission to call attention to what I may describe as a matter of urgent public importance as regards a reference a few days ago of a Bill to the Private Bills Committee. The Private Bills Committee will sit probably on Wednesday, and I would ask permission of the House to make two motions, one to read the Orders of the Day, of Wednesday last, relating to Bill (I), which brings in the amendment proposed by my hon. friend from Halifax, referring the Bill to the Private Bills Committee, with instructions to further amend it by striking out all that has regard to lotteries. I think there is a great misapprehension in regard to the word instruction. At page 652 Bourinot says :

> Considerable misapprehension appears to exist as to the meaning of instruction. An instruction is given to a committee to confer on it that power, which, without such instruction it would not have.

That is the real object of an instruction. It is to enlarge the powers of a committee, not to dictate to the committee what the committee is to do, and if we refer to precedent, we shall see that in the imperial House of Commons a motion having been made to instruct a committee to do a certain thing, the Speaker said :

> It is proper that I should state to the hon. member and the House my reason for thinking that the instruction which he proposes to move would not be in order, and it is this : that the committee already possess power to do that which the hon. member desires they should do, and it is a rule of the House that no instruction shall be given to a committee to do that which they already have the power to do. Under these circumstances, it appears to me that the proposed motion is not in order.

I do not want to discuss the point of order. I only desire to show the meaning of the word 'instruction.' This reference is to the proceedings in the imperial House of Commons on the 4th of June, 1860. Further on in the debate the Speaker says :

> There is another objection in point of form —that it is mandatory on the committee as to what they are to do. The real intention of an instruction to a committee is to give them power to do a certain thing if they think proper to do it, not to command them to do it. For this reason also I think the hon. gentleman's motion is out of order.

Later on Mr. Bentinck rose to give another instruction, and the Speaker said :

The same objection exists to the hon. gentleman's instruction; it is mandatory in form. In fact the House has directed the committee to proceed with the Bill and the hon. gentleman proposes by his instruction to direct it not to proceed with the Bill until it has done something which in due course of proceeding it would be competent to do if it thought fit. The committee may enter into the question referred to in the instruction of the hon. member if it thinks fit, and dispose of it in any way. It is not necessary for it to receive an instruction. Therefore in my opinion the motion is irregular and out of order.

There are a lot of authorities I would quote. I shall put them in the hands of the hon. Speaker, but I desire to call attention particularly to the last edition of May at page 935 :

Classified examples illustrating procedure on instructions.

There are four classes :

Class 1—Cases when an instruction was necessary to empower a committee on a Bill to consider the amendments proposed by the instruction.
Class 2—Cases when instructions were ruled out of order because the committee possess the power which the instruction would confer.
Class 3—Cases where instructions were ruled out of order because they were foreign to the subject-matter of the Bill.
Class 4.—Cases of instruction to extend the scope of the Bill throughout the United Kingdom.

It would be under class 2 that this instruction would come—cases when instructions are ruled out of order because the committee possessed the power which the instruction would confer. There is a decision given by our parliament also, in 1870, the Order of the Day being read for a committee on a Bill respecting the election of members of the House of Commons. In that case Hon. Speaker Cockburn decided that the committee already had the power to do what was proposed and, consequently, the motion was irregular. The fundamental principle of the instruction is to empower the committee to do things which the committee has not the power to do, and every motion made to give to the committee a power which the committee has already, is out of order. Now I am coming to the practical object of this discussion. I desire to ask the hon. member from Halifax to amend his motion in such a way that the Bill will be referred back to the Committee on Private Bills for further consideration. If the committee does not comply with what they know is the wish of the House, it will be time for the House to reject the report, and it will enable the committee to do something which, perhaps, it could not do if the amendment is not carried. That is to say the striking out of all that refers to lotteries. They cannot do anything else. They cannot amend the Bill. They might wish to make some other amendments which they could not do because the instructions were mandatory. I am not speaking of the point of order that was taken when the motion was made, but I am making this request as a matter of convenience, so that the committee may proceed with the Bill on Wednesday next. If there is no objection, I move that the Order of the Day relating to Bill (I), (page 391 of the minutes) be read, and will follow that by another motion that it be amended in the way I pointed out, striking out all the words after 'Private Bills' in the amendment, and adding the words 'for further consideration.'

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think the hon. gentleman could hardly expect this House to do that. The House came to a solid determination upon this question and the hon. gentleman has not given any preliminary notice on this question.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I said 'with the permission of this House.'

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman has quoted certain authorities, and he asks the House, without any notice, and without other members of the House having an opportunity to look into the matter——

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If there is any objection, I will not press the motion, but will give it as a notice for Tuesday.

The SPEAKER—As it is a matter of considerable importance, and a question of procedure, I think the notice should be in writing.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Very well, I shall submit it in writing.

ROYAL VICTORIA LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. KERR (in the absence of Hon. Mr. Forget) moved the third reading of Bill (37) An Act respecting the Royal Victoria Life Insurance Company.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH—Before the motion is put, I should like to explain to the Senate the position I have taken with regard to this measure. I would regret that any one should think it was done with a desire on my part to obstruct the business of the House. I know that the Bill had reached a stage where it was somewhat difficult to offer any opposition, at the time I got the information with reference to the desire of the shareholders to delay this legislation. When it was up the other day, I wired to the parties who had instructed me to oppose the Bill and try to have it delayed. It was for the purpose of consulting with the management as to why they asked for this legislation. Had the management taken that course and called the shareholders together, they might perhaps have seen some other way of dealing with this question. I have received letters from several of the shareholders who hold a great deal of stock in this company and who protest against this legislation. One of them is Mr. Taylor of Lindsay, who says he had never been consulted with reference to it, and that if a meeting of the shareholders had been called, and the position of the company discussed, such drastic measures need not have been taken. He felt that the Bill should not be passed, and that a meeting of the shareholders should be called. I have another letter from the solicitor of Mr. Taylor, who holds some stock in the company, and who protests against this legislation. I have several letters of a similar character from other gentlemen holding a considerable amount of stock, and having paid a great deal on this stock. Dr. Neeland, of Lindsay, Dr. Clark, of Lindsay, and Mr. Waddle, of Peterborough also protest against the method that the management has pursued in coming here without consulting the shareholders. Perhaps the shareholders might not have been so much alarmed if a copy of the Bill had been placed before them to show that there was a saving clause in it. After reading the Bill carefully, I think the first clause is a saving clause to the rights of the shareholders, because they have to be called together to decide on the matter before the legislation becomes effective; but I do feel, in justice to those shareholders who have asked me to protest against the passage of the Bill, that I should place the facts in my possession briefly before this House. I will leave it to the House now to decide as to what course they will take in reference to this Bill. I know that every hon. gentleman here is just as much interested in the protection of the public as I am, and I will leave them to say whether clause one is a sufficient guarantee or a saving clause for the rights of the shareholders.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I refer the hon. gentleman to the first clause, which provides that the measure cannot go into effect until duly authorized by resolution and approved by a vote of the shareholders.

Hon. Mr. KERR—The whole matter is left entirely to the shareholders to say what they will do, and all the objections will be presented at the meeting of the shareholders.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—And the sixth clause.

Hon. Mr. KERR—Under these circumstances, I think there is no reason why the Bill should not be passed.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—My recollection is that in these cases something more than a bare majority has usually been required. Does this provide for just a bare majority ?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Three-fourths vote of the shareholders.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—In that case, I think there should be no objection.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read a third time, and passed.

BONAVENTURE AND GASPE TELEPHONE COMPANY BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved the third reading of Bill (R) An Act to incorporate the Bonaventure and Gaspé Telephone Company, Limited.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—I think it is hardly fair to pass this Bill now, because it was agreed that it should be reprinted as amended before it was finally disposed of, and that has not been done.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not remember it.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—I think it was so agreed.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The amendments were all in the direction of regularizing and reducing the powers of the company. The amendments were agreed to by the House, and it may be remembered, at the suggestion of the hon. gentleman from Stadacona, I agreed to let the third reading of the Bill stand over till to-day. The Bill is a Senate Bill, and its final stages might be imperilled if it was delayed any longer.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—I have no desire to delay the Bill at all, but where an agreement has been entered into with respect to a certain thing to be done in a particular way, that agreement should not be violated. I remember distinctly that there was a question as to how it should come before the House, and it was agreed the amendment should be reported to the House and then that we should treat the Bill as amended and print it before the third reading.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Why should not the House insist on the agreement being carried out? It may be as the hon. gentleman from Halifax pointed out—the amendments may be in a line that would be approved and adopted by the House; but if there was an agreement in the committee that the Bill should be reprinted before the third reading, that agreement should be rigidly adhered to.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The amendments were concurred in by the House, and I am not aware that there was any agreement that the Bill should be reprinted. The Bill was in my charge, and I did not know of any such agreement.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—The agreement was formally put from the Chair, and accepted by the committee.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—The hon. gentleman from St. John is quite correct; it was agreed upon in the committee that the Bill should be reprinted before the third reading.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved that the Bill be reprinted and that the third reading be fixed for Wednesday next.

The motion was agreed to.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (80) An Act to incorporate the Prudential Savings Society.—(Hon. Mr. Watson.)

Bill (BB) An Act respecting the British American Assurance Company.—(Hon. Mr. Jaffray.)

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (76) An Act to amend the Northwest Territories Act Amendment Bill.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The object of this Bill is to transfer the powers heretofore exercised by the Lieutenant Governor of Manitoba, in Keewatin, and other territories of a similar kind, to the Commissioner of Mounted Police, and also to slightly extend the powers of various officers.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Is it the intention of the government to appoint a Lieutenant Governor for the Northwest Territories?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Not at present.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The idea is that the duties of the Lieutenant Governor shall be performed by the Commissioner of Police?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Yes, until such time as it is found expedient to appoint a governor.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Is it the intention of the government to form a council such as the government would have the power to do under the Northwest Territory Act, with a view to administering the affairs of the unorganized territories?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The government have that under consideration, and probably will appoint such a council; but it has not been done as yet. They have the power, as my hon. friend knows. They probably will find it expedient to use that power, as he will see by looking at clause 4, in which members of the council are to receive certain extra powers; but I am advised that that has not been done up to the present time. The hon. gentleman, of course, knows better even than I do, the fact of the extreme sparseness of population in the territories, and that law and order will have to be administered in the meantime by detachments of the mounted police scattered over them.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—They are doing that at present. My curiosity was to ascertain if the government intended, in the near future, to appoint a council such as obtained in the Northwest Territories up to twenty years ago.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—As the hon. gentleman knows, they have not appointed a council yet. That is a matter which they have under consideration, I am not prepared to say how soon the consideration will be exercised over it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Does my hon. friend know whether the Lieutenant Governor of Manitoba is still exercising the office of Lieutenant Governor of Keewatin?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I am speaking from recollection, and under correction, but I think he has been superseded under the Act that this Bill amends.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Do the Northwest Territories embrace Ungava, for the purposes of this legislation ?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I think not. I think it is confined to those territories which lie north of the three great provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. These are what we know as the Northwest Territories proper, and I do not think Ungava is included.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Has the commissioner, referred to in clause 4, been appointed ?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I understand that Colonel White has been appointed.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Will he continue to fill the office of Comptroller of Mounted Police or is he to give his services exclusively to this new office ?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I am informed that he will exercise the powers of the two offices, just as the Lieutenant Governor of Manitoba discharged the office of Administrator of Keewatin.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Then it will be incident to his office ?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—For the time being. Later on, particularly if any population goes in there, full power is taken to make provision, but it will be some little time yet.

Hon. Mr. ROY, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

SECOND READING.

Bill (NN) An Act for the relief of George William Hadley.—(Hon. Mr. Perley.)

COLLINGWOOD SOUTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN moved the second reading of Bill (OO) An Act to incorporate the Collingwood Southern Railway Company. He said : I may explain that this is an extension of the Canadian Pacific Railway from Collingwood to connect with the main line of their new line from Toronto to North Bay.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It strikes me that this is rather a local undertaking :

8. The company may lay out, construct and operate a railway of the gauge of four feet eight and a half inches :

(a) from a point on the Georgian bay at or near the said town of Collingwood, in the province of Ontario, thence southerly to a point at or near Baxter on the Sudbury branch of the Canadian Pacific Railway ;

(b) from a point at or near the said town of Collingwood on the Georgian bay, southerly and easterly, to join the Canadian Pacific Railway at or near the town of Orillia, in the county of Simcoe.

That is a purely local road in a very small section of the province of Ontario, and although I am not the champion of the rights of the province of Ontario particularly, I think the House should hesitate about reading this Bill a second time.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—If my hon. friend will permit the Bill to go to committee, a satisfactory explanation will be given.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY AND PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND RAILWAY EMPLOYEES PROVIDENT FUND BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resumed, in Committee of the Whole, consideration of Bill (68) An Act to establish the Intercolonial Railway and Prince Edward Island Railway Employees' Provident Fund.

(In the Committee.)

On clause 2,

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I have much pleasure in informing the hon. leader of the opposition, as indeed I did when this Bill was in committee before, that females as well as males will hereafter be embraced in this clause.

The clause was amended and adopted.

On clause 10,

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—My hon. friends thought that the secretary of the board should be appointed by the Governor in Council. There is no objection to the suggestion.

The clause was amended and adopted.

On clause 13,

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I called the attention of the department to this clause, and they reply that the manner in which the computation will be made under clause 13 is as follow: Assumed an employee is desirous of obtaining a pension who has been thirty years in the service, and that his average pay for the eight years immediately preceding his retirement has been $100 per month, then the rate of pension he will receive is thirty multiplied by one and one-half, multiplied by one hundred, which equals $45 per month. Under clause 12, which fixes the age for retirement, the number of men who will reach the age of seventy is necessarily limited, and they give reasons, which appear satisfactory, that the average length of life of railway employees after seventy is not likely to be great. A considerable number of men are likely, from various causes, to leave the service, in which case the fund benefits to some extent. They think the calculations will be correct, but later on, they reserve to themselves power to modify the matter, either increasing or diminishing as may be found necessary.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 17,

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—My hon. friends objected to the power of restitution in cases of employees discharged for drunkenness, fraud or misconduct. The minister wishes to meet their objections, and is willing to strike out the words 'and are not reinstated.' There is a great deal of force in the objection, that it is not desirable that persons guilty of those offences should be reinstated.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—Clause seven provides that:

> A board shall be established, consisting of five persons, of whom one shall be the general manager, who shall always, when present, be the chairman of and preside at all meetings of the board, two shall be appointed from time to time by the minister from among the chief officers of the railway (one of whom shall always act as chairman in the absence of the general manager), and the remaining two shall be elected annually by the employees contributing to the fund.

Who are the chief officers?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—A question might arise as to who are the chief officers. I can get that information before the third reading, if my hon. friend desires.

Hon. Mr. McKAY (Truro), from the committee, reported the Bill with amendments, which were concurred in.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY AND GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY AGREEMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resumed in Committee of the Whole consideration of Bill (50) An Act to amend an Act to confirm an agreement entered into by Her late Majesty with the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada, for the purpose of securing the extension of the Intercolonial Railway system to the city of Montreal.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have the original plan from the Secretary of State's office on the table for two or three days, and I think hon. gentlemen will be satisfied now. The changes really are only verbal. Either mode of expression would suit the circumstances, but it is desirable that the printed Act should conform with the agreement and be correct and regular. The first change is by inserting the word 'as' after the word 'all,' which would make it read, 'are all as shown,' &c.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What is the effect of it?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No effect at all.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then why change it ?

Hon. Mr SCOTT—Because the Act, as passed, professes to be a true copy, whereas it is not a true copy.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Whatever effect it may have, it seems right to pass it, because that was the original agreement. It must have some effect or so much trouble would not be taken to make the correction.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is making it more definite. I do not know that there is very much difference.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 1,

1. The schedule mentioned in the preamble is hereby amended by inserting the word 'as' after the word 'all' in the forty-third line of the third page of the said schedule ; by striking out the words 'of the railway between and including Ste. Rosalie and Bonaventure station and Chaudière bridge and connections' in the second, third and fourth lines of the fifth paragraph on the fourth page of the said schedule, and substituing therefor the words 'of the Montreal joint section and the Chaudière joint section;' by inserting the words 'of each joint section' after the word 'maintenance' in the tenth line of the said fifth paragraph ; by striking out the word 'other' in the sixteenth line on the fifteenth page of the said schedule; and by substituting the word 'circumstances' for the word 'circumstance' in the twenty-third line of the said fifteenth page.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In the statute it reads 'of the railway between and including Ste. Rosalie and Bonaventure station and Chaudière bridge and connections.' The document filed reads : 'Of the Montreal joint section and the Chaudière joint section.'

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is not verbal.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It expresses the same locality.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Well, does it ? As I understand, it provides for the payment by the government of a certain portion of the expenses between Ste. Rosalie and the bridge. If this amendment be carried, does that not throw the responsibility on the government to pay a proportion of the expenses to keep up the road between the bridge and the terminus at Quebec ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, in the agreement the line between Ste. Rosalie and Bonaventure station is described as the Montreal joint section. They occupy it jointly. Under the agreement, the two railways were to occupy the line between Ste. Rosalie and the Bonaventure station.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes, I understand that, but the schedule, as it is printed in the statute, reads :

And including the maintenance of the railway, between and including Ste. Rosalie and the Bonaventure station and the Chaudière bridge and connection.

I was trying to show the distinction between the schedule as printed in the statute, and what is proposed here. The schedule, as printed in the statute, confines the payment of the cost of maintenance between these two points. The proposed amendment reads : 'The Montreal joint section and the Chaudière joint section,' by inserting the words 'after each section.' That would include the section running from the Chaudière bridge to Quebec, would it not ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then if that is so, it compels the government to pay for the maintenance of a portion of the road for which, under the statute, it appears they are not entitled to pay.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—My reading of it is that if there were any different interpretation, the actual agreement is less than that printed in the statute, so that it would be in favour of the Crown.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Oh, no, quite the other way.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, I beg pardon, because the Montreal joint section which is the section, must be those portions of the line jointly used by the two companies, and the Chaudière joint section can only apply to those particular portions that are used jointly. The statute used larger terms and may include more ; but the agreement is limited, because it is only what they jointly occupy.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If the hon. gentleman will read closely and critically the first clause, and compare it with the schedule in the statute, he will find that the same blunder occurred in the new Bill as in the old, because this refers to certain paragraphs and certain lines in the schedule as it appears here ; and in other cases, it refers to the statute. The hon. gentleman will find that the reference is not correct.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have looked through it and I do not find any difficulty.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The reference to the statute is not right, and if it is allowed to go, without being corrected, it will be meaningless. The words that are amended are found in paragraph three of the agreement, whereas, in the Bill, paragraph five is referred to.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I observe there is a clerical error in regard to the paragraph, but that will be corrected.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 2,

2. Notwithstanding any legal proceedings that may have been commenced, or any rights that may have accrued, the said Act and schedule hereby amended shall be read and construed as if the amendments herein contained had been made on the eleventh day of August, eighteen hundred and ninety-nine.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I understood the Secretary of State to make the declaration, when he was moving the second reading of the Bill, that no difficulty had arisen under the construction ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—None whatever.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—And no litigation had taken place ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, nothing at all. It was discovered, on looking at the original agreement, that they did not correspond.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What necessity is there to legalize all proceedings that have taken place in the past under this agreement ? You propose, notwithstanding any legal proceedings that may have been commenced, or any right that may have accrued, the said Act and schedule hereby amended shall be read and construed as if the amendments herein contained had been made on the 11th August, 1899.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Because the Crown and the Grand Trunk Railway have proceeded on the reading of the agreement as filed.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What do you legalize by this ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Questions that may arise in the future which ought to be corrected.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Questions which arise in the future would be settled under the Act we are now passing.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is the desire of both parties to legalize the part in accordance with this agreement. Nobody else is interested in it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—You legalize what might possibly have taken place but which did not take place.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not know what has taken place.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman said nothing has taken place.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I did not know of anything. Reference was made to the agreement itself. It was found by referring to the statute that they did not correspond ; and it was thought legitimate and correct to make the agreement as printed in the statute conform to the agreement as filed.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It was either last year or the year before that we passed an Act authorizing a reference to arbitrators of the difficulties that had arisen under that agreement. What was the result of that arbitration ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not really know. We had the matter discussed in this House, some trifling amount was awarded. I think my hon. friend from Belleville properly criticised the arbitration, referring to the fact the counsel fees were a good deal more than the amounts in controversy.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I have gone over this, and, as far as I am able to understand, there is practically no difference between the contract as filed in the office, and the Bill as it stood. It is only a difference in phraseology, without any real difference. But supposing there had been a difference ; if it had been found that the government had made the contract and filed one contract in the office, and submitted another one to parliament that was very radically different, the question might arise whether parliament had ever agreed to the agreement as filed, and it is the contract on the statute-book which would have to prevail. I think if there were any difference we should insist that what is passed by parliament should be the law, and not what is found in the department.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. WILSON, from the committee, reported the Bill with amendments.

THE LATE SENATOR CASGRAIN.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have just been informed that the Senate has lost another member by the death of our esteemed friend, the late Senator Casgrain. He was a gentleman who was universally liked in this Chamber, and particularly by those who sat with him for many years. I know of no other gentleman who had greater equanimity of mind, and who approached all questions submitted for the consideration of the Senate with the same sense of right and justice. I feel that the Senate can, on the present occasion, sympathize deeply with his family for the loss they have sustained.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It is with feelings of the deepest regret that I have just learned of the death of our late colleague Senator Casgrain. During his long membership in this body he had endeared himself to his fellow-members as few men could have done. His qualities both of heart and of mind will be long remembered by those of us who had the good fortune of possessing his friendship.

In the discharge of his duties he was peculiarly attentive, and brought to bear on every subject before the Chamber in which he was interested a large fund of intelligence and common sense. Thus recalling for some years past his pleasing personality as he came in contact with us all, we can but express our sorrow for his absence through death, and our deepest sympathy with his family in their sad bereavement.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, at Eight o'clock p.m.

SENATE.

OTTAWA, Tuesday, March 12, 1907.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Eight o'clock p.m.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

NEW SENATOR.

Hon. Mr. George Casimir Dessaulles, of St. Hyacinthe, Que.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (UU) An Act to amend the Gold and Silver Marking Act.—(Hon. Mr. Gibson.)

Bill (WW) An Act to incorporate the Port Arthur Power and Development Company.—(Hon. Mr. Kerr.)

IMMORALITY IN DAWSON.

INQUIRY POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being called:

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That he will inquire of the government:

1. Are they aware that the Yukon Council, one-half of which is composed of appointees of the government, and which is presided over by one of their officers, has granted licenses to at least two retail liquor shops in Dawson City in connection with which immoral entertainments and practices are openly conducted?
2. If the government is not in possession of information on the subject, will they cause an investigation to be made?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Is the hon. minister prepared to answer this question?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have not succeeded in getting an answer. I spoke to the minister again, personally, a few days ago, and again to-day and he had not been able to obtain it.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I am rather surprised, because the ex-governor of the Yukon, who had been chairman of the council at the time these occurrences are said to have taken place, was in Ottawa since the notice was placed on the paper.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Since the notice was on the paper?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think so. I may be wrong, but I think I saw him.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think the hon. gentleman must be mistaken; I have never heard of it.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I may be wrong. My hon. friend behind me tells me he is in Ottawa at the present moment.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Well, I do not know anything about it.

The motion was allowed to stand until Friday.

MINUTES OF SENATE RELATING TO BILL (I).

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY moved:

That the entry made in the Minutes of Proceedings of the Senate of Canada on Wednesday, 6th March, 1907, relating to (Bill I) page 391, be now read.

The motion was agreed to, and the Minutes were read by the clerk as follows:

The Order of the Day being read for the consideration of the amendments made by the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills to Bill (I) intituled: 'An Act to incorporate the Canadian Musical and Dramatic Association, Limited,'

The Honourable Mr. Casgrain (de Lanaudière) moved, seconded by the Honourable Mr. Roy,

That the said amendments be agreed to.

The Honourable Mr. Power moved in amendment, seconded by the Honourable Mr. Ellis,

That the said amendments be not now agreed to, but that the said Bill be referred back to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills, with instructions to further amend the same by removing the provisions connected with lotteries.

The question of concurrence being put on the motion in amendment, the same was resolved in the affirmative, and Ordered accordingly.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I have the honour to move that all the words after 'private Bills' in the resolution moved by the Hon. Senator Power, and adopted by the Senate, be struck out and replaced by the following: 'for further consideration.'

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not think that that is just the proper form to adopt, but I am not going to quarrel with it. The better way is to deal with the substantial question raised by the hon. gentleman. The motion should be either that the entry be expunged or that the resolution be rescinded; but that would be a mere technicality, and I do not propose for my part to rest on that. The hon. gentleman, at the last meeting of the Senate, took the ground that the motion which was adopted by the Senate instructing the committee to amend the Bill was an irregular motion and a motion which should not have passed the Senate, and as far as I can gather, the hon. gentleman based his argument on two grounds as to both of which he read from Bourinot's Practice. One ground was that you cannot instruct a committee to do anything which the committee has power to do without the instruction. That is correct; but the committee could not without the instruction from the House, make that change in the Bill which the instruction ordered them to make. The committee had agreed upon and reported the Bill to the House, and if it was simply referred back to the committee they could not do anything with it; they would be stopped by their previous action, and they had to have the authority of the House to make the change in the Bill. I dare say the hon. gentleman has pursued the subject further since last Friday, and he has probably found that such instructions are often given in cases of this kind. So I think there is nothing in that. Then the hon. gentleman took the ground that the instruction was mandatory; that it ordered the committee, in fact, to do the work and did not give them the option of doing it; and the hon. gentleman read Bourinot's own view and certain references which Bourinot made to May. As the hon. gentleman has probably given a little attention to the matter since, he will have noticed that, while his parliamentary law was very good it did not apply. The parliamentary law which the hon. gentleman gave the House dealt altogether with the Committee of the Whole House, and not with special committees or committees on private Bills. I shall not go into any lengthened argument on the question, but shall cite very briefly from the last edition of Bourinot, page 519, where I find this:

Instructions to Committees of the Whole in the Commons are permissive, but in the Senate and Lords they may be imperative.

And Bourinot cites for that May, page 481 of the new edition. Then if hon. gentlemen will turn to pages 546 and 547 of Bourinot, they will find some further authority on the subject; and I may be allowed to read a few lines which are not directly in point, but which go to show the principle which underlies this subject:

It is a clear and indisputable principle of parliamentary law that a committee is bound by, and is not at liberty to depart from the order of reference. This principle is essential to the regular despatch of business, for if it were admitted that what the House entertained in one instance and referred to a committee was so far controllable by that committee that it was at liberty to disobey the order of reference, all business would be at an end and, as often as circumstances would afford a pretext, the proceedings of the House would be involved in confusion.

Then a little further down on page 546 he says that instructions may be mandatory or permissive in the case of special committees, and on page 547 :

No such restriction applies to committees on private Bills nor to committees of the Whole House in the Lords. Mandatory or imperative instructions can be given to such committees.

He cites May and 71 Lords Journals, page 532. I have consulted this authority. It was something with respect to a public Bill dealing with Ireland and there was no question raised about the instruction. No question was raised as to the right to instruct. Now I take the authority to which the hon. gentleman from Stadacona referred, on page 556 :

A report may be referred back—(this is not a committee of the whole ; it is headed standing and special committees)—to a committee for further consideration with instructions to amend the same in any respect.

I shall not trouble the House very much longer, because I think the case is too clear; but I shall just quote directly from the last edition of May, page 481. This section deals with instructions :

Nor in the Commons can an instruction be moved to a Committee of the Whole House in a form other than a permissive form, namely that they have power to consider the matter dealt with by the instruction, and this rule applies to instructions to Standing or Joint Committees. (Page 423).

And at page 423 there is nothing about standing committees. It is simply joint committees. The part to which I wish to direct attention reads :

No such restriction applies to instructions to Select Committees (see page 400) or Private Bill Committees (see page 731) nor to Committees of the Whole House in the Lords ; and in these committees a mandatory of imperative instruction, defining what course of action which they must follow can be given by the House.

And that is all, practically, that I think it is necessary to read. There are several pages, beginning at page 731, to which I might direct the attention of the Speaker, dealing with that subject. I will just read the first sentence :

Mandatory instructions leave the committee no option in the exercise of their functions with regard to the particular matter that is the subject of the instruction, and for that reason they are often deprecated ; but such instructions have frequently been proposed, and have in numerous cases, been given to Committees on private Bills.

And then there is a long list of private Bills in the last year, in the cases of which those instructions have been allowed. I think the reason for the difference between the rule with respect to the Committee of the Whole and a smaller committee is clear enough. Here you have the House sitting with the Speaker in the Chair, and you would have that House composed of the same members as a Committee of the Whole telling the Committee of the Whole that they must do so-and-so. There is certainly a lack of courtesy about that. When the chairman takes the chair, the same members are present, and I suppose it is looked upon as being more respectful that the committee be empowered to act ; but there is no doubt that the House has a perfect right to direct its select committees to do anything that it pleases. It is not wrong or improper, and my view is that the House acted altogether within its right on Friday ; and there is no reason why it should reverse that action, and there is nothing out or order. I think it would be a matter of regret if the action on Friday should be reversed ; it would not be in the interest of good government, I humbly submit, or of public morals.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I agree with the hon. gentleman——

Hon. Mr. POWER—Is the hon. gentleman entitled to speak again ?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I did not speak at all. I agree with the hon. gentleman that this motion does not raise a point of order. If there was a point of order taken, it would come too late, because according to precedents, when any stage of a Bill has been passed we cannot go back to a point of order which, of its nature, should have been taken at the outset. We are now exercising the right we have to reconsider a motion which this House has already passed, and it is for that reason I ask this House to rescind this motion and to pass another resolution which would give broader liberty to a committee. If the committee is bound by the words of the instruction, it cannot operate, and it was a suggestion given to me by one of the members of the committee, that we should call the attention of the House to the nature of the instructions which has been given so that we may obtain more latitude in the work we perform in the committee. I will now deal with the points taken by my hon. friend. He says that my previous remarks of Friday last could only apply to a public Bill, or to a Committee of the Whole, but in no way to a committee on private Bills. But I know that it applies to a private Bill. Bourinot, at page 788, says:

In the chapter on public Bills, the rules in Commttees of the Whole and on the third reading are fully explained, and as these apply to private Bills—except where there is a standing order on any particular point—it is not necessary to recapitulate them here.

And what the hon. gentleman has quoted to apply to public Bills is to be found on page 652, and following, but that does not prevent that the chapter on public Bills, as well as the rules in Committee of the Whole and those which govern the third reading of a public Bill do apply to private Bills as says Bourinot in the quotation I have just made. Now what does May say: There is a difference between an order of reference and an instruction to a committee. When you strike a select committee, you may give an order of reference in telling the committee what work it has to do and the committee cannot go out of that order of reference. That is the boundary within which the committee is compelled to work. But having given such an order of reference to a committee which binds the action of the committee, you may afterwards give an instruction which will enlarge its operation, which will give powers that the committee has not already. That is the difference between a reference and an instruction. An instruction is to give to a committee a power which the committee has not already by its order of reference, and that is the real principle which governs the instructions. May says at page 479 of the last edition:

In entertaining an instruction the House is subject to this primary construction, namely, that the amendments to be sanctioned by an instruction must come within a fair interpretation of the rule laid down by Standing Order No. 34, namely, that those amendments should be relevant to the subject matter of the Bill.

That is not the case here. He proceeds:

Thus as the subject-matter of a Bill, as inclosed by the contents thereof, when read a second time, has since 1854, formed the order of reference which governs the preceedings of the committees thereon, it follows that the objects sought by an instruction, should be pertinent to the terms of that order, and that the amendments, which an instruction proposes to sanction, must be such as would further the general purpose and intention of the House in the appointment of the committee. The object of an instruction is, therefore, to endow the committee with power whereby the committee can perfect and complete the legislation referred by the contents of the Bill, or extend the provisions of a Bill to cognate objects, and an attempt to engraft novel principles into a Bill, which would be irrelevant, foreign or contradictory to the decision of the House taken on the introduction and second reading of the Bill, is not within the due province of an instruction.

Further on he says:

A motion for an instruction which seeks to confer upon a Committee of the Whole House, power to make amendments in a Bill that is already possessed by the committee, is out of order.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is a Committee of the Whole House.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Yes, but the rules which apply to public Bills in a Committee of the Whole House apply to private Bills, according to Bourinot. An instruction may be mandatory, but not to the extent mentioned by the hon. gentleman. My hon. friend quoted Bourinot at page 546 and then at page 731.

Hon. Mr. POWER—No it was May I quoted at page 481.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Bourinot at page 652 says:

Considerable misapprehension appears to exist as to the meaning of an instruction. An instruction is given to a committee to confer on it that power which, without such instruction, it would not have.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is a Committee of the Whole.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Yes, but Bourinot says, at page 788, that such a doctrine applies equally to private Bills and to select committees. What is the real principle involved in an instruction? The book answers:

An instruction is given to a committee to confer on it that power which, without such instruction, it would not have.

And furthermore, Bourinot states that the rules of the House apply to a committee, and that a committee cannot be instructed to undo something which it has done, which means that when a committee has passed a Bill you cannot compel that committee to reverse its decision. At page 544, Bourinot says:

The practice of the English Houses prevails in the Senate and Commons of Canada. The same rules, in fact, obtain with respect to divisions in committees as in the House itself.

In another place he states that you cannot reverse a decision which has been rendered, and that an instruction cannot be given in that way to a committee.

The House cannot force a committee to go back on its decision. They may give them liberty to do so, but cannot force them. I gave the distinction just now between a reference and an instruction. I will call your attention also to Blackmore's Speakers' Decisions, page 189. He says:

No instructions can be given to a committee to do that which they have already the power to do. Nor can an instruction be given to a committee to deal with a question beyond the limits of the Bill. Nor may an instruction be mandatory in form, the intentions of an instruction being to give a committee power to do a certain thing if they think proper, not to command them to do it. Nor may an instruction authoritatively direct the adoption of a clause when such clause may be moved in committee. Nor is it competent to move an instruction to a committee giving conditional power.

They have a right to do that in Committee of the Whole here, and at the third reading. That would be taking the sense of the House; but you cannot force a committee to go back on its decision.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—I have looked at all these authorities, and they refer to Committees of the Whole.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Suppose that Bill was merely sent back to the committee without instructions, and that the committee repeated its first report, and that it was sent back to the committee a second and a third time, always with the same result, where would it end? Would not the House have to give an imperative mandate to the committee and have its instructions obeyed?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—No.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—What other means would there be?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The House may refuse to accept their report. There is a difference between refusing to accept the report of the committee and compelling certain members of the House to go back on their opinion.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—And if the House refused to accept the report, what would happen?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The Bill could not pass.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—The desire expressed by this House is not to kill the Bill, but to amend it. The House expressed a desire to pass the Bill, with the exception of this provision, and you are driven to this position, that the House would have no other remedy but to kill the Bill.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If the instruction is proper and regular, we are bound by the instruction—we cannot go further than the instruction. The only thing we could do would be to strike out the clause 15 of the Bill which is the object of the present instruction, but we could not amend any other clause. It is for that reason that I ask the House to reconsider its instruction and make it broader, giving the committee instructions to further reconsider the Bill, so that any other amendments that should be made as a result of striking out clause 15 could be made in the committee.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Nobody disputes the principle that it was open to the House to merely refer the Bill back to the committee and invite the committee to study the Bill de novo; but what I understand the hon. gentleman to contend for is that it was not open to this House to send the Bill back to committee with an imperative mandate; that the House having come to the conclusion not to accept the Bill with clause 15 in it, that it was not in the power of this House to send the Bill back to the committee with imperative instructions to strike out this provision.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—What could be done is this: The House having expressed its intention that clause 15 should not be part of the Bill, the committee, knowing the intention of the House, might find it necessary to make other changes in the Bill after striking out that clause; and I am asking that this House amend its order so as to empower the committee not merely to strike out clause 15, but to reconsider the Bill in a general way. The hon. gentleman thinks the object is to replace that clause by inserting a similar clause.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—No, the only thing I am finding fault with in the position taken by the hon. gentleman is, that it was not in order.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—No.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—He is not raising a point of order now; but at the time the motion was made he said while it was too late to raise a question of order, he might have done so on the ground that a mandatory order should not be given to a committee, and that is the point I am meeting. Everybody admits that we can grant further power to the committee to reconsider the Bill.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is what my notice is asking.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—But the hon. gentleman, in supporting it, takes a position which is not sound.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I did not say a word on that subject at all, except in answer to the hon. gentleman from Halifax.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—But the hon. gentleman, on Friday last, raised that question and cited authorities.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Yes.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Surely it was incumbent on some members of this House to find fault with that view if they did not agree with it?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—And it was equally incumbent on me to meet the argument of the hon. gentleman from Halifax. I do not press any point of order. I ask the House to adopt my motion, or if it is not in proper terms, to change the terms by an amendment, and put it in such a way that the committee may be empowered to further reconsider the Bill.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I have listened to this debate for an hour, and I can assure the House, speaking for others as well as myself, that we are just as far advanced in knowledge of the question as we were when the debate started. The debate has been somewhat chopped up, and there has been a lot of quotation from authorities. We heard the pages read out, but did not understand what the authorities had to say. To my mind, this question is one that has taken proportions which do not belong to it. It was simply a question whether the committee had a right to reconsider the Bill which had been before it, and which had been reported to the House. That would be a sensible motion to make under the circumstances. If the House had referred the Bill back to the committee with specific instructions as to material facts which the committee would have to admit established a prima facie case, then the House would be doing honestly and fairly by the committee; but if the House were to refer back to the committee a Bill which the committee had fully and thoroughly considered, and were to peremptorily order them to go against their conscientious conclusion, then I say the House would have no right to do so, no matter what Bourinot or any other authority might say on the subject. This citing of authors by the hour becomes very tiresome at times. The best rule we can lay down, as a modern legislature, is the rule of common sense. We are not here to follow along the trail of olden days. We are here to strike out for ourselves, and the proper basis of procedure is common sense—common sense according to the individual capacity of the legislator. What would be the proper thing to dictate to the committee with reference to this Bill? It would be simply to say, this Bill has been referred back to you for reconsideration and no more. If this House was determined that the Bill should not pass as amended by the committee, it would then devolve on the Senate to reject the amendments, to say what it wanted, and not to cast its responsibility upon the committee. The hon. gentleman from De Salaberry said: 'But if the committee refuses to obey the instructions of the House once, twice or three times, what then ?' I say if the committee reports the Bill in a form which is not acceptable to the House, the House simply has to say it is not our will, and reject the Bill unless there is some material fact which can be eliminated without division in the House ; but where a question of conscience, of intelligence, of understanding crops up, this House has no right to send a Bill back to a committee two or three times and ask a committee to change its conscientious conclusion. You might as well ask a judge on the bench to send back a jury three or four times with instructions to agree on its verdict. The hon. gentlemen from Halifax and Stadacona have cited authorities, but quotations have no effect whatever with me in judging this question. I use my common sense. I ask myself, is the motion in order referring this Bill back to committee with instructions to remove the clause relating to lotteries. Does the hon. gentlemen know that it kills the whole Bill ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Hear, hear ; that is just what I thought.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Nobody said the contrary. Then the hon. gentleman from Halifax asks the committee to take the responsibility of killing the Bill, when the hon. senator should have risen on the floor of this House and asked to have it killed here. The instruction is beyond the power of this honourable House in regard to a question of that kind. I understand that when a special committee is appointed, the House has a right to say, you shall not engage an attorney though you are appointed to make an investigation. The committee would not have a right under such instruction to employ counsel in spite of the House. That is a material fact, and the honourable House made a special committee of the Senate feel that for the last four years, so much so that the House has refused to accept the recommendation of that special committee with reference to the payment of witnesses and attorneys. These are material facts, but to say to a committee of this House you shall change your decision because the House decides so, is going too far.

The SPEAKER—I do not wish to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but I do not know that it is the desire of the House that the debate should continue in an irregular way.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I believe it is not in your jurisdiction or power, Mr. Speaker, to interrupt any senator unless he is called to order by an hon. member of the House.

The SPEAKER—The hon. gentleman was clearly infringing on rule 37; but I should like the Senate to know that if this discussion continues, it means that other senators will have a right, by tacit consent, to continue the debate.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—What I understand is this : the Speaker has no power to say to a senator that he is out of order unless a point of order is raised on the floor of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Order, order. Will the hon. gentleman who professes the greatest contempt for parliamentary law and rule——

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—No.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Why the hon. gentleman has just been doing it. Will he take the trouble to read rule 16, which is exactly the same as the Commons rule. The hon. gentleman knows that this rule was put there just to give our Speaker the power which he is using now :

> The Speaker preserves order and decorum and decides questions of order, subject to an appeal to the Senate.

The first part of this rule was not in our rule until last year.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I wish, in fairness to the Speaker, to point out that he asked the House if any hon. gentlemen desired to speak after the hon. member from Stadacona rose. The hon. gentleman from Stadacona sat down out of deference to the Speaker's request, and in accordance with our rules. The Speaker looked around, and there was silence for a reasonable time, and the hon. member from Stadacona placed the House under rule 37, so the Speaker took every precaution.

The SPEAKER—I did not stop the hon. gentleman from speaking ; but I drew attention to this fact, that if the discussion was allowed to go on in spite of rule 37, of course, it gave, by passive consent, a right to all the members of the Senate to continue the discussion.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I have no objection whatever to cease speaking at once if it is the decision of the House that the hon. the Speaker can interrupt a senator, and say he has no right to speak ; but I take issue immediately with the hon. member from Halifax and claim that the rule he has read to me is altogether in my favour. The Speaker has a right to decide a question of order, but has no right to raise one. If hon. members say that the discussion is valueless, I am prepared to take my seat. What should have been done, as the hon. member from Stadacona has pointed out, was to refer the Bill back to committee with the simple request to have it reconsidered ; and I think he has taken a wise and proper stand in the matter, not that I am in favour of or opposed to the Bill ; but when hon. senators rise and quote authorities to floor me and floor each other, it makes one tired. The hon. gentleman from Halifax quoted a rule to show that the Speaker has a right to decide questions of order. I never contended otherwise, but the ruling of the Speaker in previous years was that he had no right to interfere in the debate, but only to decide questions of order when they were raised.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think it would be just as well that the House should understand exactly what the powers of the Speaker are, so that in future these difficulties may not arise. Before the adoption of the present rule, the Speaker did not possess the power which he has exercised to-day. In the House of Lords the Speaker had no right to interfere in a debate to call any one to order, and that was our rule previous to the adoption of the present rule ; but our rules were amended for the express purpose of giving the Speaker of the Senate authority and power to call members to order when they were out of order, so that scenes such as had occurred in the past might not be repeated. In this case, so anxious was the Speaker to give every member of the Senate an opportunity to discuss this question, that before the hon. senator from Stadacona made his reply, he called upon the whole Senate to ascertain whether any one desired to speak, and he waited fully a minute in order to see if any one would rise, and no one rose.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I never heard him.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is the hon. gentleman's business to listen. I heard him distinctly.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The hon. gentleman from Belleville is nearer the Speaker than I am.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If every member would pay attention to what is going on in the House, discussions of this kind would not arise. I want to point out that the Speaker was strictly within the power vested in him by our rules when he called attention to the fact that the hon. gentleman was transgressing the rule. Let us endeavour in the future to pay attention to what is going on in the Senate and keep our eye on the Speaker, and I am safe in saying that he will never assume power that he does not possess under the rules. We have had ample experience of that. He has allowed latitude in the violation of rules when, apparently, the whole Senate was desirous of continuing a free and easy discussion—has allowed it to go on—when if he acted strictly in accordance with the rule he would have stopped the debate.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—With a view of solving the difficulty, as there may be other clauses in the Bill in addition to the one referred to in the instructions from the House that may require amendment, I move in amendment to add the following words to the resolution passed on the 6th of March—'and make such other changes in the subject of the Bill as may commend themselves to the judgment of the committee.'

Hon. Mr. KERR—I suppose it is intended that the further authority which is to be given is not to be inconsistent with the instructions which have been given ?

Hon. GENTLEMEN—No, no.

Hon. Mr. KERR—This would leave it at large.

Hon. Mr. POWER—No, it preserves it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It is giving the committee power to change the other clause.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Yes, in their judgment.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the motion is put, I will just call attention to the quotation I referred to, which I had not at hand then. At page 556 Bourinot says :

As the rules of the House govern proceedings of committees generally a committee cannot renew a question on which its judgment has already been expressed. For instance, we recognize the operation of this rule in the fact that in committees on a Bill a new clause or amendment will not be allowed in contravention of a previous decision. It has been ruled in the English House that when a select committee has resolved that the preamble of a private Bill has not been proved and ordered the chairman to report, it is not competent for the committee to reconsider and reverse its decision, but that the Bill should be recommitted for that purpose. Consequently the correct procedure in all analogous cases is for the House to give the committee instructions which will enable it to consider the whole question again.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The latter part of the amendment should be struck out.

The SPEAKER—The amendment will read, 'and to make such other changes to the said Bill as may recommend themselves to the judgment of the committee.'

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That leaves the instructions as they were, but gives the committee more power.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—That is the intention, in order that there may be an understanding that the feeling of the House with reference to certain sections remains the same—that is that it is desired that those figures be eliminated.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Not a desire, an order.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Well, an order. Now, the intention of this amendment is, that if there are other clauses in the Bill which, in the nature of things, should be amended without varying the instructions of the other day, the committee is thereby empowered to make those other changes ; but the House still adheres to the decision of the other day, objecting to the features which they considered were lottery features. With that clear understanding——

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It is well understood. It is mandatory in the first part, and giving power in the second.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Suppose the first provision does not recommend itself to the judgment of the committee, what are you going to do ?

The SPEAKER—The decision is mandatory, and the committee will have to abide by the decision of the Senate. In order to complete the answer to the hon. gentleman, I may state that on the 14th of April, 1851, an instruction was given to the committee on the East Lancashire Railway Bill in the English House of Commons—that is to a private Bills committee—to strike out of the said Bill all powers of interference with other companies, and to confine the promoters to the remaining objects of the Bill. A similar instruction was given in 1890 to the committee on the London County Council Bill, and the Wolverhampton Corporation Bill, and to omit certain clauses from the Bill. The question is on the amendment of the hon gentleman from Killarney.

The amendment was agreed to.

The motion, as amended, was adopted.

FILLING OF SENATE VACANCIES.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to congratulate the government on the alacrity with which they have filled the vacancy created by the death of our late lamented friend Sir William Hingston, in the province of Quebec, and to ask why the vacancies which have occurred in other provinces have not been filled ? There is in the province of Nova Scotia a vacancy which has been standing for more than 12 months. In New Brunswick we know that vacancies remained unfilled for some one or two years. They have however been filled lately. There are three vacancies now in Ontario. One of them has been vacant for some months. Fortunately, the other two have not been vacant so long. Are there no gentlemen in the province of Ontario seeking the position, or, if they are seeking the position, are they not of such a character as to justify their appointment ?

One cannot help observing the difference between the action of the government in filling vacancies in Quebec and in the other provinces. Are we to understand that the government have not sufficient confidence in the representatives of that province, or that they do not pay sufficient attention to the legislation of the country to look after the interests of that province? Or are we to consider that the representatives from the other provinces are so on the alert that the interests of their provinces never would suffer, and consequently there is no necessity for filling the vacancies? I wish it to be distinctly understood that I am not finding fault with the gentleman who has been appointed. From what I can learn he is not only well fitted for the position, but will be a credit to the Senate, and if all the appointments of the government should be of the same character it would add to the dignity and respectability of this chamber. I am quite willing to say that. But what I find fault with is that the other provinces are not treated in the same manner as the province of Quebec, Is it because the supporters of the government from those provinces have not sufficient influence with the cabinet to insist upon the appointments being made, or does the same reason apply to the province of Nova Scotia. Or what inference are we to draw from the rapid filling of this vacancy? Is it that there is a clamour in Quebec as to who should have the position, and the vacancy has been filled in, to stop the clamour so that no further pressure will be brought to bear upon the government. Is that not really the fact? I do not fancy it will allay the agitation, but is it not in order to stop the pressure which may cause a great deal of trouble to the government? Are the rumours which we hear correct that when necessary, in the interest of the party, certain gentlemen are prepared to place their resignation at the disposal of the government in order that the wrath of those who desire other gentlemen appointed may be appeased? I am more particularly interested in the province from which I come. I know that in my locality a gentlemen is constantly telling the people—and actually showing a copy of a letter sent by one of the ministers to him promising him a vacancy eight or ten years ago. There has been a dozen vacancies since that period. I should like to know whether the promise made by the government, if one was made, is to be fulfilled? He is a very ardent supporter of the hon. gentleman, and he is very anxious to have this seat. Why in the world are these positions kept vacant? Are there no applications made? If there are no applications, surely the government might advertise, and they could get some applicants.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I must congratulate my hon. friend on the very ingenious deductions he has drawn both from the rapid action in filling the last vacancy and also the conclusions he has reached in reference to the causes for the delay. I am afraid we are following the very bad example set us.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If there ever was a bad example, the hon. gentleman would be sure to follow it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am not aware that the public service is suffering at the present moment. Several names have been submitted, and no doubt in good time one of them will be selected for each vacancy.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Does the hon. gentleman intend to bring down his Bill for reforming the Senate this session?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will give it consideration.

DISCOURTESY TO THE SENATE.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to direct attention of the Senate to the fact that this House is continually and deliberately slighted by members of the government in reference to information which they are by statute bound to lay before parliament. It is only a week ago we had one of these slights by the Minister of Finance with reference to a certain Bill laid before the House of Commons, which we were not favoured with. There is an Act on the statute-book with reference to civil service insurance, and section 17 reads as follows:

> The said superintendent shall within three months after the 30th day of June, each year, prepare for the minister a statement showing the amount received for premiums during the 12 months ending on the said 30th day of June, for all insurance contracts entered into previous to the said date, and the amount of all sums paid in connection therewith during the said period, the number of new contracts entered into since the previous statement, and the gross amount thereof, with such further details and particulars as are deemed advisable.

2. The minister shall lay the said statement before parliament within thirty days after the commencement of the session thereof next after the date of said agreement.

I have yet to learn that the Senate is not a branch of parliament, and I think it is a matter of proper complaint that we are not treated with the same respect as the House of Commons. The Minister of Finance should see that this information is laid before the Senate as well as the House of Commons. The Minister of Finance is an offender in this respect, and it appears he was also an offender last week; but I am free to say that he is not the only offender, because systematically this House is slighted with regard to information of this kind which is required by law to be laid before parliament.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Could the hon. gentleman tell me whether the return has been presented to the House of Commons?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Yes, I have inquired, and I find that it was presented to the House of Commons and not to the Senate.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is very improper and very wrong. I am not aware that any offence of that kind has been committed before. As a rule, documents of that character are made in duplicate, one to be presented here and one to the House of Commons. However, I will make inquiry. What clause of the Act did the hon. gentleman refer to?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Clause 17 of the Civil Service Insurance Act of 1893.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is very discourteous, and I will tell the minister so.

DOMINION LANDS SURVEYS BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on (Bill 59) An Act respecting the Surveys of the Public Lands of the Dominion and the Surveyors entitled to make such Surveys.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The law relating to surveys in the public lands is also that relating to surveyors and their examinations and duties. It has heretofore formed part of the Dominion Lands Act. As the hon. gentlemen are aware, the Dominion Lands Act has been introduced in the other Chamber, and, in it all reference to the surveys and duties of surveyors has been omitted. The two subjects, it was thought, should be divided, and this Bill we are now considering is limited entirely to the surveys of the public lands and to the duties of surveyors. I may say I am advised that changes in the law which are to be found in the various statutes for the last thirty years are not material. I will be very glad to point out, as we proceed with the Bill, the changes which have been made. It is practically a codification of the law as it stands to-day. No change was made in the House of Commons, and there are notes attached to the House of Commons copy which would facilitate hon. gentlemen who desire to follow the various clauses submitted.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Before the committee rises, I should like to say that an excellent opportunity is offered in carrying out the suggestion made by the Australian Commonwealth, which will be found in the return brought down by this government containing despatches and orders in council relative to the colonial conference to be held next month in London. On page 25 of the return, the following suggestion from the Australian Commonwealth will be found :

VIII.—Reciprocity as to land surveyors.
That reciprocity should be established between the respective governments and examining authorities throughout the empire with regard to the examination and authorization of land surveyors, so that any surveyor who has properly complied with the tests and conditions prescribed by the Imperial government or the government of any self-governing dependency, and has duly received the requisite authority to enable him to act as surveyor, should be enabled to practise his profession in any other part of the empire, subject only to his satisfying the government or examining authority of the country in which he desires to practise his knowledge of the necessary local Acts or regulations which may be in force therein relating to the survey of land therein.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Will the hon. gentleman look at clause 46 of this Bill.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We have not got as far as having the surveyors in our several provinces recognized everywhere in the Dominion.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It struck me at the time I read this, that on the passage of this Bill a very opportune occasion would be presented to embody a reciprocal provision by which surveyors of all parts of the empire should be permitted to practise their profession in the Dominion upon, say, passing an examination or upon submitting to the necessary authorities a standard equal to that imposed by the Canadian government for the admission of Canadian land surveyors. If there is to be unity in the empire between its different portions, something of the kind should be done ; and it should not be limited to surveyors only, but should be extended to all the learned professions. I throw out this suggestion, so that instead of waiting until the colonial conference discusses the matter, the parliament of Canada might take the initiative. I know of no other part of the empire that could better do so, and I would suggest that, before this Bill passes its third reading, the government should take into consideration the propriety of embodying within it a provision that any land surveyor, from any part of the empire, coming into Canada, who has passed an examination of as high a standard as that imposed by the Canadian authorities should be permitted to practise his profession in Canada upon condition that Canadian surveyors be given the same privilege in other parts of the empire.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—The hon. gentleman will find what he speaks of is fully provided for in clause 46 of this Bill (59), which provides as follows :

46. Every person who shows, to the satisfaction of the Board of Examiners, that he has duly qualified as a surveyor of lands in any part of His Majesty's dominions other than the provinces of Canada, and that he has had at least two years practice either as a surveyor or as a pupil to a surveyor (of which practise at least six months has been in the field), shall be entitled to a commission on passing an examination in such subjects as are prescribed by this Act for the examination of candidates seeking to become articled pupils and Dominion land surveyors ; and on his producing an affidavit from a Dominion land surveyor in the form C in the schedule to this Act, together with his own affidavit in the form D in the schedule to this Act, that he has, in addition to the service aforesaid, served for one year with such surveyor, inclusive of at least six months actual practice with him in the field.

The way they carry on surveys in other parts of the empire differs from surveying in Canada. For instance, there is very little surveying to be done in England. The land marks were established centuries ago ; consequently, surveyors in England act mostly as architects, land valuators, &c., and they are very seldom called upon to make surveys. Then in India there are any number of Hindoos who are good surveyors in their way, but their way is altogether different from ours, and it would take them more than the six months, as provided in clause 46, to become qualified as surveyors in Canada. Even in our own Dominion—and I know whereof I speak, because I am a surveyor not only in Quebec but in Manitoba—there are differences in the systems of the different provinces. There is a difference between the system in Ontario and the system in Manitoba, and when you go to Quebec, our system of surveying is such that even a very good Dominion land surveyor would be at a loss to make a survey in the city of Montreal. The practice is different altogether. So, even in our own country, we could not have surveyors going from one province to another, and that being so, 'a fortiori' it would be more difficult to get surveyors coming from India or England to practise here. Surveyors frequently come from England to Montreal, and are employed there in offices. It takes them some time to become familiar with our system. I would oppose such an exchange as is proposed, because it would not tend to help the public service.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—Do they not all run on the same principle ? The hon. gentleman should have shown in what respect there would be a radical difference.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—It would take a long time to go into the details of the subject. I do not think it would be workable. It might do to apply the principle to lawyers, but I suppose lawyers from other parts of the empire would have difficulty in working out the laws of Quebec. As for doctors, I suppose it would be quite acceptable to them ; but I am afraid the hon. Secretary of State has very little faith in doctors.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I might say in answer to what my hon. friend has said, that the difficulty with reference to any unity of action seems usually to come from the province of Quebec, and I see no reason why that should be the case. I say that without drawing any invidious distinction between the different provinces of Canada ; but we find the same objection arising, for instance, in reference to the admission of members of the medical fraternity from the different provinces of Canada to practise throughout the whole Dominion. Our worthy colleagues from the province of Quebec usually interposed the objection, that there should be certain arbitrary and inflexible examinations passed. Now my objection to clause 46 is this : A surveyor coming from any part of the empire would certainly be in no better position than a student who had been articled to his profession in any part of Canada. He would have to pass the necessary examinations, and this invariably is the objection with reference to men of mature age who may have practised their professions most successfully in other parts of the empire. We know the difficulty of a man of mature years passing an examination in all the technicalities that may be submitted by the examiner.

If there is to be unity in the empire : if we are to be all one people, there is no good reason why a professional man, if he is capable, and practising his profession in another part of the empire, should not be equally permitted to practise his profession in Canada : and there is no reason why, in professional statutes of this kind, we should not have a reciprocal provision, permitting those who have passed an examination at least of equal standard in other parts of the empire, to practise in Canada, provided that those who are admitted in the Dominion of Canada should be allowed to practise a like profession in other parts of the empire. I would suggest to my hon. friend, the leader of the government, that clause 46 of this Bill should be amended, because it does not at all meet the requirements of the case.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—The remarks which the hon. gentleman from Calgary has urged on the House are worthy of consideration. It is a consummation most devoutly to be wished for, but it cannot be done. I will show the impossibility. I would wish to make it unanimous, not on such high patriotic grounds as the hon. gentleman has mentioned, but to secure a better class of men by having a uniform system of examination. Australia can send its students over to England with a profession, but Canada cannot do it. Why ; because Australia is one country. Canada is also, but the provinces have not agreed to a uniform system. That has been looked for a great many times, but has not been secured, because it is necessary to obtain the consent of all the provinces. When you take such a degree to the college of surgeons there they will recognize it and pass it ; but no matter how extensive your learning and researches may be, you cannot enter there without coming under their rule and taking an examination in that way. We come from provinces, but when Canada sends a degree of the Dominion of Canada, instead of a province of Canada, it will be recognized. Therefore, to carry out the plan, which is most desirable, that the hon. gentleman has presented, so far as medicine is concerned, it will be necessary first to get the provinces of Canada to agree.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Some reference has been made——

The CHAIRMAN—I think this discussion is entirely out of order.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Can we not discuss clause 47 ?

The CHAIRMAN—Clause 47 has passed.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—The leader of the opposition made some reference to the province of Quebec. So far as Quebec is concerned, we would be only too happy to have such an exchange as he proposes, because it would be altogether to our advantage. We could qualify in all the other provinces very easily, but it would not be so easy for professional men from the other provinces to qualify in Quebec. Our law requires us to be able to read and write French and English correctly, and that might not be so easy for professional men in the other provinces. It will be quite easy for us to qualify in the other province, and, as a matter of fact, some of us do. I am sure a surveyor who could not understand both languages would be of very little use, especially in the rural parts of the province of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I should like to ask my hon. friend whether it would not be a matter of sufficient consideration for the government to give its best thought to amending this clause to meet the suggestion made by the Commonwealth of Australia, so that before the colonial conference takes up the subject, Canada might have the credit of taking the initial step in this particular direction ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The suggestion made by my hon. friend is one that commends itself to my judgment if it were at all practicable ; but with the knowledge I have of surveying in different countries, I know it is absolutely impracticable. There is in all the professions such extreme jealousy that it is quite impossible to induce them to take the wide view of conditions that my hon. friend has suggested. There is one profession, certainly, above all others that ought to be on the same basis in all countries, and that is the medical profession. If there is any scientific basis to it at all, it ought to be alike everywhere, and what do we find? You cannot get the medical men of the provinces of this Dominion to agree. My hon. friend was rather hard, I think, on the province of Quebec. It was a surgeon from the province of Quebe who year after year introduced a Bill into the House of Commons for the purpose of adopting one system of examination for all the medical doctors of the different provinces, and yet he could make no headway whatever, and one of the most obstinate of the provinces was Ontario. You could not get the doctors there to agree.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—Excuse me.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—Quebec was not willing.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—My recollection is, there was not a single province that gave its cordial assent. The law of Ontario is most positive ; they do not recognize degrees outside of the province of Ontario. I merely mention that as an illustration.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—With reference to the Roddick Bill, to which the hon. gentlemen has referred, the only province in the Dominion that objected to unity of purpose, so to speak, was the province of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I think the hon. member is mistaken.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I was in the House of Commons at the time Dr. Roddick introduced his Bill. Occupying the magnificent position he did, as the head of his profession in the province of Quebec, he thought he might bring in a Bill to give members of the medical profession the right to practice in all the provinces, and my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, has stated quite correctly that the whole of the opposition came from the province of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Other provinces objected, especially British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. THIBAUDEAU, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (XX) An Act respecting a certain patent of Philp J. Green, Melvin Hunt, and John McMurrich.—Hon. Mr. Kerr.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at Three o'clock.

SENATE.

OTTAWA, Wednesday, March 13, 1907.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

EXTENSION OF TIME FOR PRESENTING PETITIONS.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG, from the Committee on Standing Orders, presented their twenty-third report. He said: I move the suspension of rules 24 and 24a with regard to this report. This is a recommendation that the petitioners be allowed to present a petition to the House, they having given good reasons for the delay in the emergency which has arisen very recently, and so recently that they were only enabled to bring themselves within the rules and present the petition within the proper time. There has been some delay with reference to this petition asking for leave to present a petition to the House. For some unknown reason it went astray and missed one sitting of the Committee on Standing Orders. If that had not happened, the petition would have been passed in its regular course before this. I ask the indulgence of the House so that this report may be adopted to-day to enable the petitioner to present the petition to the House.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If I understand my hon. friend, it is a petition asking for leave to present a petition.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Yes, upon which we have reported favourably.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I do not see that there is any necessity for suspending the rule in this case.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I am in the hands of the House. Rule 24 provides that one day's notice must be given for the adoption of a report, not merely formal in its character, from any standing committee.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It is the adoption of the report for which the hon. gentleman desires the suspension of the rules?

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Not for the petition?

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—No.

The motion was agreed to and the report concurred in.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I beg to present the petitions of Donald McGillivray and of the Standard Life Insurance Company. I understand the time for presenting Private Bills expires to-day. As the hon. chairman of the Committee on Standing Orders has explained, these petitions have come up a little late, but it was not really through any fault of the promoters, and, in order to save the Bills, I move that rule 113 be suspended so far as it refers to the Bills mentioned in these petitions. Rule 113 reads:

> Every private Bill is introduced on petition and presented to the Senate after the petition has been favourably reported upon by the Standing Orders Committee.

I do not propose that the Standing Orders Committee shall not report, but I simply propose that the Bills shall not be cut out, so they will be too late when the committee reports, if it does report, to-morrow, and for that reason I would ask the indulgence of the House to suspend rule 113, so as to preserve the life of these Bills.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think the suspension should be recommended by the Standing Orders Committee.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The report is as follows:

> Your committee being satisfied with the reasons for the delay in each case, recommend the suspension of rules 113 and 110 and that leave be given the said parties to present the petition.

I simply wish to prevent the Bills from being killed.

Hon Mr. LANDRY—That is in accordance with the recommendation of the committee and continuing the action of the committee itself?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (YY) An Act respecting the Erie-Ontario Power Company.—(Hon. Mr. Power.)

Bill (ZZ) An Act respecting the Standard Life Insurance Company.—(Hon. Mr. Power.)

TECHNICAL EDUCATION IN CANADA.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. DAVID moved :

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General ; praying that His Excellency will be pleased to cause to be laid before this House all papers, correspondence and resolutions in connection with the establishment or encouragement of technical education in this country.

He said : I shall not make any remarks on this motion now, because I do not know if there are any documents.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—A deputation called on the members of the government not very long ago and left a memo. in the shape of a small pamphlet, showing the advantage it would be to the country if technical education were supported. Whatever it is, I shall be very glad to bring it down.

The motion was agreed to.

SENATORIAL APPOINTMENTS.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I want to draw the attention of the government to a matter which occurred yesterday, and which compels me to bring it to the cognizance of the Senate ; it is a question which affects the privileges of this House. Yesterday a new member of this House was introduced by the government, and the hon. member from Belleville congratulated the government on the promptitude and alacrity they showed in making the nomination. I want hon. gentlemen to understand at the outset that I have nothing to say against the gentleman who has been nominated. I consider the nomination a very good one ; but I want to call attention to the way the nomination has been made. The senatorial division which the hon. gentleman represents contains three counties, the county of Rouville is one of them. That county is represented in the House of Commons by the hon. Minister of Marine, and in the local legislature by a gentleman named Girard. I am giving you the information so that you may understand the article I shall now read. It is published in the Montreal 'Gazette' of to-day, and is as follows :

An angry Liberal—Mr. Girard, M.L.A. for Rouville, charges peculiar arrangement by Minister of Marine.—Saving seat in the Senate.—Mr. Dessaulles is doing this for Hon. Mr. Brodeur, says the disappointed one

Mr. Alfred Girard, M.L.A. for Rouville, gives the following interview to La Patrie concerning the senatorial succession to the late Sir William Hingston :

'When Senator Hingston died my colleagues in the legislature, without first consulting me, prepared a petition to Sir Wilfrid Laurier asking for my nomination to the Senate. When I heard of the movement I said that I could not accept without the authorization of my leaders. This authorization, however, had been accorded in advance. All the provincial ministers supported the recommendation to the federal government, which was taken to Ottawa by the member for Laprairie. Sir Wilfrid replied that the matter was in the hands of the Minister of Marine. Mr. Brodeur stated that he feared to open the county of Rouville by appointing Mr. Girard. Hon. Mr. Gouin, however, relieved him of this apprehension by saying that he would be responsible for the provincial election. In the meantime a petition, signed by 210 leading Liberals in the county of Rouville was sent to Hon. Mr Brodeur, claiming the position for a man from the county of Rouville, and recommending their local member.

'Hon. Mr. Brodeur, whom I met in Ottawa, on Tuesday last, gave me to understand that the question was settled. He spoke to me as follows :—I will keep the position for myself. I will appoint in the first place Mr. Dessaulles, whose resignation I have in my pocket, to take effect on the eve of the elections when I will take his place and become leader of the Senate. I declared to Mr. Brodeur that I could not endorse such a scandalous act, and that I would not be a party to such an affront to the county of Rouville by its own member. I told him that he could appoint some one besides myself, but it must be some one from the county, which had waited long enough its turn. Informed of the fact my friend advised me to appeal directly to Sir Wilfrid Laurier in order to prevent the perpetration of this injustice. I went again to Ottawa and saw Mr. Brodeur, who said that everything would be arranged, that the county of Rouville would have its senator and that it was not necessary to speak to the Prime Minister. On the faith of this promise I returned. This was on Friday, and on Saturday the Governor General in Council appointed Mr. Dessaulles, of St Hyacinthe. I was at Marieville when the news arrived. I received messages from all parts of the county, and you can say that the dissatisfaction is general amongst the Liberals of the county of Rouville.'

I call the attention of the hon. leader of the House to these facts, because his seat is not very sure now, as at the eve of the general elections we are going to have a new leader in this House, and I ask him his intention in the matter. Will he, as the leader of this House, move the nomination of a committee to inquire into the truth of those allegations, or will he take any notice of it? I put the question to him to see what he will do, reserving for myself the right to move in this matter later on.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think the statement read by the hon. gentleman shows its absurdity on the very face of it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It is a Liberal who makes the statement.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I care not whether he is a Liberal or Conservative. I do not suppose you would expect the government to take any stock in newspaper reports of that kind, written for a purpose. The Hon. Mr. Dessaulles was called to the Senate by recommendation to His Excellency to summon him.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The government has no intention to move in the matter?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—None at all.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Not the slightest.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Every one must admire the reply given by the hon. Secretary of State to the statement which has just been read. He gave us information which every hon. senator must know to be a fact, that the hon. gentleman was recommended to His Excellency, and the appointment was made. That is not the point to which my hon. friend calls attention. The charge is that there was a bargain made by one of the ministers with the gentleman who was appointed, to resign when the Minister of Marine was prepared to accept the position and become the leader of the House and occupy the same position my hon. friend opposite now does. Now, when I read the article, I could not help congratulating myself on the fact that history repeats itself. It is quite evident that my hon. friend has some traitors in his camp, and it is an old saying that 'misery likes company'. Under such circumstances, I can from the bottom of my heart sympathize with my hon. friend. The only difference between the event to which I have referred and the present occasion is that the hon. gentleman is forewarned and I was not. He can sit in the Senate until the next general election, when his place is to be usurped by one of his colleagues. The question is, is that true? To be serious in this matter, my hon. friend says that you are to place no dependence in newspaper reports. I think this case is taken altogether out of that category. This is an interview with the reporter of 'La Patrie,' not of the 'Gazette,' and he has put upon record what the local member for Rouville is said to have related as occurring between him and a member of the cabinet. That is the charge. It is not a mere rumour. I had heard something of this when I called the hon. gentleman's attention to the rumour, but I would not venture to make the statements which are made in that article. The reason I think the hon. gentleman from Stadacona is justified in the position he has taken is this: If the government, in appointing gentlemen to this honourable body, are to enter into a bargain and sale, the sooner the country knows it and the better for the Senate.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is absolutely untrue.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is bringing the Senate into contempt every time anything of the kind is done. If the hon. gentleman is prepared to say the statement made by Mr. Girard is false, we are bound as senators to accept the statement; but here we have a statement made solemnly by a well known journal——

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—What paper is that.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—'La Patrie.' It is translated and copied into the Montreal 'Gazette.' Now it is a question which should be set at rest in all seriousness. Bargains of that kind should not be made. Members appointed to the Senate should be appointed on their merits and not as the result of a bargain such as that which Mr. Girard states on the authority of one of the ministers, was made. It is something that the government ought to repudiate at once. If the Minister of Marine and Fisheries made such a statement as that referred in the article, he ought to either leave the cabinet or those who are associated with him should resign.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The rule in such cases, and the common sense of the case is this : If my hon. friend from Belleville, or the hon. member from Stadacona who has brought the matter before the House, is prepared to rise in his place and say that he believes that such a thing took place, then undoubtedly he is entitled to demand an investigation ; but unless some member is prepared to take the responsibility on himself of saying that he believes this charge to be true, I would recommend the honourable House to pay no attention whatever to any newspaper statement of the kind that has just been read.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I should like to know where the hon. gentleman finds the theory he is presenting now, that, in order to bring a matter to the attention of the Senate, some member must declare that he believes the statement and believes he can prove it. I may bring up the question as a matter of privilege. If I make a personal attack against a member of this House I might be required to take the responsibility of saying that I am creditably informed that such a thing has occurred ; but where is the member on the government side of the House who thought of making an accusation in that form when he attacked the government of the day while the Liberal party were in opposition? They had perfect liberty to attack the government. The government to-day is accused of making a bargain, and I am free to bring that fact before the House, not as my own invention, but as a matter brought before the public by a member of the legislative assembly, a member of the Liberal party, who complains of the conduct of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. I am asking the government, who have charge of the dignity of this House, if they will do something to preserve the reputation of the Senate. If they do not, the public will form their own conclusion.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I have told the hon. gentleman that we will pay no attention whatever to any such statement.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—I wish to remind hon. gentlemen opposite that the French Canadians have no right to that appointment at all, and it was very dishonest of them to be bargaining about a seat which really belonged to somebody else. Whatever may be the policy of the government with regard to the representation of minorities, it ought to be considered that, when they appointed a gentleman so quickly to this House, there was something improper about it inasmuch as the hon. gentleman who so ably and well served in this House for many years should have been succeeded by some one of the same religious persuasion. I would not say a word about politics, but attention should be given to religion by the government whether openly or otherwise. I may as well tell the plain truth of the matter. I feel sad, as a Catholic that this representation should diminish, because it has been insufficient up to the present time. We have now only one representative in this House of the English speaking Catholics of the province of Quebec, while there are three representatives of the English speaking Protestants of the province of Quebec. That is unfair, and the head of the Liberal party should have had as much liberality as Sir Mackenzie Bowell, whom they always looked upon as the quintessence of Protestantism. The English speaking Catholics of the province of Quebec are entitled to at least two senators, and there are plenty of men of ability fitted to represent them here. As to the constituency being French, that has nothing to do with it. I represent a constituency where there is a large majority of Protestants, and there are other senators here in the same position. The onus of representing Catholics here, looking after whatever duties may devolve on him, falls on the hon. member from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Cloran). I hope he will not sink under the burden of his duties. The Catholic senators from Ontario—I cannot speak for the maritime provinces—will, I am sure, be happy to assist him.

Hon. Mr. KERR—As the hon. gentleman from Stadacona does not take the responsibility of making this statement, and has not offered a motion ; and as the hon. member from Belleville has been equally, shall I say, prudent in the matter, and as the hon. member from Kingston is equally quiet on that subject, I suppose it only remains for us to express our cordial sympathy with the hon. member from Belleville for the position in which he found himself on an occasion of some importance. I am sure we all desire to extend to him our most cordial sympathy; but before doing that, and in order to give him the full measure of sympathy, I should like to know whether the statement he has made to-day is the correct one, as compared with one we heard before. We all read, not that he found a traitor in the camp, but that he found himself in his cabinet in 'a nest of traitors', and one who has found himself in such a position requires a great deal more sympathy than those who may find themselves associated with only one traitor.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman from Toronto, then does accept statements made in the press about what took place in the cabinet?

Hon. Mr. KERR—I take the statement of the hon. gentleman himself, that he found himself in a nest of traitors. To-day the reference is only to one traitor.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—The hon. member from Stadacona may have had the right to inquire whether the government was aware of anything such as was mentioned in the article he read, but when he received the answer which was made, it should have put an end to the matter. To my mind the statement which has been quoted is simply absurd. I happen to be closely connected with the hon. gentleman who has just been called to the Senate, and can say without hesitation that he had not even solicited the position. I affirm for myself that he never asked me or suggested my seeking the position for him, nor did I, and if he had been inclined to do anything of the kind I have reason to believe I would have been the first person to whom he would have applied. Therefore, members of this honourable House would feel assured that the hon. gentleman was appointed to the Senate in the most honourable manner. As far as this interview is concerned, I understand that the hon. minister, whose name has been connected with it, is to make —has very likely by this time made a declaration for himself.

Hon. Mr. KERR.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I should like to say a word in reference to the remarks made by the hon. senator from Kingston. At the time of confederation the various districts in Lower Canada were duly allotted. It was understood that a certain number of Protestant gentlemen were to represent the eastern townships and so on throughout the province of Quebec. The gentleman who was allotted to Rougemont was the Hon. Mr. Chaffers, a Frenchman, and, when Sir William Hingston was appointed it was well understood to be a departure, but Sir William's position at the time was so important and elevated that it was thought there might be a diversion in his case, but it was fully understood that when Sir William Hingston gave up the position or died it was to come back to a French-Canadian.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Since the statement is now made on behalf of the government by the hon. Secretary of State in regard to this matter, I feel it my duty to say a word or two on the subject. I did not wish to raise the question inopportunely, but the opportunity has come for me to say a word in behalf of the people I represent in the province of Quebec. The hon. senator from Kingston was very moderate in his statement in regard to the representation of minorities in that province. He said the English-speaking Protestants of the province of Quebec were represented by three senators. I find that they are represented by five—Sir George Drummond, Senator Owen, Senator Baker, Senator McKay and Senator Mitchell. The number may be a little more than they are entitled to, but their personnel certainly does honour to the position they occupy in this House on behalf of the people they represent and in the interests of the country. As matters go in the province of Quebec, the minority question is taken into consideration, and in the formation of the government of the day, whether it be Conservative or Liberal, no government since confederation has undertaken to form a Cabinet without an English Protestant from the province of Quebec. Under Conservative rule the English-speaking Catholics were fairly—not over numerously—represented in the Cabinet. They had as many as three and four at a time in the councils of the nation. They had a Prime Minister, who was a Catholic, Sir John Thompson, a Minister of Inland Revenue, Mr. Costigan, Solicitor General Mr. Curran, and another able and well-known man who is now dead, Sir Frank Smith. So in those days we had very little to complain of. At present, and for sometime past, that element, which numbers about one-sixth of the population of Canada, has but one-fifteenth of the representation in the Cabinet. There is no use in denying that, and I am not here on behalf of my people to deny or conceal it. We feel that justice is not done in this matter and I wish it to be well understood that our people are no more office-hunters than others. The governments of the day, whether Liberal or Conservative, take effective means to secure representation outside of the ranks of the House of Commons and members of the Senate. They go abroad and select men for the position. They have done so on behalf of the French-Canadians in Quebec and also on behalf of the English Protestants in Manitoba, and they have done so in British Columbia.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—And in Ontario.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—And in Ontario also, especially on both sides, and I am not discussing this now from a party point of view, I am discussing it from the point of view of the welfare of the nation. I have no objection whatever to our English Protestant confreres from the province of Quebec, having as many hon. members in this House or in the other Chamber as they are in a position in many counties to elect, although their power is decreasing every day in that regard, and the day is fast coming when in no county except through good will and generosity of the French people can an English member be elected to the House of Commons. Probably in the province of Quebec there are not more than three or four constituencies where they have enough English speaking population, Protestants and Catholics combined, to elect a member. It depends on the goodwill and generosity of the French Canadian element to elect them to parliament. I must state here, to their great credit, that they have not been backward in affording facilities to the English speaking people to obtain representation, either by election or nomination, and I express my admiration of these generous qualities. If that is admitted as far as the English speaking Protestant element is concerned, I would like on behalf of the other section of the population to secure if possible, I won't say equal or as great, but a fair share of the representation. We have had an example of what the French Canadians are prepared to do in that matter, no later than last month, when a French county elected an Irish Catholic in the person of Mr. Charles Devlin. Apart from that county we have Quebec Centre and Montreal Centre, which claim it as a right, and in which as a matter of fact, according to the electoral lists, if the Frenchmen wish to nominate a candidate, we would have absolutely no chance to elect a member. So that we have to depend upon the good-will of the French population.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—And Quebec West.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Yes, that is what I say. Now we are not afraid of the electorate. The people are very generous in that respect; but we come to the government of the day, who control the destinies of this country, who wish to have the country develop along lines of union and harmony, and I say to the government, that they should be as generous at least, and as careful of the rights of the minority as are the electors. The English speaking Catholics are more numerous than the English speaking Protestants, yet we have but one member here.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—What is the Irish Catholic population?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I think 150,000 to 160,000, and the English Protestant population is about the same number—about evenly divided. I have not the last census, but I have the previous one.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—About one-fifth of the whole.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—No, there is one million four hundred thousand.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—How many Irishmen are there in that division?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—There are eleven hundred odd English speaking people in that division of Rougemont, composed of Rouville, Iberville and St. Hyacinthe, of which some four hundred are English speaking and one hundred odd Scotch and four or five hundred Irish. I am taking the figures in the official organ of the government, and also the press, where it was stated that the minority had no right to representation there, quoting these figures which I have given to the House: that the population of the three divisions amounted to 48,000, and out of that there was not more than 1,100 English speaking people in the three districts. But that does not destroy the point I am making. It is not against the present nomination, but it is in regard to favourable action being taken by the government of the day that I speak. As a matter of fact, our numbers would not entitle us to any representation, not even in the city of Montreal, which I represent. We are not in a majority by any means in that city. I represent the largest part of the city of Montreal wherein there are over 200,000 of a population, but there are not more than 40,000 English speaking Catholics, and they claim the seat on the same ground it is claimed to-day. If we are to throw aside all questions of minority representation, I for one am prepared to accept and abide the consequences; but no two rules, or two measures, should apply. When a division like St. Lawrence Ward, in the city of Montreal, which is equally divided between French and English that the organs of public opinion shall not say to the Catholics of the county, 'You have no right to a candidate there because it is the Protestant banner county.' It is not that by any means. The interest represented by the 'Daily Witness,' and other organs of public opinion in Montreal, made Dr. Guerin retire from the contest, simply because he was of the Catholic persuasion, and that was the argument which forced him to retire. Now the statement that the division was a Protestant banner county is not correct. It is half French, one-fourth English and one-fourth Irish Catholics, with a mixture of Jews, Poles and others; but if the English speaking Protestants of the province of Quebec, or any other part of the country, are entitled to lay that down as a principle for their guidance in the administration of public affairs or public men, then I say apply that rule along the whole line. Don't stop in the face of one minority and neglect the other. But if all minorities would undertake henceforth not to base their demands for representation on those grounds, in either section of parliament or in the government, I for one as a Canadian, am prepared to accept the consequences and let the best man win, irrespective of claims based on religion and nationality. I am not in favour of that for a growing young people as we are; but what I contend here is that when the rule applies favourably to one section that it must not be made to tell against another section which is entitled to the same rights and to the same consideration as obtains whether under election or under nomination. I did not wish to approach this question, but now that it is before parliament, it is time that the government should know that the English speaking Catholic element of the province of Quebec in particular, in regard to this matter is not satisfied with its representation, and, unfortunately, is not in a position to dictate what it wants, because the English speaking Catholic element suffers from—I do not say division, but from diffusion over the entire province. They are not sufficiently strong in any one county to dictate to a convention who the candidates shall be. The English-speaking people of the province of Quebec have been in that happy condition for thirty or forty years. They are fast losing that position owing to emigration of their own people and immigration of French people into the English townships. We have no counties in which the English-speaking Catholics are sufficiently numerous to dictate the nomination of candidates at party conventions, therefore we labour under a difficulty which we are not capable of remedying, and the only remedy we would suggest is for the government to be as fair and generous to that element as the electorate is whenever they have a chance to do so. That is the position as far as representation on the floor of this honourable House goes. I may also state in regard to the government that the English speaking Catholic element of this country is not satisfied with the amount of representation in the Cabinet to-day. There is no doubt that we are entitled to more. We have only one out of thirteen or fourteen departments. We have very few men in the higher positions in the government and it is not because we want to be office-seekers or that we are office-hunters any more than the others, but it is well understood that the influence of any section of the country or of any nationality is determined by representation in the Cabinet and in the official life of this Dominion. What was the reason of the fight made by British Columbia for reform? Simply because that section of the country wanted to have influence in the councils of the nation. After a long and tedious fight they succeeded. Manitoba made the same fight. The western provinces, I hope, will do likewise, so that it is not as office-seekers we are bringing this matter before the public, it is because the influence of the people composing the nationalities of this confederation is acknowledged, weighed and measured by the representation it has on the floor of this House, on the floor of parliament and in the Cabinet of the country. That is the ground which we adopt. It is a fair ground. It does not trespass on the rights and privileges or prerogatives of any other province; I am always pleased to see every section of the country get fair-play in regard to these matters, because when a man holds a position in the Cabinet he is representing a certain section of the Dominion and has a certain influence in the government. It is the same on the floor of this House and on the floor of parliament, and we English-speaking Catholics are to-day without that legitimate influence which our population alone entitles us to. Out of the 6,000,000 people in this country we number close to 1,000,000, and we are without adequate representation. Our representation is good, but it is not adequate. These are facts which I think it is just as well the country should know. They feel it and they have nobody to voice their sentiments. Probably I have been a little to blame in not having brought the matter before parliament until to-day, but under the circumstances I would be failing in my duty if I did not remind this honourable House and the government that that element has been neglected in the past, and I would like to see a little more fairness and generosity extended to it, although they are not in a position to command it. Having regard to the principles of good government and the principle which underlies the administration of this country, the people of Canada should build themselves up along the lines of harmony, peace and union, and the best way to bring about so happy a result is by having a fair and proper representation.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not propose to enter into the discussion which has been going on between the two gentlemen on my left. I want to justify the position taken by the hon. gentleman from Stadacona. I remember upon two occasions in the lower House, when I had the honour of a seat there, of having taken a somewhat similar position upon two very serious matters. I called the attention of the government to certain facts, and asked them if they intended to take action in the matter, and the reply was, 'No. You have brought the question before the House and you can act on your own responsibility.' I did so. But, in the present instance, the hon. gentleman from Stadacona has read to the House a statement which reflected upon one of the ministers of the present Cabinet, and also upon the government generally, in which a representative in the local legislature of the province of Quebec makes certain statements—at least he is represented to have made them—in a responsible newspaper, that reflects not only upon the government, but reflects upon the honour of this House, if those statements are correct. Then he asked the government if they intend to take action, and what was the answer? The hon. Secretary of State said, 'We pay no attention to rumours and statements in the newspapers.' The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce said, 'If you have any charge to make against the government, take the responsibility of the act yourself and make the charge.' These were the two answers which came from the Cabinet. It rests with the hon. gentleman from Stadacona to take what action he pleases in the matter in future. It is quite in accordance with parliamentary practice, under similar circumstances, that some action should be taken. I give that as my opinion from my somewhat extended experience, and I am inclined to think my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce will concur in the correctness of the remarks I have made. The hon. gentleman from de Salabery did not meet the case at all, if he will permit me to say so. He stated what is absolutely correct, as far as I have been able to learn; but that had nothing to do with the charge which Mr. Girard makes against the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and when he sets himself right, then it will be for the hon. gentleman from Stadacona to take whatever course he thinks proper in defence of the dignity of the House.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Does the hon. gentleman pretend to say that the practice in the past has been for a gentleman in one Chamber to make an attack on the member of the government which can only be answered by a member of the other House? Neither my colleague nor myself had heard anything of the affair. The proper place to have made the charge was in the House of Commons where it could be met, and not here. It does not seem to be very good taste, nor in accordance with the usual good feeling which should prevail, to make a charge behind the back of a gentleman who is not represented here, because it was entirely new to my hon. colleague and myself; therefore it appeared quite unseemly and quite contrary to parliamentary practice, to attack a member of the government holding a seat in the other Chamber.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman has put words in my mouth that I never uttered. I made no such intimation as he states. This is a question which affects the honour and dignity of this House, and the hon. Secretary of State and the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce form part and parcel of the Cabinet which made the appointment, and, if the bargain as indicated by Mr. Girard in that article was made, then they are equally responsible.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We denied it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If the hon. gentleman had said, 'I know nothing about this; I will make inquiry about it and see what the Minister of Marine has to say about it,' that would have ended it.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—I have no objection to the hon. gentleman from Kingston and the hon. gentleman from Victoria trying to obtain as much as they can for their portion of the representation, but I think if they have any claim they should press it in another division. The French-Canadians are not bound simply because they consented in the case of a man like Sir William Hingston, a great man, a man of large character, to make an exception, and repeat the favour as long as there is a Rougemont division.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—Does the hon. gentleman admit the right of the English-speaking Catholics of this province to representation in this House?

Hon. Mr. DAVID—I admit their right, and I think they are very well represented so far. I think the hon. gentleman from Victoria division is aware that the Irishmen are well represented, but it is neither just nor generous to insist that these favours must be repeated. The French Canadians have sacrificed their rights in certain cases. Does the hon. gentleman remember that there was a period in our history when Mr. Baldwin, after having been defeated in his county in the province of Ontario, was elected unanimously by the French Canadians of Rimouski? When Mr. Baldwin was obliged to leave his seat for the county of Rimouski, did the English people contend that because the French Canadians had been so generous as to give him that constituency once that they were entitled to have another Englishman elected in Rimouski? No. I think the same argument applies in this case, and that the French Canadians of Rougemont had a right, after the death of Sir William Hingston, to resume as a right the favour which they yielded as a matter of courtesy. They were not bound to continue the favour simply because they made a concession in regard to Sir William Hingston.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—There is no parallel at all in the Baldwin case.

EASTERN TOWNSHIPS RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.

THIRD READING POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being called :

Third reading Bill (42) An Act to incorporate the Eastern Townships Railway Company. —Hon. Mr. Mitchell.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—Items 1, 2, 4 and 6 on the order paper will have to stand until the question of provincial rights has been decided by this House. I therefore move that the first Order of the Day be discharged and placed upon the orders after this question has been disposed of.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Order No. 6 is the one on which the discussion has taken place, and I think the hon. gentleman's motion should be to let the other third readings stand until we have disposed of No. 6.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think the proper way is to take item by item and dispose of each in its turn.

The SPEAKER—As these Bills stand in the names of different senators, I think it is better that each hon. member should move the discharge of the order.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I move, on behalf of the Hon. Mr. Mitchell, that the first order be discharged and that it be placed on the orders for to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not think the House ought to commit itself to the principle that all those Bills are on the same plane ? We have always discriminated in the past. Each one has been judged on its own merits. If it is a gross case, it naturally creates a very much stronger sentiment to throw it out, but we have allowed a number of Bills to pass where the local lines of railway have been connected with the main lines throughout the country where they have been connected with the frontier, and, therefore, I do not think it quite proper to lay down the principle that they are all in the same position. In regard to one of the Bills, we had a protest from the province. In regard to the others, we have had no protest. They seem to be quite willing the Bills should go through, so that the conditions in the case are quite different.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think no harm can be done by the hon. gentleman's motion. Any question in connection with these Bills can be discussed afterwards.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—It is quite true, as the hon. gentleman says, that there has been no protest from any of the other provinces for the very good reason that these Bills were not submitted for the approval of the provinces, and this Bill was sent up specially to the Ontario government, and the representative of that government appeared before the committee and in the wisdom of the committee, they passed the Bill in its present form.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Would it not be better to reserve the discussion until we reach the Bill?

The motion was agreed to.

THIRD READING.

Bill (68) An Act to establish the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island Railways Employees' Provident Fund, as amended.—(Rt. Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.)

HADLEY DIVORCE BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY moved the third reading of Bill (NN) An Act for the relief of George William Hadley.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I do not want to ask the hon. gentleman to postpone this motion until to-morrow, but if it is possible to do so, it would be more convenient. If not I will move the three months hoist immediately.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Let it go until to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I move that the Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be read a third time this day six months. My reason for making this motion was that it was disposed of last year, and it comes back this year with about the same evidence, except this year there is no defence because the respondent is sick in the hospital. The House having rejected the Bill last year, I think the same action should be taken this year.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—Having opposed this Bill on a previous occasion, and as I conceive there has been no new evidence warranting this House acting in a different manner from the way it acted last year, I feel that I could not conscientiously record my vote in favour of this divorce without doing an injustice to the parties. It may be said there was additional evidence, but that evidence was given by persons in the employ of the hotelkeeper, who is the petitioner. Hadley's sole evidence was that of parties in his employ and under his control and who should have been brought before the committee last year. We are now asked, on the same evidence that was submitted last year, and with this additional evidence, to stultify our previous action. If any substantial new evidence had been brought in to sustain the allegations of the petitioner, I would be prepared to change my vote. It may be asked, why did not this woman appear, and again oppose the passage of the Bill? We do not know; we have no means of knowing what took place between the husband and wife, whether there was collusion to obtain a divorce. The petitioner swore there was no collusion, but we know what such testimony amounts to. We have had cases of that kind before; I am satisfied there must have been collusion between the husband and wife to account for her absence. Either that, or the woman's heart failed her when she felt that she might be dragged back here year after year to be examined and cross-examined before the committee. And further, it must be borne in mind that the husband is well off and able to come here every session and employ solicitors from all parts of the country and bring witnesses from his hotel to attack the character of this woman. The petitioner was not satisfied to trust his case to lawyers in this locality, but employed one of the ablest counsels in Toronto, a man of superior ability, whose presence almost deters a witness from giving evidence he does not wish for. This lawyer was brought to assist Hadley in getting a divorce to enable him to marry again. I feel that I am only doing justice to my own conscience, and vindicating the honour of this parliament by voting as I ask this honourable House to vote, against this Bill.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY

Hon. Mr. WATSON—As a vote was taken in this House a year ago on the same divorce case, and I think I led the attack against granting the divorce, I may say I did so on account of what appeared to me defective evidence. So far as I am concerned, I have had good reason to change my mind from the nature of the evidence produced this year. They were a different class of witnesses, and I am prepared to support the report of the committee on this occasion.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—As one of the members of this House who took part in the discussion on the Bill and voted against granting the divorce on the last occasion, I may say that I listened this year to the evidence produced before the committee in this case, and was thoroughly satisfied with the fresh evidence produced that the preamble of the Bill was sustained. Had that evidence been brought before us last year, the stand I then took on this case would have been very different. I certainly consider that the evidence produced this year before the committee was sufficient to justify this man getting his divorce, and I shall vote in favour of the Bill

The amendment was declared lost, and the Bill was read the third time, and passed on a division.

THIRD READING.

Third reading Bill (59) An Act respecting the Surveys of the Public Lands of the Dominion and the Surveyors entitled to make such Surveys.—Hon. Mr. Scott.

THE HUDSON BAY ROUTE.

DEBATE CONTINUED.

The Order of the Day being called:

Resuming the further adjourned debate on the motion of the Hon. Mr. Ferguson:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency may be pleased to lay on the table of this House, copies of all reports and communications in possession of the government not already submitted to parliament, regarding the navigation of the Hudson bay and the resources and climate of the territory contiguous thereto, also copies of all grants of fishing, mining and lumbering rights, given at any time, by the government, in the said bay and territory; also copies of all reports of surveys received by the government from either engineers, surveyors or geologists, on the feasibility of railway routes, connecting any existing or prospective railway with any port on Hudson bay or James bay; also a statement of grants of land or money which have been proposed, or asked for, in aid of such railways. Also, copies of all reports received by the government in relation to the establishment of lights or other aids to navigation of Hudson bay and Hudson straits, and also a statement showing what action, if any, has been taken by the government regarding the establishment of such aids to navigation. —Hon. Mr. Lougheed.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—When I moved the adjournment of this debate, I can assure the House it was not with the intention of prolonging the discussion, or in any way dealing with the controversial questions which necessarily enter into a matter of this kind. It was rather with the view of making a few suggestions with reference to the policy of the government announced a few days earlier through the Prime Minister as to its attitude on this question. It may not have received that attention which so important a subject demands, that the government announced very definitely its committal to the building, not only of the Hudson bay road, but of the opening of the Hudson bay route for the shipment of our western products to European markets. If the government assumes the responsibility of adopting that route as a practical one for all western purposes, we may therefore not for the moment concern ourselves with the question of its feasibility. I would direct the attention of the House to the statement made by the premier in another place as follows:

> But there is one thing still more needed, that is an outlet to the sea, and the outlet to the sea is to be found in Hudson bay.

A more definite announcement than that could scarcely be made. It now remains for the government to formulate the details of its policy, and to submit that policy to parliament and the country. But it seems to me also that it would not be improper, but rather expedient, that the government should be apprised, so far as we can impress conviction upon it, as to what constitutes public sentiment west of the great lakes in relation to the policy which should be pursued in carrying out this great undertaking. Important discussions have taken place in some of the provinces of the Dominion of recent years as to an extension of their boundaries. The great province of Ontario has applied to this government for additional territory so as to permit the extension of its boundaries to Hudson bay and including therein Fort Churchill. The Manitoba government has likewise been urging their claims, as has also the province of Saskatchewan. Those three provinces are so situated that an extension of the boundaries of any one of them might very well be made to include this particular port. I desire to express my disapproval of any policy of that kind being pursued. In my judgment, Fort Churchill should not be conceded to any province; but should remain a national port under the sole control of the Dominion government.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Would the hon. gentleman tell the House what difference there is between a port being in a province and not being in a province as regards the country at large? What effect has the provincial jurisdiction?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I will try and develop that idea in as short a way as I can, by showing that there is evidently an intention on the part of the three provinces I have mentioned to increase their importance by having their boundaries extended to and including Fort Churchill. Hon. gentleman will also remember that my hon. friend, the leader of the government in this House, a few days ago brought down certain documents showing there were a great number of applications from corporations and private individuals for concessions of all kinds in that particular district, and, so far as we can observe, the government, up to that time had, apparently, not dealt with those applications; but were apparently giving consideration to whatever representations may have been made. It, therefore, must be quite apparent that if the very important possessions vested at present in the federal government in and about Hudson bay are conveyed to private individuals, corporations or even provinces of the Dominion, the national government must necessarily, to a very large extent, lose control of the administration and development generally of that port, which, I say, concerns most deeply not only western Canada, but the people of the whole northwestern portion of the continent. My present impression is, so far as I can read public opinion in the west, that this should be a state-owned enterprise, under the control of the national government, and administered by a commission so far as that idea can possibly be carried out.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I should like to know exactly what the hon. gentleman has in his mind? When he speaks of it as a national enterprise, does he mean that the port should be kept as a national port, or that the railways should be included also?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I am coming to that. I would submit this proposition to the House: That the government should not alienate any of the public domain or proprietary rights vested now in the federal government, so far as the carrying out of this enterprise in its broadest features are concerned. In the first place, what is known as the Hudson bay road should be constructed from the Saskatchewan to Fort Churchill by the government; it should be a state-owned road bed, and the government of the day should give running rights to all railways choosing to operate over its rails. This idea has been growing steadily in that western country for several years past. When hon. gentlemen take into consideration the fact that we have now practically four of the largest transcontinental systems rapidly developing that country it will at once be observed, and its importance must be noted, that whatever links connect the Saskatchewan river with the Hudson bay should be a state-owned road-bed, so that the four great systems which are operating in the west may have running rights to tide water under the control of a properly appointed commission. The Canadian Pacific Railway is already at the Saskatchewan. The Grand Trunk Pacific is skirting in its construction the whole of the great Saskatchewan river and we have the Canadian Northern in the same vicinity. We have the Great Northern, one of the great railway systems of the United States steadily pushing its way into the interior of that country. Consequently, before this road to Hudson bay could be built, I undertake to say we will have four great transcontinental systems operating throughout the whole of that northwestern country. Therefore, it only requires to be mentioned for hon. gentlemen to appreciate its vast importance to that western country, the great facilities which necessarily would be afforded to those transcontinental systems if the government owned the road-bed and gave to these railway systems free running rights from the Saskatchewan to the sea. Then as to the port. The road having been built, the government must necessarily give the best consideration to the development of the port of Churchill. In my humble judgment, the government should establish that as a national port; should build dockage piers, wharfs and elevating facilities so that the port should be equipped according to most modern conditions in every respect.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—By 'national ports' does the hon. gentleman suggest a free port like Hamburg in Germany?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I used it in its general and broadest sense. Whether it is to be a free port or tolls are to be exacted, is largely a matter of detail. The idea I wish to convey to the House is that the government should exercise the broadest powers in dealing with the subject of the development of that port both in its control and administration. Now, as to administering it, the road being built, and the port developed in the way of the construction of docks, wharfs, piers and elevating facilities, it seems to me that that property should be administered by a commission. It is time that the government of Canada placed in commission the carrying out of great public undertakings of this particular character, and I further think that that commission should represent in its composition the three or four great provinces interested. There is the province of Ontario which will doubtless be interested, but not so directly interested as Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. That commission should have on its board representation from each of these provinces, as well as of this government. If the national government is not prepared to assume the entire cost of carrying out this undertaking in a manner such as the requirements of that country demand, in my judgment the government should say to these western provinces, particularly Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, we are prepared to financially co-operate with you in carrying out a broad, comprehensive and successful scheme provided there be a distribution of expenditure and liability. If this government is not prepared to assume the full financial responsibility, these three provincial governments will be prepared, from what I know of public opinion in that country, to contribute such a proportion of the liability as may be necessary to make the opening up of this route an undoubted success. The federal government need have no apprehension as to those governments having the fullest confidence in the enterprise, but, as I have already referred to the declaration made by the Prime Minister as to the opening up of this route, it seems to me the government is not going to open it up unless under a scheme commensurate with its importance. Now as to the financial basis. Hon. gentlemen will be familiar with the fact that a land grant was made some years ago for the purpose of building this road and still remains on the statute-book. From what the leader of the House said the other day, I inferred the government is still prepared to give that land grant to any company carrying out that enterprise. The land grant provides for 12,800 acres per mile. The road will be approximately 400 miles in length, which would represent an acreage of at least 5,000,000 acres. I will undertake to say that if that land grant be handed over by the government to a state commission and properly administered in the interests of that western country, and not in the interests of speculators, that at least $5 an acre can be realized from its sale and administration.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Has not that land grant lapsed ?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes, the land grant under the order in council lapsed on the 10th of July, 1906.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If my hon. friend will look at the papers brought down, he will see that it did.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That was the location of a certain portion of it ; but the Act of 1884 was wholly indefinite. It provides that whenever a railway was built to Hudson bay it would be entitled to that grant.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—There is an order in council——

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The order in council could not repeal the statute.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The statute simply made provision that a land grant might be given for the construction of this road. The Governor in Council from time to time passed orders in council as to the conditions on which it should be earned. It was extended from time to time. The last extension made by the Governor in Council, of this particular grant to the Canadian Northern Railway, expired on the 10th of July, 1906. I have not been able to find amongst the papers—and I looked through them thoroughly—any extension of that order in council.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—You are quite right, so far as the extension is concerned.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Then the land grant has lapsed. It is entirely discretionary with the government whether they shall extend it, and it seems to me that, in the public interest, it would be suicidal for the government of the day, now that that country has been opened up and its possibilities as clearly in evidence as the sun at noonday, that any government should give to a private corporation 12,800 acres a mile for the purpose of building a prairie road.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I venture with the utmost confidence this opinion, that it was entirely discretionary with the government of the day whether that land grant should be extended or not. The statute was not mandatory. It gave a discretion to the government, so that it could exercise its discretion or not whether the grant should be given. The government did exercise its discretion up to a certain point, and finally extended the time, by order in council, until the 10th of July, 1906.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I ask for information, was this land grant to be of land along the line of railway or in any part of the Northwest?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I do not think the location of the grant was defined. It was understood, I believe, that it would be along the route ; but from the evidence before the Senate committee which is now sitting, it is quite apparent that 5,000,000 acres of good arable land could be readily selected from the Saskatchewan river northward, and I think I am quite within the mark when I say if that land grant were properly administered at least $5 an acre could be realized, thus realizing and establishing a fund of $25,000,000. And now let us consider what application in carrying out such a policy as I have indicated might be made of this $25,000,000. I would divide that into thirds ; $8,000,000 would build the road-bed of which I speak, namely $20,000 a mile. It would not be necessary for the government to equip the road ; therefore I venture to say approximately $20,000 a mile would build a road-bed suitable for carrying the products of the country to Churchill. I would take another third and apply it to the development of the port, in the building of docks, piers, wharfs and elevating and storage facilities. While I cannot speak with any authority upon the cost of carrying out such an undertaking as that, I venture to say that a judicious expenditure of $8,000,000 would fully carry out, for present purposes, improvements of that character. We have over $8,000,000 left. The questions arises in my mind as to the policy of inducement which should be adopted with reference to the opening of navigation in Hudson straits. Whether it is advisable for the government to bonus a fleet of iron steamships with properly equipped ice breakers, such as are used in the Baltic and other northern waters, is rather doubtful in my mind. It seems to me that a much more desirable policy, and one that would encourage the utilization of that route by tramp steamships would be a bonus on every bushel of grain carried from Churchill to Liverpool. The investment of $8,000,000, at four per cent, would realize somewhere over $300,000 annually. That would permit of a bonus running any where from half a cent to a cent and a half a bushel according to volume shipped upon every bushel of grain carried from Churchill to Liverpool ; when you take into consideration the fact that grain is being carried from Canada or United States ports to European markets for, I understand, from two and a half to three cents a bushel, you can readily appreciate that a bonus of say from one-half cent to a cent and a half per bushel —it would depend upon the quantity carried—would be a very great inducement to steamships of the tramp order to navigate Hudson straits and thus open up a highway to European markets from the port of Churchill. Therefore, shortly reviewing what I have said, I think the government should administer this enterprise entirely as a State undertaking. They should build the road-bed, the dockage, and all the terminal facilities at Churchill. They should invest a fund sufficiently large to produce a bonus towards navigating the straits, and all these including the sale of the land grant, and the administration of the fund, should, in my judgment, be carried out by a commission judiciously selected from that western country, of men whom the country and the people of Canada could trust. It affords me the most profound satisfaction, without discussing the controversial features of the case, to know that the government of the day has committed itself in such an uncomprising way to the carrying out of this great enterprise. The country is to be congratulated that this very important question is to be taken out of the realm of suggestion and is about to emerge into the sphere of actualities. I must apologize for assuming anything like a presumption of suggesting to the government what I think should be their policy on this very important question. I excuse myself for doing so, by saying I think what I have outlined represents pretty much public opinion in the Northwest.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In the Dominion Lands Act of 1884, the Governor in Council is authorized to aid the construction of a railway by allowing a grant of 6,400 acres per mile in Manitoba and 12,800 acres for each mile beyond the boundaries of Manitoba. An order in council could not repeal that.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend does not understand what I have said. The Act is not repealed. It still remains on the statute-book ; but the discretion of doing that, is vested in the government, and the responsibility is thrown on the government of carrying out the views of parliament. the concessionnaires, if I may so call them, did not comply with the order in council.

They did not build the road, and the order in council provided that if they constructed it before such and such a date they would be entitled to the land grant. They have not done so; consequently the order in council has lapsed, the land grant is yet vested in the Crown, and the railway has no further claims except this government should be induced by importunities which will be forced upon them immediately this property becomes valuable, to extend that order in council. But I hope the government of the day will be proof against any such influence, and that they will administer this as a great public property and not hand it over to railway corporations or individuals who will privately profit thereby.

Hon. Mr. DOUGLAS—Before the debate is closed, I wish to bring before the House very briefly a report which has been placed in my hands by the Commissioner of Agriculture for the province of Saskatchewan, in reference to the present condition of the grain trade. I shall not go over this lengthy report in detail. I have taken the trouble to condense it, and shall endeavour to give the main facts as setting forth the crying necessity, not only for the building of the road we have been discussing, but of more thoroughly equipping the roads already built. There is immediate need, not only for the extension of our railway lines, but more especially for the equipment of them. I am quite willing to admit, on behalf of the railway companies that during this year they have had special difficulties owing to the severity of the winter and the extreme frost with which they have all to contend with as weakening their motive power and largely detracting from its efficiency. They have not been able to overtake the work which no doubt they would have done under other conditions. I believe, in the circumstances, they have done the very best with the rolling stock that they had at their disposal; but be it remembered that the extension of these lines has not helped, for this reason, that the rolling stock has not increased in proportion to the extension of these roads and the productive power of the country, and hence the difficulties that have arisen. Now this report is upon the present condition of the grain trade in Saskatchewan and be it understood that my remarks apply solely to that province. The facts have been gathered from different brancnes of the Saskatchewan grain growers association, agricultural societies, boards of trade, village overseers, throughout the province, and it gives the facts concerning the quantity raised at each railway station, the quantity shipped, the quantity stored in elevators at the present time, the quantity in the hands of producers, and in private graneries and in private bins.

I shall simply give you a summary of these things. In the province of Saskatchewan, during the year 1906 there were 24,758,000 bushels of wheat. During the shipping season of the early fall and winter there were carried out by the railway companies to market 8,549,000 bushels. At present there is stored in elevators wheat which has not reached the market, 5,956,000 bushels. In farmers graneries, 6,972,000 bushels. In temporary bins, it may be on the fields or on the prairie, some of these bins constructed of sawed lumber, some of them of poles, the grain merely covered by straw to protect it from the weather, in a condition that will not endure the changes of the season upon which we are entering. Therefore you can see the condition of things. In these temporary bins are stored 2,553,000 bushels. I wish to read you just a few very brief extracts from different points on railway lines setting forth the conditions that exist and the difficulties under which the people labour. You can easily see that an increase in the population is only increasing the transportation difficulty for the people who are now raising the grain and seeking to get it to the market. I shall not attempt to give you anything like an exhaustive statement with reference to the condition of the localities but only a few specimens. At Caron, there is the following note:

Caron.—Conditions are bad, bad,—never worse, practically blocked since December 19. Relief to be effective must be speedy. Scores of farmers have marketed no wheat and are at their wits' ends for money. Wheat stored in temporary bins will be seriously damaged unless moved. Can't you do something? This is no child's play. You know Caron. The roads going in will be simply impassible for a month as soon as it breaks. Can you do something before that time? Relief must come before March 15 if at all.

From Glen Ewen we have the following:

Glen Ewen.—We have to date received 109 cars, while over 200 cars are still on order book. Men ordered cars on September 25 and have not yet received them. All business is at a standstill on account of the car shortage.

From Carievale the report is :

Carievale.—At this date last year 300,000 bushels were marketed at Carievale alone, as compared with 225,000 bushels this year. There are over 100 cars on order now, while this time last year there were none. The bulk of last season's crop was shipped before navigation closed, this season only a small quantity.

At Belcarres :

Belcarres.—There is practically no shipping now, and last year, while the shipping was retarded we had quite a portion shipped each month. There is a large quantity of wheat in piles on the ground, as the people have no bins.

Then at Abernethy :

Abernethy.—In the month of January, 1906, we shipped from this point 350,000 bushels. This time last year we had all the cars we required. The situation has improved in the last week. We are now getting at the rate of one car per week.

At Arcola :

Arcola.—Wheat is covered with straw and snow. Conditions may become serious unless we get rolling stock to take care of grain. Everything is now at a standstill.

At Antler :

Antler.—This year the elevators have been blocked ever since the first week of October.

At Churchbridge :

Churchbridge.—Situation is rotten as compared with last year. There has not been a car shipped from here, nor a bushel bought in town since December. As a consequence the business of the whole community is at a standstill.

At Saltcoats :

Saltcoats.—This point is completely tied up. Two of the elevators have shipped only one car each in the last month. Trade is paralyzed and if no relief is given before the breakup, 30,000 bushels of wheat and at least 50,000 bushels of oats will be spoiled. Last year grain was kept moving all the season.

At Langenburg :

Langenburg.—There is a large quantity of oats in the farmers' hands, and much of it is lying in the fields with only straw for a covering. There are still about 80,000 bushels of oats to be marketed.

At Rosthern :

Rosthern.—Since the road was taken over by the Canadian Northern Railway the shipping facilities have been of the very worst. Only three cars of wheat have left this station since December 15, 1906. Last year we had but one blockade, and it lasted barely a week. The remainder of the time grain moved steadily.

At Francis:

Francis.—One year ago we had a fairly free movement of wheat all through the season, but this year there has been a congestion almost continuously since threshing. We have shipped only six cars in the last two months.

I am sure that I have read enough quotations from the report in regard to various points along the lines of railway in the province of Saskatchewan to impress the hon. members of this House that there is a growing necessity that something should be done to elevate the condition of the people. The people have no money; they have to meet the engagements with their merchants; they are paying interest in the meantime, and the grain is not available on the market. So that we need to impress upon the railway companies even if they are obliged under the circumstances to curtail their energies and efforts in increasing the mileage of their roads, to spend more money in increasing the rolling stock to relieve the producers of that country, and that at an early date. This is a much more important question than even the building of the road to Hudson bay, however pressing that may be. We cannot overestimate the necessity of being prompt in increasing the facilities for getting the wheat of that country to market. If the people continue to push into the country as they have done in the past two years, this difficulty will increase in proportion. Every man who goes there is either a producer or a labourer, and his necessities must be met; and indeed it is the present railway facilities have all they can do to supply the merchants with their goods in anything like fair time. To get a shipment of goods from Ontario into that country requires something like six weeks or two months, and that is a condition of things that the provincial government has to face at the present moment. I am sure that if we rejoice in the population that is pouring into that country, we must take care that they do not become discouraged and turn away from Canada to find another sphere for their activity and their labour. These facts should be sufficient to open the eyes of members of the government who are present in this House, and they should seek if possible to do something to relieve the people in that province, and what is true in Saskatchewan may also be stated in regard to Alberta and Manitoba.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—Would you ship the grain the same year as it is grown, from Hudson bay? Could you do it?

Hon. Mr. DOUGLAS—I do not know.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN moved the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It will be first Order of the Day to-morrow, after third readings.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—And after unopposed orders.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Yes.

The motion was agreed to.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY moved the second reading of Bill (3) An Act in amendment of the Railway Act, 1903.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—One of these Bills is opposed; I do not know whether it is Bill (No. 3) or Bill (No. 4.)

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—These are public Bills and were accepted by the government in the other branch of parliament unreservedly.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I think these Bills should be allowed to go to the Railway Committee.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, Committee of the Whole House.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—These are measures, particularly one of them, which should be fully discussed by the House before going into committee. I understand an amendment will be moved to one of these measures.

Items 10 and 11 were allowed to stand until to-morrow.

EXTENSION OF INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved concurrence in the Amendments made in Committee of the Whole on Bill (50) An Act to amend the Act to confirm an agreement entered into by Her late Majesty with the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada for the purpose of securing the extension of the Intercolonial Railway system to the city of Montreal.

He said: It was thought there was an error in the first clause of this Bill in referring to the fifth paragraph instead of the third. I fell into the trap myself. My hon. friends opposite referred to the fifth paragraph of the agreement, whereas it is the fifth paragraph on the page of the statute, so that the Bill was correct as it was first drawn. When I drew the attention of the Minister of Justice to it, he said: 'It was the fifth paragraph of that fourth page.' Of course, when we were considering it the other day we did not look back.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—But all the paragraphs are numbered.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is the paragraph on the fourth page, not the paragraph of the agreement.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It is introducing a different scale of paragraphs from what is found in the agreement. I heard of hon. gentlemen searching for the paragraph for hours and not being able to find it. It is a very unsatisfactory way to refer to it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I move that the House do not concur in the amendments made in committee. We inserted the third paragraph instead of the fifth in two places. The Bill was right as it stood at first.

The motion was agreed to.

The Bill was then read a third time, and passed.

The Senate adjourned until Three p.m. to-morrow.

SENATE.

OTTAWA, Thursday, March 14, 1907.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

SENATORIAL APPOINTMENTS.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I desire to make an observation or two on the question of privilege raised by the hon. gentleman from Stadacona yesterday. I find the same question was asked across the floor of the House of Commons by the Hon. Mr. Lavergne, and the article from 'La Patrie' was read. Then Mr. Lavergne said :

Now, I would like to ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries what he has to say with regard to this statement of Mr. Girard ?

Mr. BRODEUR. I have to say at the outset I do not believe Mr. Girard has given the interview which has just been read by my hon. friend, because this interview, as reported, is absolutely incorrect from beginning to end. I desire to state before this House that the allegation in this reported interview that Mr. Dessaulles was appointed on the condition that he should resign the senatorship in my favour is absolutely untrue. No offer of that kind was ever made by me ; no arrangement of that kind was entered into with him with regard to the Senate, nor was any mention made of it at all.

Perhaps my hon. friend from Rougemont (Hon. Mr. Dessaulles) might make some observation about it.

Hon. Mr. DESSAULLES—I beg to confirm the statement of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, which has just been read. As far as I am concerned, there is not a word of truth in the statement alleged to have been made by Mr. Girard. I have not accepted the call to the Senate as a result of a bargain, nor has the Hon. Mr. Brodeur or any one else my resignation in his pocket, nor did I ever sign any such resignation. Hon. gentlemen may rest assured that I entered this House honourably and even without my soliciting the position.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think I am entitled to say a few words. There is no doubt that I am bound to accept the declarations of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries and the hon. gentleman from Rougemont. The allegation was never made by me. I brought it before the House in order to have the answer of the parties interested, and the statements which have been made, I think, should settle the matter. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries says that it is quite untrue from beginning to end. He says :

I have to say at the outset I do not believe Mr. Girard has given the interview which has been read by my hon. friend, because this interview as reported is absolutely incorrect from beginning to end.

That is a flat denial. He denies that the interview ever took place. If the hon. minister had read a few lines more he would have seen what the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier said.

Mr. Geo. Taylor asked the following question :

I would like to inquire of the hon. member for Montmagny if this is the same article that he read in French which I do not understand, and I would like to ask the right hon. leader of the government if he received this petition referred to here in the article I have just read, and if the reply that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries gave to the hon. member for Montmagny will be the same reply that he will give to the article I have just read.

That is after having read the translation of the article which I read to the House yesterday from the 'Canada Gazette,' and the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier replied :

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries has already answered. So far as I am concerned I received such a petition.

So it is not quite untrue from beginning to end. However I accept the declaration of my hon. friend ; and the statement made by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, so far as it is not contradicted by the statement of the hon. Premier of this country.

PRUDENTIAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY'S BILL.

PETITION PRESENTED.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL moved the suspension of rules 26, 30 and 110 for the purpose of presenting a petition on behalf of the Prudential Life Insurance Company of Canada.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Before the House consents to a suspension of the rules, the hon. gentleman should let us know what the petition refers to. If it relates to any controversial measure, the House should be placed in possession of the facts.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL—It is a Bill to incorporate a new Life Insurance Company.

Hon. Mr. THIBAUDEAU (de la Vallière)—It is a company already doing business in the province of Quebec, which wishes federal incorporation and an increase of its capital.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That scarcely answers the question which I submitted to my hon. friend, namely, whether any controversy is involved in the measure he is about to submit to the House. There might be a difference between the shareholders which would involve making an inquiry.

Hon. Mr. THIBAUDEAU—No, there is nothing of the kind.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—As I understand it, it is a petition praying for the incorporation of an insurance company. The time for presenting petitions has expired, and the object is to originate the Bill in the Senate. Fearing that time might be a very important point at this stage of the session, the petitioners ask that the rules be suspended so as to be permitted to present a petition, thus avoiding the delay involved in the regular form. I do not think there is anything about the Bill of a controversial nature. It is for the House to say whether it will allow the petitioners to take a short cut by avoiding the preliminary of presenting a petition for leave to present a petition.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I have no objection to the suspension of the rules, if a reason is given. Why was it not presented in time ?

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—As I understand it, the financial arrangements which necessitated the Bill have only recently been made.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I suppose the petition will go to the Committee on Standing Orders.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Yes.

The motion was agreed to.

The petition was presented, read and received.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (AAA) An Act to amend the General Inspection Act.—Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.

THE LIST OF PATENTS.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—I give notice that I will move to-morrow that a list of Canadian patents be printed. If you want to get a copy of a patent it will cost you about $5, whereas in the United States you can for ten cents get a copy of any patent.

INSURANCE COMMISSION EXHIBITS.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON moved :

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General ; praying that His Excellency may cause to be laid on the Table of the Senate the papers referred to as exhibits Nos. 682, 686, 688, 737, 738, 740 and 741, in Sessional Paper No. 123*b*, being a supplementary return laid on the Table of this House during the present session of parliament.

The motion was agreed to.

CIVIL SERVICE INSURANCE ACT.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON moved :

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General ; praying that His Excellency may cause to be laid on the Table of the Senate a return of :—

1. Copies of all regulations made by the Governor in Council under Section 14, Chapter 13, of the Act intituled : ' The Civil Service Insurance Act.'
2. The number of policies issued under the said Act, giving the dates of issue.
3. The names of the policy-holders.
4. The premiums paid annually or otherwise on each policy.
5. The total amount of the excess of the deduction from the salaries of said policy-holders on account of superannuation, and the deduction which would have been made had they not effected insurance under the said Act.
6. The total amount paid as death claims and the date of each payment.
7. The difference between the premiums paid, with the deduction made in excess, as stated in paragraph 5, as compared with losses through death claims with interest added at the rate of 3 per cent on the amount lost by the government under the operations of this Act up to the 1st of March instant.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I presume there will be no objection to the address going. I do not know whether any objection will be taken to giving the names of the policy-holders. I know that some companies decline to give the names of their policy-holders, but in this case I do not think this objection should prevail.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I do not think there can be any objection, because the policy-holders are public officials, and it comes under the Civil Service Act.

The motion was agreed to.

HURON AND ONTARIO RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.

THIRD READING.

The Order of the Day being called :

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion for the third reading Bill (55) An Act respecting the Huron and Ontario Railway Company, and the motion in amendment of the Honourable Mr. Landry.—(Hon. Mr. Kerr).

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It was understood that this debate was to stand until the unopposed motions were disposed of. Perhaps the House will allow me to make a statement in connection with this Bill. The hon. gentleman will remember that I took very strong grounds against this measure. My view on its constitutionality has not been changed. I was not present at the second meeting of the committee, but I find now a number of gentlemen who concurred in the view I expressed at the first meeting, have, on good grounds, from their standpoint, changed their opinion. The main ground is that the company had already undertaken some financial obligation; that money has been raised, and that work, though not contracted for, was, at all events, being given out. Under those circumstances, I do not feel disposed to offer any further opposition to the Bill. Another opportunity, I have no doubt, will arise when the whole question can be discussed without any of the complications that exist in regard to this, because I notice that several hon. gentlemen who held very strong views before have been obliged to admit, from evidence submitted to them, that the Bill ought to go through, and have announced to me that they must support it. Under those circumstances, I do not propose to offer any opposition to it.

The SPEAKER—I think the understanding as to the unopposed Bills had reference to the resolution of the hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island and not to this Bill.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Perhaps so.

Hon. Mr. KERR—In view of what has fallen from the hon. Secretary of State, I do not suppose there will be any necessity to prolong the discussion, and I have no wish to impress my views upon the Senate, because the hon. leader of the House having withdrawn his opposition to the Bill there is no occasion to discuss it further. The motion has been made for the third reading, and the question now is on the amendment of the hon. gentleman opposite. I suppose he will withdraw that amendment.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—As I am asked to withdraw my amendment I shall say a few words. I must congratulate the hon. leader of this House on not being so great a sinner as we had imagined him to be during this time of lent; I suppose mild pressure has been brought to bear upon him by my hon. friend who sits on his left and the hon. gentleman who sits on his right. His eyes are opened and, like Paul on the road to Damascus, he sees now the error of his ways. However, in view of the fact that I am losing the support of my friends on this question, I do not think it would be very good tact on my part to prolong the battle, and as I have not sufficient support I feel inclined to have my amendment declared lost on a division.

The amendment was lost on a division.

The Bill was then read a third time, on a division, and passed.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (QQ) An Act for the relief of Celina Kingan Ansley.—(Hon. Mr. Jones.)

Bill (H) An Act respecting the Quebec, Montreal and Southern Railway Company. —(Hon. Mr. Béique.)

Bill (Y) An Act respecting the Midway and Vernon Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Bostock.)

Bill (DD) An Act respecting the Alberta Central Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Talbot.)

Bill (79) An Act respecting the Great West Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. De Veber.)

Bill (78) An Act respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Young.)

Bill (HH) An Act respecting the Lake Superior Power Company.—(Hon. Mr. Ross, Middlesex.)

Bill (54) An Act to incorporate the Edmonton, Dunvegan and British Columbia Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Bostock.)

Bill (15) An Act respecting the Joliette and Brandon Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Thibaudeau, de la Vallière.)

Bill (42) An Act to incorporate the Eastern Townships Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Mitchell.)

Bill (R) An Act to incorporate the Bonaventure and Gaspé Telephone Company, Limited.—(Hon. Mr. Power.)

Bill (12) An Act to incorporate the Malone and Hopkins Point Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Cloran.)

Bill (50) An Act to amend an Act to confirm an agreement entered into by Her late Majesty with the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada for the purpose of securing the extension of the Intercolonial Railway system to the City of Montreal.—(Hon. Mr. Scott.)

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (94) An Act to incorporate the Nipissing Central Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. MacKeen.)

Bill (89) An Act respecting the Crawford Bay and St. Mary's Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. De Veber.)

Bill (92) An Act respecting the Grand Valley Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Coffey.)

GREEN, HUNT AND McMURRICH PATENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. KERR moved the second reading of Bill (XX) An Act respecting a certain patent of Philp J. Green, Melvin Hunt and John D. McMurrich.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I move a suspension of the rules to enable this Bill to go to the next meeting of the Private Bills Committee.

Mr. LOUGHEED—Might I ask the hon. gentleman if there are any conflicting interests involved, so that parties who may be interested against the Bill can have proper notice to appear in committee? They will assume, otherwise, that the Bill will go through its regular stages.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I am told there are absolutely no adverse interests affected by the Bill.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—We should not be asked to suspend rules with regard to a contentious matter. I know that the hon. gentleman asked for a suspension of the rule in regard to the Toronto Yonge Street Bridge Bill, which was a contested matter, and the parties had not been notified. We should not suspend the rules unless we are clear that we are doing no injustice to anybody; but if the hon. gentleman says there is no opposition to the Bill, I have nothing to say. What is the patent?

Hon. Mr. KERR—It is a process of roasting a very high grade of ore by sulphur.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT introduced Bill (BBB) An Act to amend the Civil Service Act.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Does this Bill contain any important amendments to the Act?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No; one amendment is consequent upon the change of the fiscal year. Then, in regard to the post office, it is found that they have some difficulty in securing railway mail clerks who are up to the standard, and it is agreed that the class of examination will be changed, so that it will refer more to the duties they really have to perform than to the technical subjects of geography, mathematics, &c.

The Bill was read the first time.

THE HUDSON BAY ROUTE.

The Order of the Day being called:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency may be pleased to lay on the Table of this House, copies of all reports and communications in possession of the government not already submitted to parliament, regarding the navigation of the Hudson bay and the resources and climate of the territory contiguous thereto, also copies of all grants of fishing, mining and lumbering rights, given at any time, by the government, in the said bay and territory; also copies of all reports of surveys received by the government from either engineers, surveyors or geologists, on the feasibility of railway routes, connecting any existing or prospective railway with any port on Hudson bay or James bay; also a statement of grants of land or money which have been proposed, or asked for, in aid of such railways. Also, copies of all reports received by the government in relation to the establishment of lights or other aids to navigation of Hudson bay and Hudson straits, and also a statement showing what action, if any, has been taken by the government regarding the establishment of such aids to navigation. —Hon. Mr. Sullivan.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—The subject which this resolution leads up to is one of the most important that has come before the Senate this session. The hon. gentleman who introduced it deserves a great deal of credit. Every one who has spoken on this subject in this House has complimented him on his industry, and I agree with all the opinions expressed on that point, and will spare his blushes by not expressing the words I intended to use.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman is not in the Chamber.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—The hon. gentleman from Marshfield is in his seat.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I thought the hon. member was referring to the hon. senator from Prince Albert.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—I can recall only the hon. gentleman from Marshfield, the hon. member from Pictou, who spoke of the project in a pessimistic tone. I heartily endorse the sentiments so far as they relate to the results that may follow an inspection of the proposed scheme. No one has answered his statements, and holding the reputation that his name implies, I do not hesitate to enlist under his banner. Every one has spoken of the time that would be saved, and the great advantages which would result from the opening up of this route, especially the hon. member from Prince Albert; but no one has spoken of the number of people who have been lost in those regions, ever since its discovery by Hendrick Hudson, who was so cruelly murdered by his crew on that coast. The ice fetters of the inhospitable shores of Hudson bay have caused the loss of many valuable lives and a great deal of treasure, so that some men have thought it would be better if explorations of these Arctic regions had never been undertaken. But, since they have, it will be necessary for us to examine this subject in a calm and deliberate manner. Statements have been made here which I claim cannot be proved; some of them are entirely out of the question. For instance, the hon. gentleman from Prince Albert to whom my hon. friend from Halifax expected me to make a complimentary reference, made some statements which could not be easily sustained. He stated that this route was necessary for the city in which he lives. How large the city is I do not know, but he says the Hudson bay is closer to his home than Winnipeg, and that it takes more time and money to reach Winnipeg than to reach Hudson bay. He said also that a road to connect existing railways with the shores of Hudson bay would be about 400 miles long, of which 200 could be built as a colonization road, and that there are ten million acres of land of the most fertile character, equal to the best land in the Northwest, along that route. The other two hundred miles he said should be undertaken by the government. The government has done a good deal, for those people in the Northwest, and I cannot say that they are very generous or even patriotic. I venture to say that this hon. gentleman has never taken up his gun, though he was there during the rebellion, I presume, to defend his country. I have never heard that he was in the front rank nor the rear rank, and I presume he was one of those who remained at home. He says there are seven million acres of land under cultivation in the Northwest, producing on an average thirty bushels to the acre. That would give 210,000,000 bushels. Now, supposing these 210,000,000 bushels sold for only twenty cents a bushel it would realize $42,000.

And if the people in the Northwest would perform one generous act to show that they were patriotic and loyal citizens, they would take five cents out of the sale of each bushel and build the railway themselves, even supposing it cost $25,000 or $30,000 a mile. I do not say that disparagingly; but I wish to say that the bold, audacious manner in which they demand these things, as if they had a right to them, fills me with mild indignation. I admire their pioneer work, and what they have done for the country; but when their graneries are bursting with grain, and when they have had successive good harvests which brought wealth to them, I should think they would devote a little of that wealth to advancing their own interests, because undoubtedly the people who would profit by the road are the people in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. They demand everything from the east, and say they buy all their supplies from us. They buy supplies from the eastern provinces only when they cannot get them cheaper anywhere else. I do not think they have done anything to show their desire to help the east in any way. The east has done for the Northwest a very great deal. The eastern provinces have sacrificed themselves in every way. I do not think there would be any settled country at all in the west expect for the enterprise of the east. We colonized the country with settlers and gave them free farms. All they had to do was to go in and work. I am stating these facts to show that we are not under such obligations as the western people think. The hon. gentleman said that the government was bound to open this route to Hudson bay. I will refer to the authorities cited by some hon. gentlemen. They contended that this port was open for four months of the year—at all events for three and one-half. Well, it may be, but I do not think there is any reliable data to speak from, and that is the whole trouble with the arguments with regard to Hudson bay—there are no means by which we can ascertain the truth. The experience of one year in a ship in those waters is not sufficient. Therefore, before anything can be done there must be thorough examination made of this port. I think the government would do that if the voice of this Senate could reach their ears and they would listen to it. The authorities mentioned by the hon. gentleman from Prince Albert—and I am sorry he is not in his place to-day, were Erastus Wiman, for example. There is a long quotation from him. What on earth could he know about the navigation of Hudson bay? I venture to say he could have no reliable information on the subject. Erastus Wiman was a telegraph operator in Canada, and subsequently became a partner with Mr. Dun, when the firm was Dun, Wiman & Co. I never heard that his opinion was worth a brass button on such questions as this. He makes an assertion that the bay and strait would be open for a definite length of time, and says that some ships that had been caught in the ice by the early closing of navigation, was due to two American captains who were intoxicated, and quarrelled. He says that was the cause of it. He brought forward another gentleman whom we should know, a gentleman called Arthur Dobbs. He calls him Sir Arthur Dodd, but his name I understand is Mr. Arthur Dobbs. I mention this name with particular interest, because a gentleman has mentioned the name of the ancestor of our Mr. Lemoine. I believe that Mr. Dobbs is an ancestor of a prominent and learned hon. gentleman in this House. I did not get his corroboration of this because it would be impertinent for me to ask it, but I mention it here, because I know he has relatives of that name in Ireland. Dobbs was an Irishman, and a man of great energy and enterprise. For a long time he held in favour of the admiralty of England and finally got up an opposition company, which unfortunately did not get a charter. He also urged anew the offering of the prize of £20,000 sterling to any person who would discover the northwest passage. He revived that project to a great extent, or at least put it on a firm basis, and was the means of stimulating a great deal of exploration. He charged the Hudson bay people with neglect of duty. I have mentioned that in my opinion he was related to a prominent member of this House, that he was of the same family. I shall read a short extract from what he said of Hudson bay in order that hon. members can see whether there is any similarity between his utterances, and that of the hon. gentleman who sits in this House. He attacked the Hudson Bay Company with such persistency, and he gained the ear of the admiralty, so that they were put to a great deal of expense in the matter. He said:

> It would lead us far beyond our limits were we to chronicle all the reasons urged, and the attempts made, to 'find out the short and easy passage by the northwest, which we hitherto so long desired.' Under the auspices of the 'Old Worthies' really—though ostensibly countenanced by kings, queens and nobles—up rose a race of men daring and enthusiastic, whose names would add honour to any country, and embalm its history.

And then he gave a list of the names. This shows how strong an opponent he was of the Hudson Bay Company and how partial his words would be. Then he says:

> Commencing with Cabot, and including Henry Hudson who, in 1610, was so cruelly murdered by his mutinous men.
> Thus, in the course of sixty years—now breaking the icy fetters of the north; now chained by them; now big with high hope 'of the Passage,' then beaten back by the terriffic obstacles, as it were, guarding it—notwithstanding, these men never faltered, never despaired of finally accomplishing it. Their names are worthy to be held in remembrance; for, with all their faults, all their strange fancies and prejudices, still they were a daring and glorious race, calm amid the most appalling dangers; what they did was done correctly, as far as their limited means went; each added something that gave us more extended views and a better acquaintance with the globe we inhabit—giving especially large contributions to geography, with a more fixed resolution to discover the 'Passage.' By them the whole of the eastern face of North America was made known, and its disjointed lands in the north, even to 77 degrees north. Their names will last while England is true to herself.

There are about a dozen names there, beginning with Cabot and those after him who undertook to explore these regions. I want to show the House by these quotations, that one of the writers would not know anything about the subject, and the other would be a prejudiced witness. I say we must have more knowledge on this subject, and the territory must be thoroughly investigated, its climate, the possibilities, not only of the bay itself but of the strait before any undertaking such as is urged on the government should be seriously embarked upon. I interrupted the hon. gentleman when he spoke of a certain number of men and of a certain battle, which I thought was unworthy of him. If there are men in this world whom I honour, it is those French adventurers and those French traders who were in the country from the 17th century until the taking of Quebec by Wolfe. Possibly, in the history of the world there is no series of undertakings bold, daring and unequalled, accomplished so successfully, as those which they were engaged in. Lemoine de Iberville, and a host of others, and La Salle, Duluth, the great Laverandrie, Cadillac and others whose names are well known to history. They were men who would do honour to any country and to any cause. The hon. gentleman referred to Lemoine of Iberville. I took the trouble to go over to the library and get a history of the Hudson Bay Company, written by a professor in Manitoba named Bryce, not the gentleman who is ambassador in Washington, but Prof. Geo. Bryce. That gentleman stated exactly the facts concerning this man Lemoine as were stated here. Some descendant of the Gaelic race in this House should rise and hurl back the indignity that has been cast upon him. I did what I could to draw the hon. gentleman out, but he insinuated that these words that were uttered by the hon. gentleman from De Lanaudière were ridiculed by him and held up to the scorn of every one. I do not know whether they felt it so, but I felt it to be so, and in order to show you that the statement was incorrect, I will just read two or three words from Mr. Bryce's report describing the expedition of Iberville to Hudson bay. He says :

> In 1697 the Bay again fell into the English hands, and D'Iberville was put in command of a squadron sent out for him from France, and with this he sailed for Hudson bay. The expedition brought unending glory to France and the young commander. Though one of his warships was crushed in the ice in the Hudson straits and his remaining vessels could nowhere be seen when he reached the open waters of the bay, yet he bravely sailed to Port Nelson, purposing to invest it in his one ship, the 'Pelican.' Arriving at his station he observed that he was shut in on the rear by three English men-of-war. His condition was desperate; he had not his full complement of men, and some of those on board were sick. His vessel had but fifty guns ; the English vessels carried among them 124. The English vessels, the 'Hampshire,' the 'Dering' and the 'Hudson's Bay,' all opened fire upon him. During a hot engagement a well-aimed broadside from the 'Pelican' sank the 'Hampshire,' with all her sails flying, and everybody on board was lost ; the 'Hudson's Bay' surrendered unconditionally, and the 'Dering' succeeded in making her escape. After this naval duel D'Iberville's missing vessels appeared, and the commander, landing a sufficient number of men, invested and took Port Nelson. The whole of the Hudson bay territory thus came into the possession of the French. The matter has always, however, been looked at in the light of the brilliant achievement of this scion of the Le Moynes.

I mention this to show how base it was for the hon. gentleman to ridicule it, and I think taking action in this way will have a tendency to make hon. members more cautious in their statements, whether they are quoting somebody else's words, or whether they are making statements on their own responsibility. If senators were allowed to make false statements, it would be the greatest blow this Chamber could receive. This is only a preface to what I intended to bring before the House in this debate ; pertinent to it is the question of transportation. It is for transportation only that hon. gentlemen intend to urge the opening up of this port. I live in one of the oldest cities in Canada, and one of the most beautiful, and that city was in the past the entrepot for the trade which came from Quebec, Montreal and the west, previous to the construction and enlargement of the St. Lawrence canals. It did a very large trade, but when the railways were built, and the St. Lawrence canals were constructed, the glory of Kingston, to a great extent, departed. It has at any rate an unrivalled position at the head of the River St. Lawrence and the foot of the lake ; one would think it is an ideal place, although it has graving docks, elevators and other essentials of a large commercial city, it has not that trade that it should have; therefore any question of that trade is of great interest to it.

Now what is the use of opening up a route to Hudson bay until we improve other ways we have of getting to the ocean? There is only one other way that has been suggested, that by Georgian bay. That would be a very expensive undertaking, so it would be far preferable for the government to deepen the Welland canal. The trade on the lakes is done by very large vessels, each carrying 320,000 to 360,000 bushels of grain. Those vessels go to Buffalo, and the grain is transhipped to canal boats or carried by rail to New York. That is an easy way of transporting grain, and there is a minimum of transhipment. I have taken the trouble to get the opinion of a competent authority as to the effect of deepening the Welland canal to admit of those large vessels on the upper lakes passing through to Lake Ontario there. Port Colborne would be of little use; they would pass directly through the enlarged canal and carry their cargoes to Kingston, where the grain would be transhipped to barges and taken to Montreal. It costs now to carry grain from Fort William to Montreal six and one-half cents per bushel, and it is claimed that by the deepening of the Welland canal this cost could be reduced by three and one-half cents. The rate from Fort William to Buffalo is one cent and one-half per bushel, and it would not be too much to expect that it would be carried from Fort William to Kingston for two cents. The barges are of small carrying capacity that freight grain from Kingston to Montreal—twenty-five or thirty thousand bushels to a cargo. Now it is proposed to change that. Without enlarging the canals at all they can build barges with a carrying capacity of 65,000 bushels, and this, it is claimed, will enable shippers to deliver western grain in Montreal at the low rate of six and one-half cents. This is only urged for the reason that it is desirable to have the matter examined, and it should be examined before the ice-bonds of Hudson bay are taken off as they propose to do. There is another idea that has occupied the attention of scientific men to a great extent, and which should make us call a halt. An engineer, who is a very capable man has pointed out to me that in the contest between railroad and waterway the railway will win. You see now leviathan engines come into a station while you are waiting for a train. These engines are the result of a Kingston's man's genius. I thought they came from Europe, but they are essentially American. J. J. Hill, the St. Paul railway man, wrote to the American railway works at Dunkirk to send him the best engineer they had, that he wanted to consult with him on an important matter. They sent him a man, who is now in Kingston, working in the establishment which owes its re-creation and extension to Mr. Harty, M.P. for that city. Not only has he made it as good as the locomotive works we had, but he has largely increased it, to the great benefit of himself, the city and the country. This engineer, Mr. H. Tandy, who gave the idea to Mr. Hill, is working in the Kingston locomotive works for Mr. Harty, and his father was the engineer of that establishment before him.

The result of an interview of several hours between Mr. Hill and this engineer was the designing and construction of this gigantic engine, which looks a fortress coming in. Given an engine like that and a road-bed with proper curves and grades, it can draw a load which is sufficient to overcome the competition of the water routes, whatever the tonnage of the lake vessels may be. I have here the statement of a most scientific practical engineer. He says that with a gradient of four-tenths of one per cent per mile, such a locomotive can haul 2,000 tons of pay load. The distance from Winnipeg to Quebec is, in round figures, 1,350 miles. Assume that the train has to run back empty, it makes a round trip of 2,700 miles. The average receipts of trains in the United States is $1.88 per mile, or $5,076 for a round trip of 2,700 miles. That is $2.54 per ton, or seven and six-tenths cents per bushel. He does not make any estimate for the return freight that he might get. The only object I had in bringing this argument before the House is to show the advantage of the route by Kingston. I contend that the Georgian bay route would be only available, if it can compete with the railway routes. It is stated that the railways in Illinois carry corn for five and seven-tenths cents per bushel. It is likely that other roads will attempt to make a profit at the same rate. That is the great point to be settled. If a railway can haul grain from Winnipeg to Quebec, and bring back the empty cars for seven and six-tenths cents per bushel, it will certainly bring about a revolution in the transportation question, and, of course, there would be no further necessity for canals. The hon. gentleman from Prince Albert said a good deal about the expenditure on canals which are closed up during the winter, making a comparison between them and the loss that might occur from the closing of the Hudson bay route during the winter. I do not want to say anything to detract from the merits of this scheme. Those who have taken an interest in it have done a good work, even those who have opposed it, because the discussion helps to form public opinion. Some of the advocates of this northern route are very optimistic, basing their ideas on rosy descriptions, rather than on reliable data. Therefore, the proper thing to urge on the government is that they should get certain facts about the Hudson bay and district. Judging from the remarks of some hon. gentlemen who have spoken here, you would think you could run a summer hotel there to advantage. I have not exaggerated in anything I have stated here to-day. I hope the hon. gentlemen who have so earnestly worked up this matter will not look upon me as an opponent of theirs. What Canadian could object to testing the full merits of a proposition like this. Although former attempts to settle this question have failed, it may, under Canadian enterprise, become successful as so many other projects have. The opening up of Cobalt and other places has infused into Canadians a spirit of what might be called extravagance, or a desire to get rich quick. I hope the northwest will get cheaper transportation and that their seven million acres under cultivation will soon become seventy millions, and then we will all be happy.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman gave some interesting statistics as to the cost of transporting produce by rail. I did not quite make out whether he was in favour of substituting rail carriage for canal carriage.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—I have not formed any particular opinion on that, because I am not sufficiently versed in the matter; but if these statements given me by a prominent engineer are correct, I think transportation in the future will be by rail. His statements are made so positively, and he is so thorough in his profession, that I have confidence in his figures, which, if true, there will be a revolution in transportation throughout the country. The two points that are essential are large locomotives, capable of hauling very heavy trains, and favourable grades and curves.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman lives in a city where he would have opportunity for observing the class of vessels engaged in transportation on the lakes and canals. I should like to know whether he has noticed any large number of vessels built to meet the enlargement of the canal?

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—Not at present; they would be no use. The carrying trade of Kingston has dwindled down to a few schooners that will go through the Welland canal, and the barges.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Are they the same kind of barges that were used in the old locks?

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—Yes.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It is now about three and one-half months since I put this notice on the order paper, and in all reason it is about time the debate should be brought to a close. An hon. gentleman, in addressing the House on this question, said that I had brought on this matter in view of the dissolution of the Manitoba legislature. All I can say is that on the 28th of November, when I put the notice on the order paper, I had very little idea of an election coming on in Manitoba this year. I put my notice on the paper in the first instance on an impulse, having read the report of Mr. Low, director of the Geological Bureau, on the cruise of the Neptune, and I simply wished to call attention to that report; but before addressing the House I thought it but right to examine the question more than I had previously done. On doing so I found that the field was so wide, and involved such a vast amount of reading and consideration before I would be prepared to speak on it, that I had to postpone my notice from time to time. Our library I have found contains mountains of information regarding Hudson bay. If hon. gentlemen would only peruse the books on the subject to be found in the library, they would not be short of information. I went into it in the way now mentioned and pursued the study, and I am quite surprised myself to find the evidence in favour of that route so overwhelming as it is in the documents that are accessible. In the first place, let me say that there has been no exploration of that route by a powerful ice-breaking steamer. The explorations were made by the 'Alert,' the 'Arctic,' the 'Neptune' and the 'Diana,' and they are all small vessels, not one of them fit to break ice. They are all strong vessels which can stand a nip of the ice, but they are not as fit to find their way through ice fields as even ordinary tramp steamers would be. I am quite well acquainted with the 'Neptune.' I have sailed on her many times. She was used for a season to break the ice in the straits between Prince Edward Island and the mainland. She is a steamer of 110 horse-power, with a speed at the utmost of eight miles an hour, and I think she has more speed than any other vessel sent on an exploration to the Hudson bay. All I can say is, that, as an ice-breaker, she was a failure. She would run into the ice and stick there like a wedge. The 'Minto' and 'Stanley' are not to be mentioned in the same day with her as ice-breakers. Therefore, the exploration of Hudson bay by means of ice-breakers has not been attempted, and it would be of no use to attempt it, because if specially designed steamers were necessary, merchant shipping could not use that route. It was quite proper to use such ships as the 'Diana,' the 'Alert' and the 'Neptune' for the purpose, they have been used very thoroughly and have succeeded, and therefore there is no need of more exploration. Some gentlemen who have spoken on this question and rushed in to put their views on record, apparently made no investigation of the subject. The hon. member for Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power) does not usually act in that way. We know that he generally gives great care and attention to anything he says in this House, and usually endeavours to be accurate. We have a right to bear that testimony to my hon. friend. But on this occasion the analysis he made of Mr. Low's book was very defective. The hon. gentleman found that during the different trips the 'Neptune' had made in 1903-4 from the Atlantic to Fullerton, in the northeastern part of Hudson bay, she was continually meeting ice. My hon. friend, in one place, made the remark that coming out on the 9th of September, the vessel encountered ice. If the hon. gentleman had read the report more carefully, he would have found that she was not then coming out but was going in.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The ice was there at any rate.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The hon. gentleman thinks that because ice was seen there that that settles the question. I do not suppose you will pass a day without meeting ice in these northern waters. It is the same in the North Atlantic, so the presence of ice proves nothing as long as there is no pack. Now this is the record of the 'Neptune' in that year:

Memorandum of trips made by the steamer 'Neptune,' from the Atlantic to Fullerton or Roe's Welcome in 1903-4, the distance being about 875 miles.

Entered straits on the 9th of September, 1903; arrived at Fullerton on the 16th September, 1903.

Left Fullerton on the 18th of July, 1904; arrived at Fort Burwell on the 25th July, 1904.

Left Port Burwell on the 7th of September, 1904; arrived at Fullerton on the 15th September, 1904.

Left Fullerton on the 25th September, 1904; arrived at Port Burwell on 1st October, 1904.

Made many detours to examine ice conditions and for correction of charts. Landed parties to hunt bears. Used launch to capture walrus for dog food, and also to examine coasts. Made calls at whaling stations, &c.

She made four trips covering 3,500 miles, in twenty-nine days, and she is only a boat capable of making eight miles an hour. That would show that there could have been no detention whatever caused by ice.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—What time did it take her to go through the straits?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Her voyages includes the straits and 375 miles further west and northwest, going into waters that are never to be used for commercial navigation, passing Southampton Island and going up Roe's Welcome, which is altogether out of the track of navigation, and far north of Churchill.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If there was no ice at all, it was a very improper thing for Mr. Low to state that ice was encountered.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I did not say that Mr. Low stated there was no ice, and my hon. friend cannot fail to know my meaning when I say that ice is always found in these northern waters; but the fact that ice was seen there does not justify any one in saying that it was an obstruction to navigation. The time occupied in sailing 3,500 miles by the 'Neptune' demonstrates that the vessel was not delayed by ice. Here is an extract which my hon. friend might have read if he wanted to get at the facts. It is a summary by Mr. Low at the conclusion of his third trip.

The following summary of the condition and extent of the ice met with in the passage from Fullerton to Port Burwell may prove of interest and value. The northwestern part of Hudson bay was quite free of ice, and none to obstruct navigation was found in Fisher and Evans straits. Larger quantities of ice were encountered between the mouth of Evans strait and Digges at the western end of Hudson strait, but without serious trouble safe passages were found through it, and there is no doubt that an ordinary unprotected iron steamship would have passed through it at that time without trouble or danger. This ice, evidently the product of the past winter, consisted, chiefly, as has been mentioned, of large flat sheets that had only a short time previously broken from their original position, for there were no signs that it had been subjected to pressure or to the action of a swell. The edges of these large cakes had not been crushed, and many soft thin spots were seen which would disappear with the slightest pressure or swell. Along with the predominating flat ice was a considerable amount of rafted ice of the same character, and also of portions apparently subjected to pressure during the past winter. All the ice was comparatively light and thin, which led to the belief that it had come out of Fisher strait, and from the southward up the channel between Mansfield and the eastern mainland, the meeting of these streams producing the blockade at the western end of Hudson strait. Owing to its thinness and rotten character, the greater part of this ice would melt away a few days after we passed it.

The ice in the western part of Hudson strait was somewhat heavier than that described above. Much of it was rafted ice in small cakes, and there was a small number of ancient, heavy discoloured pans that had evidently come from the Fox channel.

This ice completely filled the side of the straits, and probably extended to Nottingham island, but there was open water on the north side of the strait through which the whaler 'Active' had already passed on her way into Hudson bay. The important point to be noted is that during all the times that the 'Neptune' was beset by the ice during the passage east along the south side of the strait, there was never any sign of the surrounding ice rafting by the pressure occasioned at the change of tides, and never was the pressure about the ship sufficient to cause damage to an unprotected iron ship.

At the end of his fourth trip, Mr. Low says:

The homeward voyage from Fullerton to Port Burwell was made in fine weather, and the only incident requiring mention was that the ice from Fox channel had advanced southward and westward nearly twenty miles since we last saw it. This necessitated our keeping close to Mansfield island. Our pilot was safely returned to his home in Wakeham bay, and Port Burwell was reached on October 1st.

This contrasts somewhat with the statement made by the hon. senator from New Glasgow, when he told of the Newfoundland captain who was up there last year, and had to get away by October 1, leaving half of his cargo behind him. I have read what Mr. Low said, that they came through on October 1 in fine weather and had no difficulty on the same date as that when the Newfoundland captain was obliged to sail in a hurry, leaving half his cargo behind him. The 'Diana,' which was used in the Wakeham expedition in 1897, is a smaller vessel than the 'Neptune,' but better adapted for exploration. She entered Hudson's straits on June 22 which was too early in the season. We all know it is not early closing in the autumn that is the trouble there, but the late ice in the spring. She entered on June 22 and was delayed for seventeen days off Big Island on account of ice, and this is the only ice reported as causing any detention. The following is the record:

TRIPS OF THE 'DIANA' IN 1897.

Left Burwell 22nd of June, returned 21st of July; was delayed for 17 days off Big Island owing to ice blockade. Lost two days trying to go north to Fox Channel to land Dr. Bell. Lost three days at King George's Island, landing Mr. Low with his launch party and supplies. Lost three days at Ashe Inlet landing Dr. Bell with his launch party and supplies.

Total time occupied in trip 29 days, of which 17 were days of detention by ice, and eight days landing Dr. Bell and Mr. Low.

Apart from these delays the distance covered about 1,200 miles, and was made in five days.

SECOND ROUND TRIP.

Left Burwell 21st July, returned 27th, six days.

TRIP TO BAFFINS BAY.

Made a trip to Baffins bay, leaving 27th July, returning 21st August.

THIRD ROUND TRIP.

Left Burwell 21st August, returned on 20th September, reports little ice, some snow and fog. Occupied the time in trawling for fish. Called at St. George's Island for Mr. Low and at Ashe Inlet for Dr. Bell.

TRIP TO ST. JOHN'S, NEWFOUNDLAND.

Left on the 20th of September for St. John's, Newfoundland, returning to Fort Burwell on 16th of October.

FOURTH ROUND TRIP.

Left Burwell on the 16th October, went through the straits, and returned on the 30th. Passed five days in Douglas harbour.

This is what Capt. Wakeham says of this trip on 30th October :—

"Weather fine and clear in the harbour. As soon as we got outside of the mouth of the harbour we ran into snow. We can hardly call it a snow storm but there is constantly a light dry snow falling, thick enough to obscure the view and prevent us from seeing any distance. We have a fresh breeze from the northwest. Rounded the northwest end of Joy's Island at 10.15 a.m. and stood up the strait to the north-westward with the intention of going back into Hudson bay. It is neither ice nor cold that is bothering us, but constant strong winds from various directions, never long in one quarter, and the snow. We have the greatest difficulty in picking up our points, and with the strong tides, uncertain currents, no soundings, a knowledge that the hydrography of the coast is entirely out, we believe we are running greater risks than are warrantable."

All these four round trips were made through the straits, a trip to Baffin's bay and a visit to Newfoundland in the middle of the summer, during the season of 1897, showing that there was absolutely, as Capt. Wakeham said, no detention from ice excepting 17 days, when she went in the first time, on account of having entered the straits earlier than she should have entered.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—Did she remain in the bay until the end of October until that time?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Yes, she remained in the straits until the 30th. All her expeditions were in the straits, except the excursions in Davis straits and the visit to St. John, Newfoundland. There is less danger of being bothered with ice in Hudson bay than in Hudson strait. Now, I have here a memorandum prepared by Capt. McElhinny, of the Marine and Fisheries Department, from the logs of eighteen ships that went through the Hudson straits to Fort Churchill or York factory between the years 1870 and 1883. The average time occupied by these sailing vessels in passing through the straits during a period of thirteen years was eleven days and four hours. The table is as follows:

A Synopsis of the Dates on which the Hudson Bay Company's ships entered and passed through the Hudson Strait on the outward voyage during the Years from 1870 to 1883, inclusive.

| No. of Log. | Name of Ship. | Year. | Entered. | Passed Through. | Condition of the Ice. |

The outward passages in 10 of these years were made without any detention from ice, excepting from cautionary measures during foggy weather.

There was no detention from ice on the homeward voyages.

As only one voyage in each year was aimed at very early or late navigation was not tested.

Now, my hon. friend from New Glasgow made some statements about snow and fog. I have taken the pains to compile some tables from the meteorological observations made by Mr. Stupart, head of the Meteorological Department at Toronto, during many years. Some of the observations were made on board the ships that went through the straits and some at points on the coast and Hudson straits, and there is a comparison made between the straits of Belle Isle and Hudson straits in these respects. The table is as follows:

Fog table.

Giving the mean duration in hours of fog at stations in Hudson bay, Hudson straits and Straits of Belle Isle for months of July, August, September and October.

| Greenly Island inside Straits of Belle Isle. | Forteau inside Straits of Belle Isle. | Cape Bauld inside Straits of Belle Isle. | Cape Norman inside Straits of Belle Isle. | Entrance of Straits of Belle Isle on the Atlantic. | Churchill in Hudson Bay. | Stuparts Bay in Hudson Straits. | Cape Chudleigh entrance. |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| 501 | 781 | 624 | 541 | 622 | 40 | 263 | 212 |
| for 1892, 93 and 94. | for 1892, 93 and 94. | for 1892, 93 and 94. | for 1892, 93 and 94. | for years from 1872 to 1883 and 1886. | for 1884 and 1885. | for 1884, 1885 and 1886. | for 1884-1885 and 1886. |

In the cruise of the 'Diana' from the 22nd of June to the 30th of October of 1897, during which she completed four round trips through Hudson straits, fog was encountered in only 29 days out of 147.

The average number of days of fog at Belle Isle during the years 1872 to 1883, for a period of 147 days, was 58.

The number of days of fog at Churchill during the months of September and October, 1885, and from the 1st of July to the 14th of August, 1886, was 9.

In the matter of fog, any hon. gentleman who will look at Maury's physical geography of the sea will find the whole matter explained. There is more fog at Belle Isle and Newfoundland than there is at Hudson bay and straits. The cold waters of the Arctic, coming down to Belle Isle and mingling with the warm waters of the gulf stream are the causes of the dense fogs in the vicinity of Newfoundland. Not only are the fogs less common further north, but, when they do occur, they are not of the same character. It is rather the action of the frost on the water causing a vapour to rise, and the mariners can often see over it from the mast head. With reference to snow, the hon. gentleman from New Glasgow said that snow was very much worse than fog, I am not going to dispute that. What is the record of these different places with reference to snow? I refer to the article on meteorology in the Encyclopedia Britannica where it is stated:

In Greenland, the number of days of snow is eighty, and this figure is nearly reached in Newfoudland and the northeast border of Nova Scotia for the whole year. At Quebec, the means days are sixty-six, Halifax sixty and Winnipeg fifty-four.

I take these figures from the Encyclopedia Britannica, and I presume they are reasonably correct. Then we have observations with regard to snow, supplied by the meteorological observations from which I have compiled the following table:

Giving the mean duration in hours of snow, at stations in Hudson bay, Hudson straits and Straits of Belle Isle, for months of July, August, September and October, 1884-5 and 1886, and during four round trips of 'Diana' through Hudson straits, in 1897, also round trip of the 'Alert' in 1886.

| At Straits of Belle Isle. | At Cape Chudley Atlantic entrance to Hudson Straits. | At Stuparts Bay, midway through Hudson Straits. | During cruise of Diana 1897 in Hudson Straits. | During round trip of the Alert in Hudson Straits in 1886. |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| 107 hours. | 125 hours. | 161 hours. | 86 hours. | 38 hours. |

So that in the matter of fog and snow, the advantage is in favour of Hudson bay over the straits of Belle Isle, and I might say over the St. Lawrence. But the hon. gentleman from New Glasgow pointed out that in the trips of the 'Adventure' they had trouble with their compass, and the captain said there had been a deviation of nineteen degrees. We know that compass deviations are not peculiar to Hudson straits. I have gone over all the records that are available, and I have only one or two allusions to compass deviations in Hudson straits and none in Hudson bay. The trouble with the compass was mostly experienced off Cape Digges. Both Wakeham and Gordon referred to it. The compass had to be compensated and adjusted. I refer to the following note by Wakeham :

> The ordinary spirit and pole compasses of the 'Diana' were utterly worthless from the moment we entered the strait, but the standard compass, one of Sir William Thompson's which I had taken from my own ship and fitted to the 'Diana,' gave us the greatest satisfaction. Once properly compensated it never varied, and we learned to trust it most implicitly.

So that anybody who complains on the matter of compass deviation, must have been supplied with improper compasses or did not know how to adjust them ; the compass deviations are not a serious obstacle. We all know something about the difficulty at Anticosti in the Gulf of St. Lawrence in this respect. Henry Fry, in his history of North Atlantic navigation, a book published in Quebec in 1896, speaking of the early navigation of the St. Lawrence, says :

> Then in those days the deviation of the compass was a great difficulty in all iron ships, and there was a strange local attraction in some parts of the St. Lawrence which was attributed to deposits of iron.

So that with regard to snow, fog and compass deviations, there is absolutely no case against Hudson bay in the matter of navigation. Just in passing, having now referred to the fog, snow and compass deviations in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, I might be permitted to say that I have a great deal of information which I am not going to trouble the House with, obtained through some articles written by Sir Sanford Fleming in 1896-97 in relation to the fast Atlantic service, in regard to icebergs and fog in the straits of Belle Isle. If I wished to condemn the straits of Belle Isle route, I could present a story of loss of life and shipping against that route much more serious and much stronger than anything that has been presented against the Hudson bay route, during the progress of the debate, or perhaps anything that could be produced from all the experience of navigators in going through Hudson bay and straits. My hon. friend who spoke last, referred to Hudson bay as being a place where so many mariners had found their graves. I will venture to say that in proportion to the number of vessels that have gone through there for the last 300 years, and they have been going there during that period—that there could be found no similar amount of navigation perhaps in any part of the world where there has been a smaller amount of wrecks, and less loss of life. I think I may make the statement in a general way that that is the record, and the record is caused by the fact that the straits are wide and deep, and there is an almost entire absence of shoals. The ice they expect to meet at certain seasons of the year, perhaps at every season of the year ; but there is so much sea room and so much possibility of avoiding it, that the loss of ships has been very light indeed. I want just to present one bit of evidence about the St. Lawrence route to the House, not to blacken that route, but to show how anybody who is looking up evidence against any one sheet of water can produce evidence that would blacken that particular route for the purposes of navigation. I will quote from a book which I have referred to already, the history of the North Atlantic Steam Navigation, by Henry Fry, of Quebec. He says :

The St. Lawrence, from Bic to Montreal, a distance of three hundred miles, contains a series of sunken reefs, shoals and flats, and to make matters worse, the tides do not run true, and the channel is often very narrow. They had to contend with snowstorms and ice in the spring and fall, and occasionally with fogs in summer. The river, too, was badly lighted, and most of the pilots were then incompetent to take charge of a large steamship, to which they were unaccustomed. The straits of Belle Isle were often blocked with ice, and the currents changed with the winds, while the soundings were not to be trusted.

My hon. friend from de Lanaudière dealt a good deal with the question of climate, and he is on record as using these words :

There is no place on earth in the same latitude colder than Hudson bay, with the exception perhaps of a few places in Siberia. The intense cold of Hudson bay so deflects the isothermal lines south that we feel its effect even here in the city of Ottawa. The fact that we are opposite the southern end of James bay deflects the isothermal line to such an extent that the same line which passes Gaspé and the Straits of Belle Isle strikes the most northern part of Norway, the land of the midnight sun. Hudson bay being such a cold region, there is a contour line around its shores for a distance of two hundred miles, following almost the shape of the bay, within which there is hardly any vegetation. There is nothing but rocks and muskegs, and a few trees scattered along the shores of the rivers.

Let me read to the House the meteorological observations as to the greatest heat and cold in winter in Hudson bay and straits. Captain Gorden gives the lowest and highest temperatures, from the 10th of August, 1884, to 27th of September, 1885, as below, at the places named :

At Cape Chidley, Atlantic entrance to Hudson straits, lowest, 33 ; highest, 63.
Stupart's bay, midway through Hudson straits, lowest, 35 ; highest, 65.
Churchill, in Hudson bay, lowest, 40 ; highest, 84.

It does seem absurd to say that Hudson bay, where the winter temperature is much higher than at Ottawa, should be held responsible for the cold winter here. It is something new to be told that the cold is responsible for the presence of rocks and muskegs. The hon. gentleman spoke about the isothermal lines. I again quote Dr. Bell as follows :

The temperature below the immediate surface of Lake Superior is 39 degrees Fahrenheit ; along the east shore of Hudson bay it averages 53 degrees in the summer months.

They are summer months in both cases. So that the temperature of the water of the east coast of Hudson bay is something like 14 degrees higher than the temperature of the water of Lake Superior in the summer months. Dr. Bell states that this is not quite correct with regard to the western coast of Hudson bay near Churchill, where the water is colder, but there is a marked difference in favour of Hudson bay, it being much warmer water than Lake Superior. The hon. gentleman from de Lanaudière sneered at my remark when I said that the country to the south of Hudson bay was in the same latitude as Devonshire, England. I was using the words of Dr. Bell when I said so, and it is absolutely correct. I go further, and say that the summer temperature of that country, taking the four or five months of vegetation is as warm as Devonshire. If he will consult the Enclyclopedia Britannica he will find the isothermal line for July which passes through the south of Hudson bay passes also through the south of England ; but I have more specific information. I have a table which I quote from Professor Hind's very valuable work on that subject. Professor Hind says :

The conditions required for the adaptation of a certain area to agricultural purposes, apart from altitude above the sea and the character of the soil, are generally reduced to two, namely, the mean temperature of about ninety days, as during the summer or growing months, and the degree of humidity during that period.

There are, however, two other conditions which exercise a very great influence upon vegetable growth throughout an area extending over many hundred miles to the north. These are the measure of the sun's intensity as regards light and heat, and the duration of the length of the day. As we move from Manitoba, say in latitude 50 degrees to Peace River in latitude 56 degrees (or York in 57 degrees), this important fact has to be noticed, that the length of the day in summer increases in a greater ratio than the sun's intensity of light and heat diminishes. It is not heat only which affects the growth of vegetation, it is also the duration of solar light in the day. The longer the day the greater the total amount of heat and light which will be received by vegetables.

Table showing the sun's relative intensity, and the length of the day in latitudes 40 degrees, north and 60 degrees north.

TABLE showing the sun's relative intensity, and the length of the day in latitudes 40° N. and 60° N.

Multiply in every case, in the table, the sun's intensity by the length of the day and you will find that relatively heat and light are greater in the days of summer, in latitude 60 degrees north than in latitude 40 degrees north, in the relation that 1,244,398 bears to 1,201,890, or in other words the heat and light is greater at 60 degrees north than at 40 degrees north by three and a half per cent.

There are certain disturbing influences such as altitudes which have their effect, but other things being equal that would be the result.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Do I understand the hon. gentleman to be proving that the further north you go the better the climate is?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend cannot possibly understand me as proving anything of the kind. I am not giving any opinion of my own, but I am giving the authority of Professor Hind ; as a matter of fact taking the sun's intensity and the length of the day, that during the period of four or five months vegetation, there is more heat and light in latitude 60° than at latitude 40°. I will now quote from Mr. Stupart, from whom I received a communication yesterday through Mr. Tyrell, from which I make this extract :

A fact of peculiar interest in connection with the climate of our Northwest Territories is that the summer season in Athabaska and the basin of the Great Mackenzie river is nearly as warm as in Alberta. At Edmonton and Calgary the mean summer temperature is 59 degrees, Dunvegan is 58 degrees, Fort Chippewyan is 59 degrees, Fort Simpson 57 degrees. The explanation of this lies chiefly in the fact that the insolation, i.e., heat received from the sun, scarcely varies about midsummer between the parallels of latitude 40 degrees and 60 degrees ; the larger number of hours the sun is above the horizon in the higher latitudes very nearly balancing the effect of less direct solar radiation, and as after early May the snow has all disappeared, we find the isothermal lines running nearly parallel with the Rocky mountains.

Of course this does not apply as strongly to the vicinity of Hudson bay. The large body of water moderates the cold in winter and the heat in summer, and the heat and cold are not so intense at either seasons as in Mackenzie Basin. Now Mr. Stupart gives me a table in addition to that :

The temperature conditions of the district between Lake Winnipeg and Split lake in the several months, May-September, may be compared with Europe as follows :

May, 50-40 degrees, with north of Scotland and southern Norway.

June, 56 degrees-54 degrees, with Scotland.

July, 63 degrees, with south of England.

August, 63 degrees, with south of England.

August, 57·5 degrees to 55 degrees, with Scotland.

September, 50 degrees to 45 degrees, with northern Norway and Sweden.

That is just exactly the same statement I made in the House, on good authority, which was so freely criticised by hon. gentlemen who spoke after me. So that I think I may pass that point over as proved beyond any doubt whatever. Before closing I wish to make a few observations with regard to certain figures and arguments presented to the House by the hon. gentleman from de Lanaudière (Hon. Mr. Casgrain) with regard to transportation. The hon. gentleman made a calculation with reference to cost of transporting wheat, and this calculation was quite pertinent to a discussion of the comparative value of the Hudson bay route and the Transcontinental Railway, but in doing that, three very serious fallacies are found in his premises, and when these are stated, it will be apparent that all the figures he bases them on are of no value whatever. The first fallacy is the cost per train mile in transportation;—how he arrives at it I cannot very well discover—so much for, oiling so much for train hands, and so much for one thing and another. The only way to ascertain the cost of train mileage is to take our railway systems and find the average. That is supplied by the reports of the different railway companies, worked out to the finest possible point, and I will show the hon. gentleman what these averages are. The hon. gentleman made the cost per train mile of a heavy load, 2,000 tons, from Winnipeg to Quebec, $1.35 per mile. I have gone over the report of the Department of Railways and I find that freight and passenger trains, large and small, are all enumerated there. The actual train mileage made by the great railway systems is as follows :

Average cost per mile of railways doing both freight and passenger business :

|---|---|
| Canadian Pacific | $1 23 |
| Canadian Northern | 1 07 |
| Intercolonial | 0 97 |
| Grand Trunk | 0 98 |
| Average | $1 12 |

The average cost per train mile on Canadian Southern, $1.60, it having a grade of less than four-tenths of one per cent.

How is it the average cost is greater in the Canadian Southern? Because having a lower grade it carries heavier trains, I suppose. That is one of the reasons, and it might carry them more cheaply in proportion to their size on that acount. Then take the Average cost per train mile on almost purely freight railroads :

|---|---|
| Crow's Nest Southern | $2 62 |
| Cumberland Railway and Coal Company | 2 61 |
| Nelson and Fort Shepperd Railway | 2 15 |
| Philipburg Railway and Quarry Company | 2 02 |
| Average | $2 35 |

The average is $2.35 on the small railways which do only or mainly a freight business.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON.

Running a heavy freight train is a different proposition from running a light passenger train, and this is the average of their freight trains. It may be that their grade is not as good as on the modern railways, and they have short hauls and allowances must be made for that; but dealing with a train carrying 2,000 bushels of wheat, we can say that $2 per train mile is the very lowest it can be carried for.

Another fallacy which underlies the hon. gentleman's calculation is that he made no allowance for carrying the empties back. We know very well that in any trade between any point in the Northwest and the city of Quebec or Churchill an ample allowance has to be made for carrying the empties back, and the average cost of carrying empties back would be greater than the average train mileage on the ordinary roads in this country. So that in place of $2 per train mile you have to put it at $4 per train mile, including carrying the empties back. On these fallacious premises the hon. gentleman calculated 6 cents per bushel for carrying wheat from Winnipeg to Quebec. I told the hon. gentleman I was going to criticise his figures, and that he should be present if he desired to defend them. I have an estimate here, taking $2 per train mile and counting the cost of carrying the empties back, which we have to do, for we know very well the train will have to go back empty because the rolling stock used for other eastbound traffic will be ample for carrying goods from the east, and this state of things will have to be continued for a long time. The following is a comparative statement of cost of carrying wheat from Regina to Quebec and Fort Churchill :

From Regina to Quebec, 1,716 miles or, including return of empty cars, a train mileage of 3,432, at $2 per train mile of trains carrying 40,000 bushels each, $6,864, or 17 cents per bushel.

From Regina to Churchill, 800 miles, or including return of empty cars, a train mileage of 1,600 miles at $2 per train mile of trains carrying 40,000 bushels each, $1,600, or 8 cents per bushel.

Saving in favour of Churchill, 9 cents per bushel.

Assuming that as much wheat will be carried as was shipped from Montreal last year, 11,000,000 bushels, the 9 cents would be over one million dollars of clear gain to the producers of the wheat.

Hon. Mr. McGREGOR—There is no market at Quebec or Churchill. The hon. gentleman should carry the calculation further.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—What the hon. gentleman says is not relevant. When you get to the sea-board, you have a sea voyage before you, whether you are at Churchill or Montreal. I dealt with the question of the straits and the navigation by that route before the hon. gentleman came in, and I am not going to repeat. He (Mr. Casgrain) puts the cost at 6 cents a bushel, and 30 per cent for costs. The amount he was going to allow for profit or cost of the road was 1½ cents a bushel. I made an estimate of that, and I found that in order to meet the interest of the cost of the road you would have to carry 246,000,000 bushels of wheat at 1½ cents per bushel. In fact there was no alowance for the cost of the road in the hon. gentleman's calculation, and I want hon. gentlemen to bear in mind that I have not included in my figures anything for the cost of the Grand Trunk Pacific. If you want to get the real cost of transportation, you must include the cost of the road. But I do not think the Grand Trunk will be out of pocket in building the road, and I think we will have 'shuffled off our mortal coils' before they pay interest on construction. In the same manner the railway to Churchill will have to be built by the people of Canada or out of the lands of the country, and therefore, we might perhaps in this calculation eliminate the cost of both roads. An hon. member interrupted me just now to bring out the cost of ocean transportation. He made a statement in the House which no doubt was accurate, on the authority of Mr. Reid, of Montreal, that tramp steamers were carrying wheat at a penny a bushel and that the owners were taking their ships from the freight business and turning them into passenger steamers on that account. If that statement is true of Montreal and New York, the day will come when it will also be true of Churchill, from the fact that you have a very much better sheet of water freer from rocks and shoals and natural difficulties than Montreal. I cannot refer to what took place in the committee to investigate our northern country, or I would tell the House that when Dr. Bell was asked the other day what aids to navigation were required in Hudson bay, he said that the navigation was very good, and that there was not any very urgent need of improvements. There is a good deal of attention directed at this time to the opening of the Peace river country. I notice that a report on that district has been laid before the House of Commons with which we have not been favoured, but I have learned from that report that the surveyor who has been there two or three years surveying that large block of land in British Columbia which belongs to the Dominion of Canada, some 4,000,000 acres of land—and there is an excellent testimony to the value of that land, that he would not advise the government of Canada to encourage immigration there until the people are supplied with a railway. I am also glad that the Grand Trunk Pacific did not go up through that country, because I fear that the carrying of wheat by any railroad down to the head of Lake Superior to find its outlet at Montreal or New York would not be practicable; that in our time, at all events, the cultivation of wheat could not be carried on profitably in the Peace river, no matter how good the country, on account of the great cost of transportation. But when other things are dealt with, a line of railway could be run from the Peace river due east to Churchill, or nearly due east. It would not be more than 800 miles long, and it would then bring Churchill as near an ocean port, I was going to say, as Regina is now, but very much nearer than Regina is now, because you would get rid of 1,000 miles of lake and river navigation, besides other difficulties. The day will come, I hope, and not very long away at the rate of progress we are making, when we will not only have a railway to Hudson bay running north from Regina but when we will have another railway running due east and west, bringing the wheat of the Peace river country to an ocean port. I do not agree with the remarks of the hon. gentleman from Calgary in regard to the port of Churchill. I do not think there will be any occasion to sequester Churchill, as it were, like the District of Columbia in the United States, to set it apart as not belonging to any province, which my hon. friend suggests, if I understood him aright, but I think that the port of Churchill should belong to a western province, and that province Manitoba. I entirely agree with the remarks which he has offered to the House, and very timely and useful ones too, with regard to the lands authorized to be given to this railway. I hope the government will not lose sight of the importance of husbanding that land grant that is still available, and which can be implemented by orders in council and use that land grant in the best possible way in order to procure the construction of this road. It would be a great shame, in the light of what we have seen of land speculation, if that land were granted to any railway company who would sell it to speculators, and thus get into the hands of men who would hold it at almost impossible prices to the settler. If the lands are going to be given to a company who may build this railway they should be administered by a commission so that every dollar that would be paid for them would go into the railway, and the land itself would go into the hands of settlers at a price that would ensure the construction of the railway and the settlement of the country. Let me say in closing that I am disappointed that the members of the government have not taken part in this discussion, and I hope that, although as mover of this motion I am making what might be regarded as a closing speech, that they will not allow the debate to be closed without voicing the sentiments of the government in regard to it. My reason for saying so is that, in the ordinary course of things, my motion for papers on such an important matter calls for expressions from the government, and we usually have them, and we learn in that way the attitude of the government. In the event of our not getting any expression from the gentleman representing the government in this House, I want to read what the hon. premier said in the House of Commons :

> I am not prepared at this moment to make any further statement than that, but I say this with all the authority which I have in this House, that at this moment the subject is engaging the attention of the government. I am not prepared to say that next week or the week after or within a very short time we will have an announcement to make to the House, but I hope that before the end of the session we will have something to declare upon this subject.

Here is a very specific promise that before the end of the session the government will make an amendment on this question. We are hoping that we shall hear from the hon. gentleman representing the government in this House in fulfilment of that promise, before the close of the session. I think it is due to this House that we should have these statements on a subject of so much importance. Since I made my opening speech on this question, I have been very much encouraged by the assurance of the leader of the government. The subject was brought up in the House of Commons on February 22 by one of the members representing the west in that House, and some very interesting and able speeches were made on it. The Hon. Mr. Foster made a very clear declaration of his views in regard to the matter. He stated that when in the government he was the means of sending out the first exploration expedition in 1883 and 1884, and he was then perfectly satisfied that the route was feasible, and that it was available for commerce; but he said that Canada had a great many enterprises on its hands at that time, and there was the still greater reason that the success of the Canadian Pacific Railway was not then fully demonstrated, and the opening of another route, in his opinion might very safely be delayed until urgent need arose for it, in other words, until there was a congestion of the products of the west in finding an outlet. He said undoubtedly that the time had now arrived when the question would have to be dealt with, and with the large number of immigrants coming into the Northwest the congestion would continue, no matter what the railway companies could do, and they were doing all they could do. Notwithstanding anything they could do, however, the demand for rolling stock and cars would be greater and greater and the congestion was upon us, and it was time this question of the Hudson bay route was grappled with earnestly. He (Mr. Foster) was followed by the hon. leader of the government, who made a very interesting speech, including the words I have read to the House. The Manitoba elections were on at the time. It was only two weeks before the elections. I do not want to be understood as insinuating that the remarks of either hon. gentleman was in any way affected by that fact. I know that the subject is pressing itself on every thoughtful man. It is impossible to brush it away with a wave of the hand. That could be done years ago, but it cannot be done now, because the west is being filled with people, and the increase in the future will be in greater ratio than in the past. On that account, this route is forcing itself upon the attention of the public, and I have no doubt it was that consideration, and not the Manitoba elections, that prompted the leader of the government to make the positive promise which he made in the House of Commons on February 22. We shall wait with hope and confidence that before the session closes we will have this announcement which he said he would make.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (81) An Act to incorporate the Central Canada Manufacturers Mutual Fire Insurance Company.—(Hon. Mr. Gibson.)

Bill (102) An Act to ratify an agreement between the government of Canada and the government of British Columbia respecting the western boundary of the Railway Belt. —(Hon. Mr. Scott.)

Bill (108) An Act to amend the Canada Shipping Act.—(Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.)

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at Three o'clock.

SENATE.

OTTAWA, Friday, March 15, 1907.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

IMMORALITY IN DAWSON.

The notice of motion being called :

Hon. Mr. Ferguson—That he will inquire of the government :

1. Are they aware the Yukon council, one-half of which is composed of appointees of the government, and which is presided over by one of their officers, has granted licenses to at least two retail liquor shops in Dawson city in connection with which immoral entertainments and practices are openly conducted?

2. If the government is not in possession of information on the subject, will they cause an investigation to be made ?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Is my hon. friend, the Secretary of State, ready to answer the question ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have not received the information yet, though I have asked for it. Mr. Oliver told me that he was not yet in a position to furnish it.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I do not see why there should be any delay. This notice has now been before the House for nearly two weeks, and I am amply justified in proceeding and making my few observations on it at this stage ; but if my hon. friend will be better prepared on Tuesday to answer the inquiry, I shall defer it, as it is most desirable that we should be in possession of full information. I was quite correct the other day in stating that the ex-governor of the Yukon is in Ottawa, and has been here since the notice was put on the order paper, and I cannot understand why the government are not in a position to supply the information. However, I do not want to take my hon. friend at any disadvantage, and I shall, therefore, if he desires it, let the notice stand until Tuesday next.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have done my part, all I can do. I cannot take the minister by the throat. I have asked him repeatedly to get me the information, and he said he would if he could. I did not know that the ex-governor of the Yukon was in the city, until my hon. friend mentioned it the other day.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Who is now the acting governor ?

Hon. Mr SCOTT—I cannot say.

The notice was allowed to stand until Tuesday next.

CIVIL SERVICE INSURANCE.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I beg to lay on the table a copy of a return relating to Civil Service Insurance, which was laid on the table of the House of Commons the other day. On my calling the attention of the Finance Department to the fact that a copy of it had not been furnished for use in this House, and that I considered a document relating to the Civil Service Insurance Act ought to have been laid on the table of the Senate at the same time it was laid on the table of the House of Commons, the head of the insurance branch informed me that it never in the past had been the practice to do so; that it had only been laid on the table of the House of Commons. I said the House of Commons was not parliament and when the attention of the minister was called to it, he ordered the papers to be at once prepared.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (31) An Act to incorporate the Northwestern Trusts and Loan Company.—(Hon. Mr. Lougheed.)

Bill (28) An Act to incorporate the Residential Fire Assurance Company.—(Hon. Mr. Sullivan.)

Bill (38) An Act respecting the Klondike Mines Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Ross, Moosejaw.)

Bill (EE) An Act to incorporate the Winnipeg and Northwestern Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Ross, Middlesex.)

Bill (GG) An Act respecting the St. Mary River Bridge Company.—(Hon. Mr. Ross, Middlesex.)

Bill (II) An Act respecting the Manitoulin and North Shore Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Ross, Middlesex.)

Bill (JJ) An Act respecting the Ontario, Hudson Bay and Western Railways Company.—(Hon. Mr. Ross, Middlesex.)

Bill (FF) An Act respecting the Algoma Central and Hudson Bay Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Ross, Middlesex.)

Bill (71) An Act to incorporate the Burrard, Westminster and Boundary Railway and Navigation Company.—(Hon. Mr. Riley.)

Bill (46) An Act to incorporate the Manitoba Radial Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Watson.)

LYON DIVORCE BILL.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE CONCURRED IN.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER moved concurrence in the fifth report of the Committee on Divorce, re the petition of Victor Harold Lyon.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I wish to ask the hon. chairman of the committee one question. I looked over the evidence in this case, and there was one circumstance in connection with it for which no explanation was given, and that is the fact that the husband appears to have abandoned the marital relations with his wife for some two years before the occurrence of the offence for which he applies for a divorce. I think that is a circumstance in regard to which some explanation should have been demanded, because if there was no satisfactory explanation of that action on the part of the husband, I think he could be regarded as having in fact conduced to the offence of his wife.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I do not think any explanation of that circumstance is necessary. In a great many cases one party is deserted by the other and the divorce proceeding is not commenced for sometime.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is no explanation given.

The motion was agreed to.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (UU) An Act to amend the Gold and Silver Marking Act.—(Hon. Mr. Gibson.)

Bill (VV) An Act to incorporate the International Canal and Power Company.—(Hon. Mr. Young.)

PORT ARTHUR POWER AND DEVELOPMENT COMPANY BILL.

Hon. Mr. KERR moved the second reading of Bill (WW) An Act to incorporate the Port Arthur Power and Development Company.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I should like to have some assurance from the hon. gentleman from Toronto that this Bill does not in any way infringe upon the rights of the province of Ontario.

Hon. Mr. KERR.—I have not given the matter sufficient attention to pass any deliberate judgment on it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Does my hon. friend from Halifax think that the hon. gentleman from Toronto has shown such deep solicitude for the province of Ontario as to be the custodian of its rights?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes.

Hon. Mr. KERR—Certainly.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

INSPECTION OF MEATS AN CANNED FOODS BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resumed, in Committee of the Whole, consideration of Bill (No. 33) An Act respecting the Inspection of meats and canned foods.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I propose to make one small alteration in the clause giving power to the minister to make exemptions. At present it reads that he may exempt in the case of British and Continental exports. I propose to make it British or other markets, to include everybody. Representations have been made to him that it would be in the interest of the various packers.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—This will certainly not make the protection any less to our friends the lobster packers by extending it to all countries; but is it not like government by order in council? Parliament passes an important measure, and at the end of the session the government come down and take power to themselves to exempt everybody from the operation of it.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—They are responsible to parliament if they abuse their power. I think it will be found very shortly that the placing of the name 'Canadian' on the package will be an advantage instead of a disadvantage; but the minister has yielded to the strong representations made by lobster packers and others on this point.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My argument would be against passing any Act with reference to marking, if it is not to be enforced. What I object to is that we should pass an Act which provides for marking, and then give the Governor in Council power to render it all a dead letter.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—We will not do that. It is merely with reference to these two classes of goods that this power is at all likely to be exercised.

The amendment was agreed to, and the clause as amended adopted.

On clause 21,

21. The certificate of the inspector or other officer appointed under the provisions of this Act shall, for the purpose of this Act, be prima facie evidence in all courts of justice and elsewhere of the matter certified.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I notice that the certificate of the inspector is to be accepted as prima facie evidence in all courts of justice. It would be utterly impossible to controvert any statement that might be made in that certificate, provided the inspector be not present. Let us assume for a moment that a charge is made under this Act and the inspector's certificate is placed before the court; that at once becomes prima facie evidence, and the onus is therefore thrown on the defendent. How is the defendent to controvert that if the inspector himself be not present?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I am not prepared off-hand to answer my hon. friend's objection other than this, that similar clauses have been introduced in a variety of other Acts affecting inspection, drawn on all fours with this. It is a difficulty that I say might, under certain circumstances, arise. Of course if an inspector made a mis-statement in his certificate, he would be guilty of a misdemeanour.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—But the difficulty I see is this: There is no way of attacking the statement. The defendent would probably have no knowledge of it himself. The certificate contains a charge of violating the Act. The inspector might be labouring under a misconception, and it seems to me that in a court of law the inspector himself should be present.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Has the hon. gentleman any suggestion to make to remedy that? I think you will find they have granted those powers, taking it for granted, I presume, that the inspector would be held very severely responsible if he made any misstatement.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I do not know that he would wilfully make a misstatement.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—If he made a misstatement, whether wilful or not, if that came to the notice of the head of the department he would discipline him very promptly.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Is there any reason why the inspector should not give his evidence viva voce ?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I do not know that there is, except that these inspectors will have to traverse a very great extent of country, and it might be difficult to bring them from place to place.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I suppose it is a matter that might be amended hereafter if it is subject to any abuse?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I will call the attention of the Minister of Justice to it. I know they have advised me that these clauses are taken from similar Acts. That is all that I know personally as to this particular clause; but I shall take a note of it. I do not think, in practice, any abuse is likely to arise.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 30,

30. The administration of any part of this Act may be assigned by the Governor in Council to any minister other than the Minister of Agriculture, and in such case the minister to whom such assignment is made shall have the same powers with respect to the part of this Act to him assigned as the Minister of Agriculture now has.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—This allows the administration of this Act to be in part controlled by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, as the hon. gentleman will see.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—You distribute the administration of the Act ?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Under certain circumstances, we may distribute the power.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 3,

3. All animals intended for slaughter in any establishment shall be inspected as provided by the regulations.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—I call the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce to the provision of this clause. I suppose it means a slaughtering establishment, an abattoir, or something of that kind. But it is not very clear. It might be applied by somebody to other cases.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—That is expressly excepted in the succeeding clauses. If my hon. friend will look at clause 5, he will see that slaughtering by farmers on their own premises, and so forth, is expressly excepted, unless there is good cause to interfere.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That makes it all right.

On clause 2,

(a) 'carcases' means the carcases of cattle, swine, sheep, goats or poultry.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—I call the attention of the government to the translation of the word 'carcase' in subclause (a) of clause 2. In the French version it is 'animaux'; which is not the correct word. We have the French word 'carcasse.'

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I think the hon. gentleman is quite right. I am obliged to him, for calling attention to it. It can be corrected by our own officers.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK, from the committee, reported the Bill with amendments.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved concurrence in the amendments.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I wish to express my regret that clause 12 has been altered in the way in which it has. I think it was a very much better clause, as the Bill came to us, than it is now.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned till Tuesday next at Three o'clock p.m.

IMMORALITY IN DAWSON CITY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON inquired of the government :

1. Are they aware that the Yukon council, one-half of which is composed of appointees of the government, and which is presided over by one of their officers, has granted licenses to at least two retail liquor shops in Dawson City in connection with which immoral entertainments and practices are openly conducted ?

2. If the government is not in possession of information on the subject, will they cause an investigation to be made ?

He said : I have deferred proceeding with this notice for some time ; but I feel that there are no circumstances which would warrant any further delay, and therefore I desire to call the attention of the House to the matter embracing this notice that I have given. I wish to explain the circumstances under which I have brought this matter before the House and, under the rule, I am entitled, when making an inquiry, to do so. I had a letter from a highly respectable man, formerly a resident of the province from which I come, now resident in Dawson City, in which he made statements with reference to the disgraceful conditions of things which he alleges exists in that city, in regard to licensing places in which immorality is openly and notoriously practised. I had a communication from another source altogether, independently of this, which entirely verified the information that I had when I placed the notice on the paper, and, in addition to that, I have read a letter which appeared in the Toronto 'News' some days ago, written by the Rev. John Pringle, a Presbyterian minister of very high standing. I know of my personal knowledge as to the standing of this gentleman. He was born in Nova Scotia.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I rise to a question of order. It does not seem to me that a discussion of this kind is at all within the meaning of any of our rules. The rule on the subject, I suppose, is No. 39, which reads as follows :

No debate is in order on a mere inquiry ; but explanatory remarks may be made by the senator making the inquiry, and by the minister or other senators answering the same. Observations upon such answer are not allowed.

It is not open to him therefore to debate the question.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I am simply complying with the rule. I have looked at it carefully, and I am quite satisfied I am within my rights.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I am stating my point of order. It is out of no discourtesy to the hon. gentleman at all, but because I think the rules in this respect ought to be observed better than they have been in the past. We have had recently inquiries with reference to statements alleged to have been made, and newspaper articles with reference to statements alleged to have been made by a gentleman, not a member of this House, but a member of the other House which went forth all over the country as an inquiry. No answer could be given to it here. No one here knew anything about it, and that stood unanswered for a whole day. I want to show that I think we are transgressing rules, and that it was a very improper thing for these observations to have been made here when they could have been made elsewhere and an answer could have been given. An inquiry could have been made whether such a statement had been made, and so on. But I do not understand this rule makes provision that an inquiry can be debated. The hon. gentleman has explained that he has heard so-and-so ; but, I submit, it is not within the meaning of the rule that he should repeat statements he has heard, and refer to letters not produced here, and statements made by persons not named here, or to discuss articles in the newspapers, which are wholly irresponsible. I do not think it is reasonable we should be entertained by such a discussion, when it is out of order, and when, if anybody else attempted it, he would be stopped.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend says that we should not indulge in a discussion of this kind when it is out of order. I presume when he says it is out of order that, in his opinion, settles it. The rule says :

No debate is in order on a mere inquiry ; but explanatory remarks may be made by the senator making the inquiry.

I am merely making explanatory remarks, and I submit to the House that I am entirely and completely within the rule. I am explaining on what authority I am asking this question, and why I am asking it—that I am not asking it in mere wantonness, or without information. I have not given the name of the gentleman who wrote me in the first instance, or the name of the gentleman who verified the report I received ; because I do not think it is necessary ; but I have given the name of a very distinguished Presbyterian minister who has done magnificent missionary work in the Yukon for many years past, and have referred to a letter which he has published in the Toronto 'News' that fully and completely proves the statement of facts to which I have alluded. I mention these things to show that I have not proceeded in this matter without having ample grounds on which to base this inquiry. I knew I was within my rights, and having made my statement, I now ask my question.

The SPEAKER—Of course hon. gentlemen will understand that it is pretty hard for the Speaker to decide just at what moment one passes from rule 39 to rule 40 when a statement is allowed. As between what constitutes explanatory remarks and a statement, sometimes it takes a little time before one can see exactly which ground the gentleman who is addressing the House has covered. I think, under the circumstances, the statement or remarks made were fairly under rule 39.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The answer of the minister, to the first inquiry, No ; and to the second, that inquiry is being made. I saw Mr. Oliver myself, personally, and he knew nothing about it.

THE ROSS RIFLE.

INQUIRY POSTPONED.

The notice of motion being called :

By the Hon. Mr. Landry. That he will inquire of the government :

1. How many rifles has the Ross Rifle Company manufactured, from the time it commenced the performance of its contract with the government up to the 1st of March instant:
(a) Of Mark No. I.; (b) of Mark No. II.; (c) of Mark No. III.?
2. How many of all these rifles has the government accepted after inspection thereof :
(a) Of Mark No. I.; (b) of Mark No. II.; (c) of Mark No. III.?
3. How much, up to the 1st of March instant, has the government given as payment in full for rifles :
(a) Of Mark No. I.; (b) of Mark No. II.; (c) of Mark No. III.?
4. What is the amount paid in advance for rifles in course of manufacture but not yet finished or not yet accepted on that date, March 1, instant ?
5. How many rifles belong to the latter category and of what mark are they ?
6. Out of the rifles accepted by the government and wholly paid for by it, how many of each mark have been distributed, and how many of them remain in the military stores ?
7. At what places have the rifles been stored which have not been distributed ?
8. To whom have been given or sold the rifles that have been distributed ? What is the number, of each Mark, thus given or sold ? What regiments, rifle associations, bodies or individuals whosoever, are now furnished with the Ross rifle, and in what quantity has it been distributed to them ?
9. In what respect is the Mark No. II. essentially or especially different from the Mark No. I.?
10. In what does Mark No. III. differ from the two preceding ?
11. How many rifles of Mark No. II. have been substituted for rifles of Mark No. I., after a regular distribution of the latter ?
12. Were the rifles of Mark No. I. convertible, and have they been converted into rifles of Mark No. II. ?
13. Will the improvements recently brought about in the rifle of Mark No. II., in order to make out of it the rifle of Mark No. III., be extended to all the rifles of Mark No. II. and to all the rifles of Mark No. I.?
14. If the improvements brought about in the Ross rifle cannot be adapted to rifles previously manufactured by the company and accepted by the government, what use does the government intend to make of an arm comparatively inferior ?
15. What, on an average, is the proportion of rifles set aside on first inspection by the government ?
16. Out of these rifles rejected on first inspection, what is afterwards, on the average, the proportion of those which a second inspection allows the government to accept ?
17. Has the government concluded a contract with the Ross Rifle Company for the manufacture of a bayonet for this rifle ? When, at what price, and for what quantity ?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I ask that this be allowed to stand until after the adjournment. The minister has laid on the table of the House an answer to a previous motion concerning the Ross rifle, a very voluminous report, comprising about twelve or fourteen hundred pages. When I have gone through it, if I find that it answers my inquiry, I will not make the motion. I therefore ask that the notice be allowed to stand until after the adjournment.

The notice was allowed to stand until the 6th of April.

CANADIAN PATENTS.

The notice of motion being called :

By the Hon. Mr. Domville :

That he will ask the government that patents registered in Canada be printed.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—I explained the object of this when I gave notice. Many people would like to see copies of patents but the expense of procuring them is great, four or five dollars. In the United States a copy of any patent can be had for ten cents, and I think we should have a similar privilege here.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—On applying to the Department of Agriculture to ascertain the policy in connection with the subject, I am advised that the cost would be altogether out of proportion to the advantages, and that they could not think of undertaking it. They had discussed it with the King's Printer, and found that it would be a waste of money. Probably 95 per cent of those copies printed would never be asked for.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE—Could not some compromise be made, by which anybody applying for a copy of a patent, could get it on reasonable terms ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Of course I cannot answer for that, because I presume the department is not making any profit out of it. The applicant ought to be charged no more than the actual cost of copying the patent.

NATIONAL TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY CONTRACTS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON inquired :

1. What portions, stated in sections and miles, of the eastern division of the National Transcontinental Railway, have been placed under contract by the government from the 1st instant ?

2. What is the nature of the work embraced in the contract or contracts referred to, are they for grading, or does any of them include track-laying and ballasting, or all three operations ?

3. What will be the cost per mile of grading, track-laying and ballasting, stated separately, or all three operations combined, on each section of the said eastern division, embraced in the aforementioned contracts ?

4. If so, what is the length of railway between these points ?

5. Has the route of the western division of the said railway been approved as aforesaid ? If so, what is the length of the mountain and prairie sections, stated separately ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The answer furnished by the department is as follows :—

New Brunswick.

Section 1, 50 miles from Moncton, westerly.

Section 2, 62 miles from a point about 2½ miles west of Grand Falls to Quebec boundary.

Quebec.

Section 3, 150 miles from the Quebec bridge easterly.

Section 4, from the end of the 150 miles westerly from the Quebec bridge westerly 45 miles.

Ontario and Quebec.

Section 5, from the 8 miles west of Abitibi river crossing, easterly 150 miles.

2. They all include grading, tracklaying and ballasting.

3. The estimated cost per mile for grading, tracklaying and ballasting each of the above sections is as follows :

Section 1, $19,797.92.
Section 2, $22,358.88.
Section 3, $33,408.97.
Section 4, $37,579.41.
Section 5, $26,579.34.

4. The distances between the let sections have not yet been computed.

5. The route has been approved, but the dividing line between the prairie section and the mountain section has not been determined.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Does the hon. Secretary of State say that these contracts have been awarded ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They have been awarded. I do not know that the contracts have been signed—I do not think they have been ; but they have been allotted.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Does this statement include the rails ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, not the rails.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My question plainly calls for the cost of the rails. Of course you cannot lay a track without rails.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—The government will supply the rails.
